CARVER v. SAN JOAQUIN CIGAR CO.

(Civ. 741.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 12, 1911.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 308*)—OFFICERS—CONTRACTS OF EMPLOYMENT.

Where plaintiff was, in 1907, elected secretary of defendant corporation, that office having been vacated by the resignation of the former incumbent, who had been elected in 1904, and whose salary had been fixed at $40 a month, and plaintiff performed actual duties only a short time, though he continued as secretary, no contract can be implied entitling plaintiff to receive the same salary as was paid to his predecessor; it appearing that he was not aware of her compensation, and that the resolution appointing him made no mention of salary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by H. D. Carver against the San Joaquin Cigar Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stanton L. Carter and Thos. D. Ingersoll, for appellant. E. S. Van Meter and N. C. Coldwell, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action to recover for services rendered. The case was tried, and the court filed its findings of fact, finding substantially as follows: On February 20, 1904, the defendant corporation, at a meeting of the board of directors, passed a resolution, wherein they appointed a secretary and fixed her salary at $40 per month "as compensation for services as secretary, and all other services to be rendered the corporation by her." The person holding the office of secretary at that time, by virtue of such appointment, was a woman, and she held the position until April 2, 1907, when she resigned. On the same day, April 2, 1907, the plaintiff was elected and appointed the secretary of said corporation to fill such vacancy. The plaintiff upon his election immediately entered upon the performance of his duties as secretary, and has ever since continued as such secretary of said corporation. The court, however, further found that while the plaintiff has always been ready, able, and willing to perform any services required of him as secretary, "no actual duties have been performed by, or required of, plaintiff as such secretary since about the 12th day of April, 1907, and no meeting of the board of directors of said corporation has been had or held since said 2d day of April, 1907." No express contract was entered into between the parties fixing the compensation of the plaintiff for his services as secretary. From these facts the court as a conclusion of law found that all the services rendered by the plaintiff as secretary were reasonably worth the sum of $30, and accordingly judgment for that sum was entered in his favor against the defendant. The next day after the entry of the judgment the plaintiff appealed therefrom, and the appeal is brought here upon the judgment roll alone.

The case is well briefed. We think, however, from the facts above narrated, that no contract can be implied, entitling the plaintiff to receive from the defendant the same salary as was paid to his predecessor. Under the resolution appointing plaintiff's predecessor, she was to be compensated at the rate of $40 per month as secretary and for all other services to be rendered by her to the defendant. More than three years after her appointment, the plaintiff was elected, and it does not appear that he knew the amount of her salary. In the resolution designating him as secretary nothing is said about salary, and he performed the duties of the office for only about 10 days; and, while he was ready and willing to discharge the duties of the office at all times, it does not appear that he was required or willing to perform any other services, nor that if so required, and he performed other services, the $40 a month was to cover them. In fine, we believe that the two resolutions depended upon by the plaintiff, together with his willingness to act when required, do not constitute a contract between the parties fixing the plaintiff's compensation as secretary at $40 per month.

CARVER v. SAN JOAQUIN CIGAR CO.

(Civ. 735.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 5, 1911. Modified Aug. 24, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 706*)—STATEMENT OF FACTS—NECESSITY.

Where the statement of the case as settled and allowed and used upon the hearing of a motion for new trial fails to show the motion or its grounds, an order denying the motion cannot be reviewed, even though defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial, appearing elsewhere in the transcript, specifies statutory grounds for the motion; such notice being neither referred to nor incorporated in the statement of the case used upon the motion for new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2945; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 604*)—STATEMENT OF CASE—STIPULATION.

Though a respondent stipulated to the correctness of a transcript of the record, it does not preclude him from objecting to the sufficiency of the statement to support a motion for new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2657; Dec. Dig. § 604.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 671*) — RECORD — STATEMENT—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW.

While the failure of the statement to show defendant's motion for new trial precludes the appellate court from considering defendant's appeal from the order denying such motion, the appellate court may determine the appeal from the judgment in so far as the alleged errors of law occurring at the trial are concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 671.*]

4. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 489*) — ACTIONS — PLEADING—VARIANCE.

In an action upon a note, the defendant corporation for a special defense alleged that, before the execution and delivery of the note, it was agreed between the payee and the president of the defendant that defendant should not execute the note and should not be bound by any of its terms, and that the payee would surrender the note upon demand of the president. Held, that evidence that the defendant was indebted to the payee and others, and that the note was delivered solely to close up the account of the payee so as to prevent garnishment by his creditors, and that it was agreed that the debt to the payee should not be paid until all other creditors of the defendant were paid, was materially different from the matters pleaded, and hence inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 465*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS.

While oral evidence is admissible to impeach the consideration of a note, such evidence is not admissible to show that the payee has been guilty of a breach of a contemporaneous oral agreement; and hence the maker of a note, its consideration being admitted, could not defend upon the ground that it was agreed between the parties that the note should not be paid and that it was given merely to close up the payee's account against the maker, for that would allow parol evidence to contradict a writing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2144; Dec. Dig. § 465.*]

6. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 106*)—ACTIONS—DEFENSES.

In an action on a note, it is a good defense that it was executed and delivered in furtherance of a plan of the payee and maker to defraud the payee's creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 219, 225–232; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

7. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 489*)—ACTIONS—ANSWER—DEFENSES—FRAUD.

The defense to an action upon a note that it was executed and delivered in furtherance of a plan of the payee and maker to defraud the payee's creditors is new matter, which must be specially pleaded and cannot be established under a general denial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1587–1642; Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

8. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM (§ 14*)—CONTRACTS.

The maker of a note may, as a good defense by way of set-off, show that the payee was, at the time of making, and still is, his debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Set-Off and Counterclaim, Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

9. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 489*)—ACTIONS—ANSWER—ISSUES.

In an action upon a note, where the answer did not set up that the original payee, who transferred the note to the plaintiff, was indebted to the maker at the time of execution, no such issue was raised, and evidence of such indebtedness was immaterial and properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

10. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 497*)—WITNESSES (§ 270*) — ACTIONS — DEFENSES — CONSIDERATION.

A note being, under Civ. Code, § 1614, a presumptive evidence of a consideration, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 21, raising a presumption of title in the holder of such a note when it is duly indorsed, a plaintiff in an action upon a note, duly indorsed to him, need not show the consideration for the indorsment, the failure or illegality of consideration of the note itself not having been attacked; and hence, where the plaintiff, upon direct examination, testified that he gave a valuable consideration for the indorsement, such testimony was wholly unnecessary and immaterial, and cross-examination with reference to the nature and amount of the consideration was properly refused, but the rule would be the opposite if the issue of want of consideration had been raised, and plaintiff, in an attempt to anticipate such a defense, had testified with respect to the consideration.

11. Bills and Notes (§ 489*)—Actions—Answer.

While the plaintiff in an action on a note must have such ownership that a subsequent recovery cannot be had against the defendant, and an answer putting in issue the plaintiff's ownership presents a good defense, the mere denial of plaintiff's ownership is not sufficient, but there must be alleged some defense against the real owner which could not be pleaded against the plaintiff, and so under the general issue defendant may not show that the note was the property of another.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by H. D. Carver against the San Joaquin Cigar Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying defendant's motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

N. C. Coldwell and Edgar S. Van Meter, for appellant. Carter & Carter, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This action was brought to recover the sum of $1,335.05, alleged to be due upon a negotiable promissory note in the ordinary form. The note was shown to have been executed by the corporation defendant on April 6, 1907, the day it bears date, and before maturity indorsed and assigned for a valuable consideration by the payee therein named to the plaintiff herein. The answer of the defendant does not deny the execution of the note, but in that behalf alleges in substance that the note in question was made and delivered to H. E. Mootz, the payee thereof, by F. Knobloch, as president of the corporation defendant, without authority of the corporation, and in excess of his powers and duties as such president, and that the plaintiff at all times had full knowledge and notice of these facts. It is denied that the plaintiff was, at the date of the action, the owner of the note sued upon, or that the payee named therein, for a valuable consideration or otherwise, indorsed, transferred, and delivered said note to the plaintiff herein. And for a second and special defense to the action the answer of the defendant in effect alleges that at and before the execution and delivery of the note it was agreed by Knobloch, as the president of the corporation defendant, and Mootz, the payee named in the note, that said Knobloch should, in the name of the defendant San Joaquin Cigar Company, and as president thereof, make, execute, and deliver to the said H. E. Mootz the said note as the promissory note of the said San Joaquin Cigar Company, but at the same time and place and as a part of the same transaction it was agreed, by and between the said F. Knobloch and the said H. E. Mootz, that said note should not be, and was not, executed by the said San Joaquin Cigar Company, and that the said San Joaquin Cigar Company was not and should not be bound by any of the terms of said promissory note, nor by the promise to pay contained therein, and that the said H. E. Mootz would upon demand of the said F. Knobloch surrender and deliver said note into the possession of the said Knobloch. It was also alleged in the answer of the defendant, as a third and special defense to the action, that at and before the execution and delivery of the note sued on, Mootz, the payee thereof, was indebted to the defendant corporation in the sum of $500 for moneys which he had received for and on account of the defendant; that the receipt of this money was concealed by Mootz from the defendant, and was at the time of the making of the note unknown to either the defendant or its representative Knobloch; that the plaintiff was at all of the times mentioned the secretary of the corporation, and had, before and at the time of the assignment of the note to him, full knowledge of all of the facts pleaded in the answer of the defendant as a special defense to the action. It was conceded upon the trial, and the record shows as well, that the corporation defendant had placed Knobloch, as its president, in full control of the business of the corporation, and had empowered and authorized him to transact all the business of the corporation. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for the full amount of the principal specified in the note, together with an attorney's fee, as stipulated, in the sum of $100. Upon this appeal—which is from the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial—the points presented for review relate only to the rulings of the trial court rejecting certain evidence offered by the defendant in support of the special defenses pleaded.

[1] The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial cannot be reviewed, for the reason that the statement of the case, as settled and allowed by the judge of the trial court, and thereafter used upon the hearing of the motion, fails to show the motion itself or the grounds upon which the defendant relied for a new trial. The statement of the case used upon the hearing is absolutely silent upon the subject of the motion. It is true that the defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial, which appears elsewhere in the transcript, specifies three of the statutory grounds which may be invoked in aid of a motion for a new trial; but, inasmuch as this notice is neither referred to nor incorporated in the statement of the case used upon the motion for a new trial, it cannot now be considered as a part of the record on the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. Leonard v. Shaw, 114 Cal. 69, 45 Pac. 1012; Sprigg v. Barber, 122 Cal. 573, 55 Pac. 419; Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 97, 77 Pac. 762; Roberts v. Hall, 147 Cal. 434, 82 Pac. 66.

[2] The fact that respondent stipulated to the correctness of the transcript does not preclude him from objecting to the sufficiency of the statement to support a motion for a new trial. Todd v. Winants, 36 Cal. 129; Wetherbee v. Carroll, 33 Cal. 549; Leonard v. Shaw, supra.

[4] Upon the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced the note in evidence, and gave testimony which tended to show that the note had been indorsed and assigned to him for a valuable consideration, and Mootz, the payee of the note, testified in effect that the consideration for the note in the first instance was the extinguishment of a pre-existing indebtedness of the defendant to himself, as evidenced by a book account, in the sum of $1,335.05 for services rendered. In rebuttal the defendant called F. Knobloch as a witness in its behalf, and, after objections had been sustained to several questions which were calculated to elicit the facts pleaded and designated as a second special defense in the answer of the defendant, offered to prove in support of said second special defense, by the witness on the stand, that "on the 6th day of April, 1907, the day when the promissory note in suit was signed and delivered to Mr. Mootz, that the San Joaquin Cigar Company was indebted to various other parties than Mr. Mootz in a large sum of money, and that at and before the execution and delivery of this note in suit it was agreed between Mr. Mootz, the payee named in the note, and Mr. Knobloch, the president of the company, that the company should not pay Mr. Mootz anything that the company owed him (Mootz) until the indebtedness of the company to these other parties was fully paid and discharged; that this agreement between them was subsisting at the time that the note was signed and delivered; and that at that time and place Mr. Mootz and Mr. Knobloch, the president of the cigar company defendant, understood, stipulated, and agreed between them that the note in suit, so signed and delivered to Mr. Mootz, was not a valid and subsisting agreement, or any agreement at all, between H. E. Mootz, payee named in the note, and the defendant San Joaquin Cigar Company, but that it was delivered solely and only for the purpose of closing up the account of said H. E. Mootz against the company upon the books of the company, so as to prevent a garnishment of said account by creditors of said Mootz."

The plaintiff objected to the proffered testimony upon the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and intended to alter by parol evidence the terms and conditions of a written agreement. The trial court sustained the objection upon all of the grounds stated, apparently upon the theory that the matters pleaded and designated in the answer of the defendant as a second special defense did not constitute a valid defense to the action. Counsel for the appellant contend here, as they did in the trial court, that the facts specially pleaded by the defendant as a second defense to the action constituted a perfect legal defense to the note. It is argued that the offer of the evidence in question was not an attempt to alter the terms of the note, but was rather an attack upon its validity, in this, that the offer was to show that the note sued on was not the contract of the defendant, and that therefore the evidence so offered was admissible under the exception to the general rule declared by subdivision 2 of section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It will be observed that the matters and things offered to be proved by the defendant were materially different from the matters and things pleaded in the defendant's second special defense to the action, and upon this ground alone the trial court was justified in sustaining plaintiff's objection.

[5] But, however that may be, the facts pleaded as a second special defense as well as the evidence offered in support thereof were inadequate as a defense and incompetent as evidence. No such issue as was attempted to be made, either by the defendant's second special defense or the facts contained in the defendant's offer of evidence, could be properly pleaded or proved against the plaintiff herein.

Oral evidence is admissible to impeach the consideration of a promissory note; but there is an evident distinction between showing the absence or failure of consideration, or illegality in its inception, and proving—as was attempted in this case—the breach of a contemporaneous oral agreement totally at variance with the written agreement of the parties as finally expressed in the note. San Jose Sav. Bank v. Stone, 59 Cal. 187; Langan v. Langan, 89 Cal. 186, 26 Pac. 764; Daw v. Niles, 104 Cal. 106, 37 Pac. 876; Id. (Sup.) 33 Pac. 1114.

The pre-existing indebtedness of the defendant to the payee of the note, which was revealed by defendant's offer of proof, and the evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff, was a valid consideration for the note. The defendant's offer of proof was not an offer to show by parol evidence the want, failure, or illegality of consideration. It was in fact but an attempt to show the existence of a contemporaneous oral agreement entirely at variance with the terms of the written contract of the parties. "This cannot be done. Want of consideration or failure of consideration may be proved in a proper case, but in the absence of fraud or mistake parol evidence cannot be permitted to vary the terms of a written contract." Lompoc Valley Bank v. Stephenson, 156 Cal. 350, 104 Pac. 449.

In so far as the facts offered to be shown by the testimony of the witness Knobloch tended to prove the existence of a conditional and collateral oral contract, essentially different from and contradictory of the note in suit, the offered evidence was incompetent, and rightly rejected by the court.

The court did not err in its refusal to permit the defendant to show that the true consideration for the note was founded in an attempt to defraud and defeat the creditors of Mootz.

[6, 7] It is undoubtedly a good defense to an action upon a promissory note that it was executed and delivered in furtherance of a common design on the part of the payee and maker to defraud the payee's creditors. That defense would have been available to the defendant against the payee had he sought to recover on the note, and, of course, might have been pleaded against the plaintiff in this action. Such a defense, however, is deemed to be new matter, which must be specially pleaded, and cannot be established under a general denial. McCausland v. Ralston, 12 Nev. 195, 28 Am. Rep. 781; Ager v. Duncan, 50 Cal. 325; Sharon v. Sharon, 68 Cal. 29, 8 Pac. 614.

[8] The fact that Mootz was indebted to the corporation defendant in the sum of $500 at the time of the making of the note, if it had been coupled with an allegation of nonpayment at the time of the commencement of the action, would also have been a good defense, by way of set-off, against Mootz as the original payee of the note.

[9] Whether or not such a defense could have been pleaded against the plaintiff in this action need not be decided. The fact remains that it was not pleaded; and evidence merely of such pre-existing indebtedness was wholly immaterial to the issues and properly excluded by the trial court.

[10] The plaintiff upon direct examination testified that he gave a valuable consideration for the assignment to him of the note in question; and it is now contended on behalf of the defendant that the trial court erred in refusing to permit the witness to be cross-examined with reference to the nature and amount of the consideration so paid or given for the assignment of the note.

A promissory note imports a consideration; and, when duly indorsed, raises a presumption of title in the holder. Civ. Code, § 1614; Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 21. The plaintiff was not required to show the consideration given for the transfer of the note until the maker, under proper pleadings, had established the want, failure, or illegality of the consideration of the note itself. Jordan v. Grover, 99 Cal. 195, 33 Pac. 889; Graham v. Larimer, 83 Cal. 178, 23 Pac. 286; Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 262, 35 Pac. 873; Sharon v. Sharon, 68 Cal. 29, 8 Pac. 614; Sinkler v. Siljan, 136 Cal. 361, 68 Pac. 1024.

Upon proof of the execution of the note, its indorsement to plaintiff before maturity, and his possession of it, he established a prima facie case, which, in the absence of pleadings impeaching the validity of the consideration for the note itself, made his testimony upon the subject of the consideration given for its indorsement to him wholly unnecessary and immaterial, and therefore the ruling of the trial court, restricting the cross-examination of the plaintiff in the particulars under discussion was correct.

To avoid any misapprehension upon the subject we will say that if the defendant, by adequate pleadings, had impeached the consideration of the note, the burden of proving a bona fide consideration for its indorsement to plaintiff, and want of notice on the part of the plaintiff of the manner of its execution, would shift to the plaintiff upon the defendant offering evidence which would tend to prove want, failure, or illegality of consideration at the inception of the note; and that if, in the presence of such an issue raised by proper pleadings, the plaintiff, in an attempt to anticipate the defense thus relied upon, had testified with respect to the consideration by him given for the indorsement of the note, the question objected to in the case at bar would have been legitimate cross-examination. Kenny v. Walker, 29 Or. 41, 44 Pac. 501; Maxwell v. Bolles, 28 Or. 1, 41 Pac. 661; Graham v. Larimer, 83 Cal. 173, 23 Pac. 286.

[11] It is insisted, however, by appellant that it should have been permitted, under the general issue raised by a mere denial of the plaintiff's ownership of the note, to show, by the cross-examination of the plaintiff and Mootz, the payee, that the note in truth and in fact belonged to Mootz, and not to Carver, the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, in an action upon a promissory note, must be the legal owner of the note, or his ownership must be of a character sufficient to protect the defendant from recovery against him in a subsequent action upon the same note. An answer which puts in issue the plaintiff's ownership of the instrument sued on presents a good defense, and makes it incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish his right to bring the action. It is not sufficient, however, to plead merely, as was done in the present case, that the note sued on is the property of another, and not of the plaintiff. There must be alleged, in addition, some matter or thing which would be a substantial defense against the person alleged to be the real owner of the note which could not be pleaded as a defense against the plaintiff as the prima facie legal owner of the note. Dyer v. Sebrell, 135 Cal. 597, 67 Pac. 1036.

As was said by Mr. Justice Shaw in the recent case of Ramboz v. Stansbury, 13 Cal. App. 652, 110 Pac. 473: "The general rule appears to be that, in the absence of mala fides, which is not claimed here, plaintiff's prima facie title by reason of possession is not subject to rebuttal so long as the maker is protected from further claim by the payment of the judgment."

The defendant in this case having failed to plead a valid defense against Mootz, the payee, which could not have been pleaded and proved against the plaintiff, and as it is apparent that the judgment rendered for the plaintiff on the note will protect the defendant from any further possible claims of Mootz, arising out of the transaction, it was immaterial, either upon cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, or in the development of defendant's case in rebuttal, to know who was the real or bona fide owner of the note.

Appellant's discussion of the point that the note sued on was made, executed, and delivered by the president of the corporation defendant in excess of his authority and without the sanction of the corporation, involves the sufficiency of the evidence to support the trial court's finding that the note was in fact executed and delivered, for a valuable consideration, by and with the sanction of the defendant. This point, however, cannot be considered. The appeal from the judgment in the case at bar was taken more than 60 days from the rendition of the judgment, and therefore the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the trial court's findings of fact cannot be questioned upon an appeal from the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 939; Gilbert v. Kelly, 138 Cal. 690, 72 Pac. 344; Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs, 138 Cal. 726, 72 Pac. 352.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: HALL, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

FORD v. SUPERIOR COURT FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 1,052.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 15, 1911.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 61*)—SUBJECT OF RELIEF—DISMISSAL OF INDICTMENT.

Where an accused's right to a dismissal of the indictment for delay in bringing him to trial has been denied, he may enforce it by mandamus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 125; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 576*)—TIME OF TRIAL—DISCHARGE OF ACCUSED FOR DELAY.

Under Const. art. 1, § 13, guaranteeing to accused the right to a speedy and public trial, and Pen. Code, § 1382, providing that the court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed if a defendant whose trial has not been postponed on his application be not tried within 60 days after the filing of the indictment or information, an accused, whether confined or on bail, must, in the absence of justification, be brought to trial within that time, or the prosecution must be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1297–1304; Dec. Dig. § 576.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 576*)—TIME OF TRIAL—DISCHARGE OF ACCUSED FOR DELAY—CAUSE OF DELAY.

Over accused's objection the trial, upon indictments charging him with bribery, was postponed nearly three years. These continuances which were for the absence of one witness were had at the request of the state, and mostly over the objection of accused. The missing witness had testified in previous bribery cases against accused, but had left the state intending to remain away as long as these prosecutions were continued, and the state made no showing that he would return other than that he owned property in the state and had relatives there. Held that, as continuances for the absence of a witness may be granted only by a showing that the witness is material and essential that the party applying has been guilty of no neglect, and that the witness can be had at the time to which the trial has been deferred, these continuances were improperly granted, for it appeared that the witness openly left the state, and, though the trial was but a few days distant, he was not under subpœna, and that he declared his intention not to return until the prosecutions had been ended, and hence the granting of such continuances was not a good justification for denying accused the right to a speedy trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1297–1304; Dec. Dig. § 576.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 594*)—CONTINUANCE—GROUND FOR ABSENCE OF WITNESS.

It is ample justification for continuances asked by the state for the absence of a witness that accused has aided and abetted such witness to leave the jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 594.*]

Garret McEnerney, A. A. Moore, and Stanley Moore, for petitioner. Fred L. Berry, Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This is an application for a peremptory writ of mandate directed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and to Hon. William P. Lawlor, judge thereof, requiring and commanding the dismissal of 14 indictments for felony pending against petitioner in said superior court since May 25, 1907, and which it is claimed were continued for trial from time to time for more than 60 days after the filing of said indictments without good cause and over the protest of the petitioner. The petition for the writ was in the first instance presented to the Supreme Court of this state, and by that court transferred to this court for hearing and determination. On July 16, 1911, an alternative writ of mandate issued out of this court directed to respondents, requiring the dismissal of said indictments, or that cause be shown here on July 24th following why the same had not been dismissed. On the last-named day the said matter came on for hearing, and, after argument by the respective counsel for the petitioner and respondents, the cause was submitted for decision upon the facts stated in the petition and respondents' return to the alternative writ of mandate.

[1] No question arises, nor can arise, here as to the right of the petitioner to invoke the remedy of mandamus if the facts pleaded and admitted to be true required as a matter of law the dismissal of the indictments by the lower court. That question was determined in petitioner's favor by the Supreme Court of this state sitting in banc upon his recent application to that court for a writ of habeas corpus. In re Ford (Sup.) Crim. No. 1611, 116 Pac. 757. Upon the record before us the only question to be decided is the sufficiency of the showing made here in justification of the lower court's refusal to grant petitioner's several motions to dismiss said indictments.

[2] It is the established constitutional and statutory rule of law in this state that every man accused of crime by indictment or information must be brought to trial, unless good cause for delay be shown, within 60 days after the finding and filing of such information or indictment. The rule in this behalf was first declared in Ex parte Vinton, 47 Pac. 1019,[1] and was affirmed in People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 892, where our Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Works, said: "A party charged with crime has the constitutional right to a speedy trial, and the court has no discretionary power to deny him a right so important, or to prolong his imprisonment without such trial beyond the time provided by law. The statute is imperative. The court, unless good cause be shown to the contrary, must order the prosecution to be dismissed. Here no cause for delay was shown. It was enough for the defendant to show that the time fixed by the statute after information filed had expired, and that the case had not been postponed on his application. If there was any good cause for holding him for a longer time without a trial, it was for the prosecution to show it." The limit of time beyond which the trial of a person charged with crime cannot be extended without violating the constitutional guaranty of a speedy trial is fixed by section 1382 of the Penal Code of this state, which provides: "The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: (1) When a person has been held to answer for a public offense, if an indictment is not found or an information filed against him, within thirty days thereafter. (2) If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information." The relation which this section bears to the constitutional provision is clearly defined in the course of an opinion written by Mr. Justice Temple, wherein it is said: "The statute is a construction of the constitutional provision so far as to indicate what is a reasonable time within which the case should be brought to trial in order that the constitutional guaranty may be kept; and it may be fairly interpreted to mean that this guaranty is violated whenever 60 days is allowed to elapse without a trial, there being no good reason for delay and the defendant not consenting thereto. * * * It is sufficient for the defendant, in order to make out his case upon a motion for a dismissal in the trial court, to show that he has been detained without a trial for more than 60 days. Upon such showing the court should dismiss the case unless good cause for detaining the defendant and for continuing the prosecution is shown on behalf of the people. There is no presumption in such case, at least in the trial court, that the court has acted regularly, or that good cause in fact exists. It is well to remember that this case involves fundamental rights, and is of universal interest. Around those rights the English have waged their great battle for liberty. Without the narration of the conflicts to which they have given rise the history of the English people would be a dull affair. The right of the government with reference to persons accused of crime has been, and is yet, a matter of grave consideration. It led to the agitation which wrung from power the Great Charter, the Petition of Right, and the habeas corpus act. All the great achievements in favor of individual liberty of which the English people are so justly proud may be said to have come through contests over the rights of persons imprisoned for supposed crime." Ex parte Begerow, 133 Cal. 349, 65 Pac. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178.

The wisdom and justice of the constitutional provision and the statutory enactment in aid thereof, which guarantee to every man accused of crime a trial within 60 days after the filing of an indictment or information, have never been successfully disputed. Since the Vinton Case, supra, our Supreme Court has rigidly adhered to and applied the rule in every case that has come before it; and, if ever there was any doubt as to what the duty of a trial judge is with reference to granting to a defendant a trial within the prescribed 60 days, whether the defendant be in jail or at liberty on bail, that doubt must be dispelled by the Supreme Court's most recent, as well as its very clear, comprehensive and emphatic exposition of the rule which is found in the case of In re Ford, supra, where, in an opinion concurred in by the six justices constituting the two departments of that court, it was said: "The Constitution of this state guarantees to every person charged with crime the right to a speedy and public trial (Const. art. 1, § 13). In order to prescribe with definiteness what should constitute a reasonable time under the constitutional mandate, it is declared in the Penal Code that, unless good cause is shown to the contrary, a prosecution must be dismissed against a defendant when an indictment or information has not been filed against him within 30 days after he was committed to answer, or he is not brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the indictment or information against him, and the trial had not been postponed on his application. Pen. Code, § 1382. The effect of the last portion of the Code provision is to imperatively fix the time as 60 days within which, under the constitutional guaranty, a defendant must be brought to trial, and to declare that the guaranty is violated and the defendant entitled to a dismissal of the indictment against him when he is not brought to trial within said 60 days after it is filed, unless good cause for not doing so is shown, or the postponement of his trial beyond that period is made on his application."

With the law undisputed, and the fact admitted that over the continued protest and demand of petitioner, all of the indictments remaining against him have been continued without trial for nearly two years, there remains to be considered and decided only the question of the sufficiency of the justification offered by the trial court for its action in this regard.

[3] The return of the Honorable William P. Lawlor to the alternative writ of mandate concedes the facts stated in the petition for the writ to be true, and then, in response to the command of the writ that cause be shown why the indictments have not been dismissed, declares (1) that the petitioner has been at large upon bail, and therefore has not suffered by reason of the delay; (2) that the refusal to dismiss the indictments "was with good cause and in the exercise of sound discretion upon good and sufficient showing duly made in the premises"; and (3) "that it appears directly and by inference upon the record herein that James L. Gallagher is an indispensable witness in the above entitled cause and to the trial thereof; that he is now and for more than 19 months last past has been absent from the state of California; that the record discloses the fact that San Francisco, Cal., is the home of said witness; that he was absent, traveling in foreign countries; that his residence has been in California for many years last past; that he has many property interests in the state of California; that many of his relatives and members of his immediate family reside in San Francisco, Cal., and that by inference in all likelihood he will return to said jurisdiction." It will be noted, in passing, that no showing or suggestion is made as to when, if ever, the absent witness will return to this jurisdiction. The first response involves, in effect, the proposition that the constitutional guaranty of a speedy trial does not apply to a defendant who is fortunate enough to secure bail. This proposition has been fully and finally disposed of in Re Ford, supra, and requires no further consideration here. The second and third responses are so clearly interwoven that they must be taken and considered together. The mere statement that a trial was refused for "good cause and in the exercise of a sound discretion" is meaningless, unless it be construed in connection with the facts relied upon to support the assertion that the cause is good and the discretion sound.

Those facts, as revealed by the record before us, are in substance as follows: On May 25, 1907, 14 indictments were found and filed against the petitioner herein, charging him with the crime of bribery. Subsequently, on March 26, 1908, three more indictments charging an offer to bribe were returned and filed against the petitioner. One of these latter indictments was dismissed by the trial court, for the reason that it involved the same subject-matter of another indictment upon which the petitioner had been previously tried and acquitted. All of the indictments arose out of a single transaction in which it was charged the petitioner had bribed or offered to bribe various members of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco for the purpose of securing to the United Railroads, a corporation, the grant of an overhead trolley franchise. Petitioner was tried three times upon one or another of the first batch of indictments. The first trial, which was had within a week of his plea of not guilty, resulted in a disagreement of the jury; and upon the two remaining trials petitioner was by the verdict of the jury declared not guilty of the crimes charged against him. The second trial of petitioner was commenced within two weeks after the conclusion of the first trial, and was ended on the 3d day of December, 1907. The third and last trial of petitioner was commenced on the 9th day of April, and ended on the 2d day of May, 1908; and he has not been brought to trial since upon any of the indictments pending against him. During the three years which have intervened since the last trial of petitioner no effort has been made to bring him to trial upon any one of the remaining indictments; and in those three years the records of the trial court show some 56 continuances from time to time of all of said indictments. These continuances were in each instance granted at the request of the people over the objection of the petitioner and in the face of his repeated demands for a speedy trial and disposition of the charges. Upon more than 40 different occasions from the 1st day of February, 1908, to the 25th day of April, 1909, petitioner answered that he was ready for trial, and upon each occasion objected to the continuances which upon each occasion were ordered by the trial court. However, from June 25, 1909, to January 10, 1910, petitioner for various reasons, not necessary to be stated here, consented to continuances from time to time and up to and including the 10th day of January. From this date on to the 25th day of April, 1910, petitioner, upon every occasion when the cases against him were called, repeatedly and consistently demanded a trial and protested against any further continuances. On April 25, 1910, petitioner moved the trial court to dismiss all of the indictments upon the ground that a trial on each of said indictments had been denied him without good cause and against his protest for more than 60 days from the date of the filing of said indictments. The judge of the lower court refused to decide petitioner's several motions for a dismissal, and kept them undecided for more than 400 days without any suggestion or intimation that any effort would ever be made to bring petitioner to trial upon any of the indictments. The lower court justified its refusal to grant petitioner's motions to dismiss, or to give him a speedy trial upon all or any one of the remaining indictments, solely upon the ground of the absence from the state of the witness James L. Gallagher, who had testified as a witness for the people in the three trials already had.

The record before us contains evidence which tends to show that, notwithstanding the fact that all of the 14 indictments remaining against petitioner had been set down for trial on the calendar of the lower court for November 29, 1909, Gallagher, an indispensable witness for the people, departed from the state of California on November 26, 1909. This witness was not, either at the time of his departure or at any time prior thereto, under subpœna or order of the trial court to appear as a witness upon behalf of the people. Upon an investigation instituted by the trial court upon its own motion it was ascertained that Gallagher had left the state if not openly, at least without concealment of his intention. It was shown that he had openly and freely visited ticket offices inquiring about railroad and steamship transportation; that several days prior to his departure he called upon his relatives and friends to bid them good-bye. He declared that it was his intention to make an extended tour of Europe; that he was not under the process of the court; that the time within which he himself could have been indicted for complicity in the crime charged against petitioner had expired; that there was no reason for his staying in San Francisco any longer, and that he was "not coming back until the whole thing blows over." Gallagher, in fact, did go to New York, and from there to Europe. He has never since returned to this jurisdiction; and it is not pretended by respondents that any one knows when, if ever, he will return. Months afterwards it was shown in a supplemental inquiry that Gallagher was in Vancouver, British Columbia, and in letters written to his brother in San Francisco declared that he did not know when, if ever, he would return to California. These facts are not denied in the return filed in this court to the alternative writ of mandate; and upon the hearing of the writ it was, upon behalf of the respondents, admitted that "the facts as stated both in argument and in the appendix, consisting of two volumes (containing some three hundred and forty-eight pages of printed matter) which have been filed herein and made a part of petitioner's petition, are correct in detail."

In the face of this unquestioned and undisputed showing it is difficult, if not impossible, to conceive a plausible theory in support of respondents' contention that the trial of petitioner's cases was continued for good cause and in the exercise of a sound discretion. None has been suggested by respondents, because, as we apprehend, none could be suggested which would meet with the sanction of the settled and well-known rule of law by which a trial court must be guided and governed in granting or refusing the postponement of a trial because of the absence of a witness for either party. The fundamentals of the rule are to be found in the early English case of The King v. d'Eon, decided in the year 1764, and reported in volume 1 of Blackstone's Reports, at page 510. In that case it was declared by Lord Chief Justice Mansfield that: "Three things are necessary to put off a trial: First, that the witness is really material and appears to the court to be so; secondly, that the party who applies has been guilty of no neglect; and, thirdly, that the witness can be had at the time to which the trial has been deferred." To this need only be added that a showing made in support of an application for a continuance by either party in a civil or criminal case must contain a definite statement of facts from which it may be reasonably inferred that the absent witness will return or can be brought back to the jurisdiction within such time as to prevent an unreasonable delay in the trial of the case and be available as a witness at the time to which the continuance is ordered. As a matter of course, the rule is applied with ever increasing rigidity where repeated continuances are asked for and in such a case a stronger showing of diligence and certainty is required in support of each successive application.

This continues to the present day, and justly so, to be the accepted rule of law in this and every other jurisdiction, where, in the absence of statutory regulation, the common law of England is recognized and revered. It would be a piling of argument upon argument and a waste of time and space to quote from the authorities which establish and sustain the doctrine here announced upon the authority of The King v. d'Eon, supra. There is no conflict of authority upon the proposition, and the cases dealing with the subject are numerous, among which may be cited the following: Frank v. Brady, 8 Cal. 47; People v. Francis, 38 Cal. 183; People v. Ashnauer, 47 Cal. 98; People v. Leyshon, 108 Cal. 440, 41 Pac. 480; State v. Phillips, 18 S. D. 1, 98 N. W. 171; State v. Miller, 63 Kan. 62, 64 Pac. 1033; Ferrell v. Com. (Ky.) 127 S. W. 162; Power v. State, 8 Ga. App. 408, 69 S. E. 315; Adams v. State, 56 Fla. 1, 48 South. 220; State v. Finch, 54 Or. 482, 103 Pac. 505; Vance v. Territory, 3 Okl. Cr. 208, 105 Pac. 307; Ex parte Tittel, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 597, 40 S. W. 598; State v. Olds, 217 Mo. 305, 116 S. W. 1080; Moffit v. Chicago Chronicle Co., 107 Iowa, 407, 78 N. W. 45. The showing made here by the respondents meets the requirements of the rule referred to in the one particular only that the testimony of the absent witness is material and indispensable.

As to the second requirement, it affirmatively appears that the state was not free from neglect, in this: that the witness was not at the time of his departure, nor at any time prior thereto, under the subpœna or order of the trial court. By its neglect in this respect the state failed to avail itself of the power which it had at its command to compel the attendance of the witness at any future trial of the petitioner.

As to the third requirement, it appears that the witness, taking advantage of the situation, as might be expected of any man in his predicament, placed himself without the jurisdiction of the court and beyond all reach of process. The facts of this case do not warrant the "inference that in all likelihood he will return," but, if such an inference could be fairly deduced from any of the circumstances surrounding the departure of the witness, it would be immediately met and overcome by his expressed intention that, if he ever returned to this jurisdiction, it would not be at a time when he could be compelled to attend and testify in any of the cases pending against petitioner. However that may be, it is certain that no such remote inference as is here relied upon will suffice as a showing o' good cause for the indefinite postponement of the trial of a criminal case. It concerns the public that there should be an end of litigation in criminal as well as in civil cases, and the law will not tolerate the repeated and never-ending postponement of a trial upon the vague hypothesis that perhaps at some indefinite time in the future a fugitive witness may return to the jurisdiction, and thus be available as a witness in the case.

[4] Of course, underlying all that has been said is the familiar maxim of jurisprudence that "no one can take advantage of his own wrong"; and a showing that the absence of an adverse witness was instigated, or knowingly aided and abetted, by a defendant would be ample justification for prolonged, if not indefinite continuances, in aid of a bona fide attempt to apprehend a defaulting witness which in all likelihood will result in his return to the jurisdiction of the court. No such showing, however, has been made or even suggested here. So clear is the right of the petitioner upon the law and the facts to the relief which he seeks that to deny it would be a deliberate defiance of the plain mandate of the law and a manifest misuse of judicial power.

It is therefore ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue out of and under the seal of this court to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and to the Honorable William P. Lawlor, judge thereof, commanding and directing that all of the fourteen indictments pending against Tirey L. Ford, the petitioner herein, be forthwith dismissed.

ABBOTT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. MULLALLY v. SAME. CALHOUN v. SAME. (Civ. 1,057, 1,056, 1,055.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 15, 1911.)

Petitions by William M. Abbott, Thornwell Mullally, and Patrick Calhoun for a writ of mandamus directed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and others, requiring the dismissal of certain indictments against the different petitioners. Petitions granted.

Garret McEnerney, A. A. Moore, and Stanley Moore, for petitioners. Fred L. Berry, Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. The respective petitions of William M. Abbott, Thornwell Mullally, and Patrick Calhoun for a writ of mandate directed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, requiring a dismissal of certain indictments for felony pending in said court against petitioners, were submitted for decision with the case of Tirey L. Ford this day decided.

In point of law and fact the cases are practically identical. The differences are nonessential. In the case of Patrick Calhoun he was once tried. In the cases of the other petitioners they were never given even a single trial. For the reasons stated in the case of Tirey L. Ford v. Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco et al. (No. 1,052) 118 Pac. 96, the prayer of each petitioner is granted, and it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue out of this court and under the seal thereof, directed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and to the Honorable Wm. P. Lawlor, judge thereof, directing and commanding the dismissal of all the indictments pending against these petitioners and each of them.

SOUTH YUBA WATER CO. v. CITY OF AUBURN. (Civ. 705.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 8, 1911.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 269*)—IRRIGATION DITCHES—CULVERTS—AUTHORITY TO CONSTRUCT.

Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 269, § 862, cl. 4), giving to municipal corporations power to establish, build, and repair bridges, to lay out, alter, keep open, improve, and repair streets and other public highways and places within the city, and to construct gutters, culverts, etc., authorizes a city to construct a culvert over a private water canal, unless forbidden by some other act of the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 168*)—PRIVATE DITCHES—BRIDGES IN CITY—DUTY TO CONSTRUCT.

Civ. Code, § 551, requiring every water or canal corporation to construct and keep in good repair all bridges across their canal that the board of supervisors of the county where such canal is situated may require, etc., does not require such companies to construct culverts to carry streets established subsequent to the construction of the canal over the same; the duty to construct such culverts being on the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 870*)—APPEAL ON JUDGMENT ROLL—SCOPE OF REVIEW—ORDER REFUSING TO STRIKE OUT PARTS OF PLEADINGS.

Since Code Civ. Proc. § 670, making orders striking out any pleading, in whole or in part, part of the judgment roll, does not include orders refusing to strike out, such an order is not reviewable on appeal on the judgment roll alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 870.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 1002*) — CLAIMS—PRESENTATION—INTEREST.

Since no part of a claim against a city could be paid, except on presentation for allowance by the board of trustees, as required by Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 271), § 864, interest could not be recovered on any part of a claim prior to such presentation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by the South Yuba Water Company against the City of Auburn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Lowell, for appellant. John M. Fulweiler, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover the agreed price for the construction of a concrete culvert at the crossing of the street known as Railroad street over plaintiff's canal. The cause was tried by the court, and plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant appeals on the judgment roll.

The court found the averments of the complaint to be true, and the affirmative averments of the answer to be untrue. We have, therefore, only the sufficiency of the complaint to deal with, for it constitutes the findings of the court. The sole question is, Do the findings support the judgment?

It is found: That plaintiff is a duly organized corporation, owning and operating that certain ditch or canal formerly known as the Bear River and Auburn Ditch, and now called the South Yuba Water Company's canal; that said canal was constructed during the years 1850 and 1851, and conveyed the waters of Bear creek from a point near Colfax, Placer county, to and past the town, now city, of Auburn, carrying waters to the westerly portion of said county, and disposing of the same for mining, agricultural, irrigation, and other enumerated purposes, and ever since the years 1850 and 1851 plaintiff and its predecessors have continuously owned and used said canal and said water for said purposes; that the city of Auburn is a city of the sixth class, and was so created in the year 1887; that about the year 1865, and prior to the incorporation of said city of Auburn, there was a traveled road, now called Railroad street, in said city, which said road crossed the said canal of plaintiff about where said street now crosses said canal, across which the county of Placer, by its duly constituted authorities, constructed and maintained a bridge until the incorporation of said city, since which time the said city has maintained and repaired said bridge; that, in the year 1907, the said bridge became out of repair and required rebuilding, and the said city, by its duly constituted authorities, advertised for bids for replacing said bridge by means of a reinforced concrete culvert on said Railroad street and across the same; that bids were presented by plaintiff and others, and the work let, under proper resolution authorizing the same, to plaintiff, and upon terms and conditions set forth in a written contract, which is fully set forth in the complaint, by which the city agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $660 for said work, 75 per cent. of said sum upon the completion of the said culvert, and 25 per cent. thereof 35 days after said completion and acceptance; and the said city agreed "to pay the said contractor the said sum of $660 for the said work at the time and in the manner hereinbefore provided"; that "thereafter and by the month of June, 1907, plaintiff fully performed each and all of its agreements and obligations as set out in said contract, * * * and the defendant accepted the same, and has ever since used the same for the uses and purposes of said city of Auburn and of its inhabitants"; that "thereafter, to wit, on or about the 2d day of September, 1907, the plaintiff duly presented to the said city board of trustees its claim against said city of Auburn, for said work done under said contract, being for the sum of $660, due and payable and unpaid plaintiff by said city of Auburn" for said work, and pursuant to said contract and acceptance by said city; that said city "delayed and neglected from time to time to act upon said claim of plaintiff * * * until the 1st day of June, 1908," and on that date rejected and refused to pay the said claim of plaintiff, without any just cause or excuse; that said claim is still due and owing and unpaid "since about June 1, 1907." The prayer is for the full amount of $660, "with legal interest thereon from the 1st day of June, 1907, and for costs of suit."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The court gave judgment for the amount claimed, with legal interest from June 1, 1907.

It thus appears that plaintiff's canal was constructed long prior to the establishment of the county highway, in the year 1865, which afterwards, in 1887, became one of the streets of defendant city; that the county built and maintained the bridge over the canal up to the time jurisdiction over the street passed to the city of Auburn, since which time the latter has maintained and cared for the bridge; that a necessity arose for repairing or replacing the bridge by a more substantial structure, and the defendant decided on building a concrete culvert, in pursuance of which it advertised for proposals and let the contract to plaintiff; that the work was duly completed and accepted, but, for some unexplained reason, the defendant refused to pay the price agreed upon, or to pay at all. Hence this action.

[1] That the defendant was authorized by its charter to enter into such a contract, unless forbidden by some act of the Legislature, we think clearly appears from the provisions of the municipal corporation act. The corporation is given power: "To establish, build and repair bridges; to lay out, alter, keep open, improve and repair streets and other public highways and places within the city * * * and to construct gutters, culverts * * * and control all such highways and places and to expend in their discretion the ordinary income and revenue of the municipality in the payment of the cost and expenses of the whole or any part of such work or improvement." Section 862, cl. 4, Stats. of 1883, pp. 93, 269.

[2] But it is claimed that, under the provisions of section 551 of the Civil Code, it became the duty of plaintiff to build and maintain all bridges required at road crossings over its canal; and hence the defendant was unauthorized to incur the expense of the structure. When this case was first under submission, there was a question, not then finally determined, whether canal owners were required to build and maintain bridges over their ditches or canals at crossings of highways laid out and established after the construction of such ditches or canals. The point has been before the Supreme Court in a recent case (City of Madera v. Madera Canal & Irrigation Co., 115 Pac. 936). The question was thoroughly considered, and the court held that, where municipalities lay out or establish a street or highway which crosses a canal or ditch previously constructed by its owner, the duty of erecting the necessary bridge at such crossing devolves upon the municipality, and that section 551 of the Civil Code imposes no duty on the owner of the canal or ditch to construct the crossing. This case seems to be decisive of the point on which appellant relies, and adversely to its contention.

[3] Appellant complains that it was error for the court to deny its motion to strike out certain portions of the complaint. Motions to strike out parts of pleadings and the order denying the same formerly constituted no part of the judgment roll. Sutton v. Stephan, 101 Cal. 545, 36 Pac. 106; Mock v. City of Santa Rosa, 126 Cal. 330, 58 Pac. 826. Section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended in 1907, making "all orders striking out any pleading in whole or in part" part of the judgment roll. But the amendment does not include orders refusing to strike out.

[4] Appellant also contends that the findings do not support the judgment for interest prior to the date of the presentation of the claim for payment, which was September 2, 1907. The finding is that on that date plaintiff presented its claim for $660, and no more. The contract was completed "by the month of June, 1907," which could not mean an earlier date than June 1st, and the evidence probably so showed. The contract provided that 75 per cent. was payable on completion of the contract, but the remaining 25 per cent. was made payable "35 days after its completion." Interest was certainly not allowable on this 25 per cent. from June 1st. But no part of the claim could be paid, except upon its presentation in due form for allowance by the board of trustees. Stats. 1883, p. 271, § 864. This was not done until September 2, 1907, and the board had no opportunity prior to that date to approve or reject the demand. It seems to us that interest should not have been allowed from any earlier date.

The judgment is modified so as to allow legal interest on the contract price for the work from September 2, 1907, and, as thus modified, is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA PORTLAND CEMENT CO. et al. v. WENTWORTH HOTEL CO. et al. (Civ. 922.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 28, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 25, 1911.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 931*) — Presumptions — Findings — Sufficiency of Evidence in Support.

In an appeal on the judgment roll alone, the court will assume that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the findings below.

2. Appeal and Error (§ 1039*)—Harmless Error—Pleadings—Variance.

Code Civ. Proc. § 469, provides that no variance shall be material unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits, and section 470 provides that, where the variance is not material, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, or may order an immediate amendment. The complaint in an action against the assignee in insolvency of a hotel company to establish a mechanic's lien alleged that the person with whom the contract for materials was made was an original contractor acting under an unrecorded contract, while the findings showed that such person's contract with the hotel company was one creating an agency in him by which he represented the hotel company in the purchase of materials, etc. Held, that as the trial court ordered no amendment to the complaint, and as the proof did not establish any entirely different cause of action, the variance could not reasonably have misled the assignee to his prejudice, and that the finding or conclusion of the trial court would be sustained.

3. Appeal and Error (§ 197*)—Objections—Pleading—Variance.

Where a party desires to raise a question as to any variance between the pleading and the proof, such objection must be presented in the trial court, otherwise it is waived.

4. Mechanics' Liens (§ 48*)—Right to Lien —Material Furnished But Not Used.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1200, which provides that in case a contractor fails to perform his contract in full, or abandons it before completion, persons other than the contractor who have delivered material on the ground shall have a lien therefor, does not apply to a case where the work is abandoned by the owner, and in such case persons who have delivered material on the ground to be used in the building, but which has not been actually used in its construction, have no right to liens, and the fact that some of the material was manufactured especially for use in the building does not affect the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

5. Mechanics' Liens (§ 277*)—Pleading—Variance Between Claim and Proof—Statutory Provisions.

An elevator company under contract to furnish and install elevators in a hotel for $6,875 deducted $340 from the contract price upon information as to a change in the owner's building plans, and installed elevators in the hotel as finished, with machinery, ready for operation, but in its notice or claim of lien, and in one count of its action to enforce its lien, it recited full performance of the contract, and claimed the original contract price to be due. Held that, as there was a substantial completion of the contract to furnish and install the elevators, there was no such variance as would defeat the claimant's right to a lien therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 546–554; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

6. Mechanics' Liens (§ 157*)—Proceedings to Perfect—Claim of Lien—Effect of Defects.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1202, provides that any person who shall willfully include in his claim filed under section 1187 work or materials not performed upon or furnished for the property described in the claim shall forfeit the lien. An elevator company under contract to furnish and install elevators in a hotel building for $6,875 filed a claim or statement of lien in which a deduction of $340, made during the work, was not offset against the contract price which was claimed to be due. Held that, as the amount of offset was such a small part of the whole contract price agreed to be paid, failure to credit it would not deprive it of its lien.

7. Mechanics' Liens (§§ 5, 157*)—Construction of Lien Law in General—Error in Claim or Statement.

The lien law is a remedial statute, and should be liberally construed to effect its object, and its requirements as to notices to be given regard substance rather than form, but Code Civ. Proc. § 1202, providing for a forfeiture of lien for willfully including work or materials not performed upon, or furnished for, the property is penal, and will be strictly construed, and the evidence must be clear that a violation was willful before claimant's right to a lien will be denied.

8. Mechanics' Liens (§ 74*)—Contract or Consent of Owner—Filing Contract for Elevators.

A contract for the furnishing and installation of elevators in a hotel building then under construction is not a contract for construction work, but rather for furnishing material, so that the elevator company is a materialman, and not an original contractor, and hence the statute requiring that building contracts providing for the payment of more than $1,000 shall be recorded does not apply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 109, 110; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

9. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 277*)—ENFORCEMENT —ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE.

An electrical contractor whose work upon a hotel was to be paid for according to the amount done filed a notice of lien, setting forth his completion of the work according to the contract and containing the recitals required by statute, and in a proceeding to enforce the lien the allegation of acceptance as completed was not denied, though, in fact, the owner had stopped work at the fourth story, instead of completing six stories as planned, though the electrical contractor was in no default. Held that, as it was not strictly incorrect to say that the work had been completed, there was no such variance between the recitals in the notice and the proof as would defeat his claim to a lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 546–554; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

10. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 33*)—RIGHT TO LIEN—IMPROVEMENTS OUTSIDE OF BUILDING—PLANTS AND TREES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, which provides that any person who, at the request of the owner of any lot in any incorporated city or town, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, has a lien upon said lot for his work and materials, the furnishing and planting of seeds, trees, and shrubs, and the caring for them long enough to insure that they were well started, and settled in the ground, is an improvement to real estate, which entitles the party furnishing and caring for them to a lien therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 32, 33, 38; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

11. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 74*)—OWNERS—CONTRACT—FILING OF CONTRACT—ROOFING AND TILING CONTRACT.

A contract to furnish roofing laid in asphalt pitch on a concrete surface for a hotel building, and a contract to furnish and set roofing tile, are not contracts for construction work, but are contracts for materials, to which the statute which requires contracts providing for the payment of more than $1,000 to be recorded does not apply.

12. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 48*)—RIGHT TO LIEN—MATERIAL INCORPORATED IN WORK BUT NOT REQUIRED—WINDOWS AND DOORS.

One who furnishes screens for windows and doors of a hotel building, and fits them and actually puts them in place, so that they are held by the grooves in which they run or the hinges by which they are fastened, is entitled to a lien therefor as for material used in construction, although, when the construction was abandoned at the fourth story instead of completing six stories as planned, they were taken out and stacked on the fourth floor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

13. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 139*)—PERFECTING LIEN—NOTICE OR STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

Where a lather engaged in work upon a hotel at a day rate has been paid for his work upon the hotel building, it is a correct statement to set forth the time engaged upon a garage connected with the hotel and the amount due therefor, without showing the whole amount earned while at work upon the hotel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 234–236; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

14. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 281*)—ENFORCEMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien for furnishing plastering material for the construction of a hotel held to sustain a finding as to the amount due in accordance with the allegation of the complaint that no specific price was agreed on.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Dec. Dig. § 281.*]

15. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 231*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—FAILURE TO MAKE EXCEPTIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 648, which requires that an exception to a judgment for insufficiency of the evidence shall specify the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient, an appellant whose bill of exceptions contains no specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence, and who made no motion for a new trial is not entitled to have the sufficiency of the evidence reviewed, since section 939, entitling appellant to have the judgment reviewed providing his appeal is taken within six months after the entry thereof, does not dispense with the general requirements affecting bills of exceptions where the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment is questioned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

16. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 204*)—ASSIGNMENT OF LIEN OR CLAIM—EFFECT AS TO LIEN NOT PERFECTED.

There can be no assignment made of a debt to be secured by the mechanics' lien law (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183–1203a) which will carry with it to the assignee the right to enforce a lien, where such assignment is made prior to the assignor's perfection of the lien.

17. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 74*)—OWNER'S CONSENT OR CONTRACT—FILING OF CONTRACT—LIGHTING FIXTURES.

A contract for $2,900 for the furnishing of special lighting fixtures and installing them in a hotel building, where the fixtures are made at the contractor's foundry and the work of installing them constitutes but a small part of the contract price, is a contract for the furnishing of materials to which the statute requiring certain contracts to be filed for record does not apply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 109, 110; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

18. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 31*)—RIGHT TO LIEN—MATERIALS—LIGHTING FIXTURES.

Lighting fixtures designed especially for use in a hotel building and made a part thereof by being regularly attached thereto are a necessary part of the completed hotel, and are material for which a lien is intended to be given by the Constitution and lien statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

19. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 132*)—PERFECTING—TIME TO FILE CLAIM—COMPLETION OF CONTRACT.

A building will be deemed completed, even though not in accordance with the plans and specifications, where the owner abandons the intent to make it a completed structure pending work upon it, and hence where a contractor furnished laundry machinery to a hotel building, but did not file his notice of lien until after the owner's notice that work upon the building had ceased, and that the building had been accepted by him, had been filed and recorded, the claim of lien was too late.

20. Mechanics' Liens (§ 142*)—Proceedings to Perfect—Notice—Defects.

For a materialman or contractor to perfect his lien, his notice or statement of claim must be substantially in statutory form, and must set forth a statement of the demand after deducting all just credits and offsets, the name of the owner, and a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract, and this requirement is not relaxed where the claimant is dealing directly with the owner, and where a notice of lien alleged that the contract price was to be paid in installments on the delivery of the material at various dates, whereas, in fact, prices were agreed upon for various parts of the material furnished and payment therefor was to be made on the 10th of each month for all material furnished during the preceding month, the statute was not complied with, since there was a misstatement as to the time of payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

21. Mechanics' Liens (§ 74*)—Contract or Consent of Owner—Filing—Carpentry or Joiner Work.

A contract which provides that contractors under the direction of the architect should perform and finish the entire carpentry and joinery required in the construction of a hotel building, and that the owner should pay to the contractor the net profits of the work, plus 5 per cent. as a compensation to the contractors for services, and that material ordered should be paid for upon presentation of a bill for it from the parties of whom it is purchased and upon certificate of the architect, is a contract for construction required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, to be in writing and recorded.

22. Mechanics' Liens (§ 73*)—Contract of Owner—Requisites of Contract—Stipulations as to Time of Payment.

Where a contract to furnish labor and material for a hotel building provided that the contractors should be paid 75 per cent as the work progressed, the balance of 25 per cent. "of their commissions" for purchasing, etc., and not 25 per cent. of the whole contract price, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, should be payable 35 days after final completion of the contract, it was void, and the contractor could have no right of lien.

JAMES, J. Various lien claimants who furnished lumber and materials for use in the construction of a large hotel building erected by the Wentworth Hotel Company at Oak Knoll, in the city of Pasadena, sought to foreclose liens in satisfaction of the indebtedness alleged to be owing to them. The building erected by the Wentworth Company was originally designed to be six stories in height. After four stories had been completed, it was decided by the owner to stop the work of construction, and thereupon the building was accepted as a completed structure. The several actions brought to foreclose liens were consolidated, and a trial was had, which resulted in judgments of foreclosure in favor of the plaintiffs and cross-complainants generally, except as to plaintiffs A. T. Hagan Company, Pacific Coast Planing Mill Company, and cross-complainant Yard & Hichborn, which latter were denied liens by the trial court. After the institution of the actions, the Wentworth Hotel Company was declared to be insolvent, and H. S. McKee was appointed as assignee of its estate. There are appeals taken by the Pacific Coast Planing Mill Company and Yard & Hichborn from the judgment and from orders denying their motions for new trial, and an appeal taken by the A. T. Hagan Company from the judgment. McKee, assignee in insolvency, took a general appeal from the judgment entered against the hotel company in favor of the successful claimants. The assignee, however, on his appeal has raised questions affecting the judgment as to only a certain number of the lien claimants.

The Warren & Bailey Manufacturing Company in their complaint alleged that the hotel company had entered into a contract with one Vesper, whereunder Vesper agreed to furnish labor and material for the construction of the hotel building, that the contract provided for the payment of more than the sum of $1,000, and that it had never been filed with the county recorder. The complaint further set out that plaintiffs furnished to Vesper material and labor for which the amount of $1,354.77 remained unpaid. The answer of the assignee denied the allegations of the complaint in general, but admitted that the contract between the hotel company and Vesper had not been recorded. In the findings of the court is set out in full the contract made between Vesper and the hotel company, from which it appears that Vesper was employed as the purchasing agent, and was not an original contractor. It is found that the labor and materials furnished by plaintiffs were furnished to Vesper for use in the hotel building, and that they were so used. The judgment awarded a lien to the plaintiffs. The points urged by the assignee as to this claim are that the findings do not sustain the judgment, and that the findings are not within the issues as made by the pleadings. The findings, we are satisfied, do sustain the judgment. While it is not found expressly that Vesper was acting as the agent of the hotel company in purchasing the labor and materials, it appears from the contract made between him and the former that such was his relation.

[1, 2] It is true, as insisted by appellant, that there was a variance between the allegations of the complaint and the findings of the court. If that variance was a material one within the definition as given in section 469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, then the judgment as to this claimant should be reversed. That section provides that no variance is to be deemed material, "unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Whenever it appears that a party has been so misled, the court may order the pleading to be amended, upon such terms as may be just." The variance here was only as to the character of the relationship established by the contract which was entered into between the hotel company and Vesper. The claimant pleaded in its complaint that Vesper was an original contractor acting under an unrecorded contract, while the findings of the court show that Vesper's contract with the hotel company was really one creating an agency in Vesper by which he represented his employer in the purchase of material et cetera. As this appeal is presented on the judgment roll alone, we must assume that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the findings of the court. It is not made to appear that any objection was offered to any evidence which was introduced, upon which the findings were made, on the ground that there was a variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof, and therefore we must assume that there was no such objection. And it does not appear from the record as it is presented to us that the variance was such as could reasonably have misled the appellant to his prejudice. Section 470 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "Where the variance is not material, as provided in the last section, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, or may order an immediate amendment, without costs." Evidently the trial court concluded that the variance was not material, for it was not ordered that the pleading be amended as is provided to be done by section 469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where a party has been misled by reliance upon allegations contained in a pleading which showed different facts from those established by the evidence. Of course, if the proof established an entirely different cause of action from that alleged in the complaint, then the variance would have been fatal. Such, however, was not the condition respecting the allegations and proof in this case, and we think that the conclusion of the trial court was correct, and should be sustained. Santa Monica L. & M. Co. v. Hege, 119 Cal. 376, 51 Pac. 555. [3] It may be added that it is an established rule of practice that, where a party desires to raise a question as to any variance shown between allegations in a pleading and the proof offered at the trial, such objection must be presented in the trial court; otherwise it is waived. Eversdon v. Mayhew, 85 Cal. 1, 21 Pac. 431, 24 Pac. 382. As we have suggested, it does not appear that objection was made to the evidence as introduced, which evidence we must assume was competent and sufficient to sustain the findings as made by the court.

[4] Several claimants were awarded liens for material which was placed upon the premises of the hotel company, but which did not actually enter into the construction of the building as the same was left at the time work ceased thereon. The court found in each of these cases that the material was furnished to be used in the building, and that it was necessary to the completion of the building in the manner and form it had originally been designed to be completed. The position of the assignee is that liens should not have been given, except for work or materials furnished to be used and which were actually used in and upon the hotel building. At the time the work was stopped, plumbing material of the value of $2,970.69, furnished by the George H. Tay Company, was unused, but remained upon the premises. The John Douglas Company had furnished toilet fixtures of large value, and there remained upon the premises unused of such materials at the time of the cessation of work a quantity thereof of the value of $1,810.38. The Carpenter & Biles Mill & Lumber Company had furnished doors, windows, etc., of special design manufactured for the hotel building, and of these a number, intended for use on the fifth floor of the building, remained unused upon the premises when the work ceased; the value of such unused materials and articles being found by the court to be the sum of $566.59. The court further found with respect to the last-mentioned unused materials that they had been primed and fitted to the openings in the fifth floor of the building, but had not been actually hung therein, but were stored in unfinished rooms of the fifth story of said building. It is contended on the part of respondents who were awarded liens for these unused materials that, as section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure recognizes the right of a materialman to a lien for materials unused, where the work has been abandoned by the contractor, such a right is intended to be given in the case of an abandonment by the owner. It may be said here that it is the law that the right of lien is not given a materialman ordinarily for materials furnished to be used in a structure, but which are in fact not used, even though they may have been diverted to other purposes beneficial to the owner of the ground and building. The courts of the different states, construing statutes very similar to ours in terms, do not, however, all agree in this conclusion. In those states where liens are held to attach in favor of the materialmen for material to be used in the construction of a building, even though such materials are not in fact incorporated into the structure, the consideration mainly kept in view and to which great weight is given is that the creditor has parted with his property upon the faith that the building to be erected and the ground upon which it is to stand will furnish security for the payment of his debt. The counter line of decisions, holding that such liens are given only where the materials have actually entered into and become a part of the structure, are reasoned out on a line of argument having as a basis the theory that liens of the variety mentioned are provided to be given upon the assumption that the property to which they are made to attach has been improved and its value enhanced by the labor bestowed or materials furnished; hence that, where such labor or materials do not actually enter into the structure, no lien results. To the latter effect are all of the California cases: Bottomly v. Rector et al. of Grace Church, 2 Cal. 90; Houghton v. Blake, 5 Cal. 240; Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307, 38 Am. Rep. 54; Silvester v. Coe Quartz M. Co., 80 Cal. 513, 22 Pac. 217; Bewick v. Muir, 83 Cal. 373, 23 Pac. 390; Hamilton v. Delhi Mining Co., 118 Cal. 148, 50 Pac. 378; Stimson Co. v. L. A. Traction Co., 141 Cal. 30, 74 Pac. 357. Unless section 1200, Code of Civil Procedure, furnishes authority in support of the judgment awarding liens for unused materials to the claimants hereinbefore mentioned, then, under the California decisions cited, such liens cannot be sustained. We do not think the provisions of this section are applicable to the conditions shown in these cases. That section is designed to provide a method whereby the extent of the liability of the owner under his building contract may be ascertained and fixed where the contractor abandons the work. It does in terms so provide, and it would be indeed a strained construction to read into it words to make it apply equally to a case where the owner voluntarily causes work to be stopped. It would not likely be insisted, in view of the decisions to which attention has been called, that if a man purchased lumber to be used in the erection of a certain building, and the lumber was placed upon the premises where it was intended the structure should be erected, and the purchaser then decided he would not build at all, that the seller would have a lien upon the real estate for the value of the materials so sold. Why a different conclusion should follow where the building was actually commenced, but abandoned by the owner at any later stage of the work, is not apparent to us. Nor does the fact that some of the materials were manufactured especially for use in the hotel building in our opinion affect these cases. They were not, in fact, so used; and each of the vendors of the materials was charged with the knowledge of the law which gave him no lien until his property had become merged into the structure, and each must be deemed to have contracted with that knowledge present in mind. Until materials furnished under conditions like those shown in these cases, therefore, are actually employed in some part of the structure, no right of lien exists on the part of the person furnishing such materials, but his right of action is a personal one against the owner.

account of labor and materials not used amounting to the value of $340. The president of the hotel company notified the elevator company that the work was to be stopped at the fourth story, and requested to be told what difference would be made in the cost of installing the elevators. He was advised that a deduction would be made in the amount above stated. In the notice of lien it was recited that the contract had been fully performed, and that the full amount agreed to be paid, to wit, $6,875, was owing thereon. Under these facts, it is contended that the variance between the statements contained in the notice of lien and the facts proved at the trial is fatal to the right of the elevator company to have a lien as security for its debt. Notices of lien must, in so far as they purport to set out matters made essential by the statute to be stated therein, be substantially true. It often happens, however, that the amount for which a claimant is given a lien is less than that stated in his notice, and it is not held that, because a claimant and the owner may differ as to the amount of money due under the contract, the claimant must, if he chooses to litigate that controversy, run the risk of losing his lien because he has overstated in his notice the amount which a court may finally determine to be due him. In this case the elevators furnished and installed by the Otis Elevator Company were completed machines and ready for operation. They were of the kind and character called for by the specifications. In order that the elevators might be made to operate to the additional stories, it only required that the guide rails be extended in length and the necessary supports furnished therefor. The expense of doing this was found by the court to amount to $340, and that amount was deducted from the contract price. No contention is made that the elevators were not complete and fully installed in the building as constructed. On this point counsel for the assignee in their brief say: "Appellant is not complaining of a failure on the part of respondent to complete its contract, but of a variance between the statement contained in its notice of lien and the proof as to completion." There was a substantial completion of the contract to furnish and install the elevators, the only real inaccuracy shown by the notice of lien consisting in the fact that credit for the sum of $340 on account of unused labor and materials was not set off against the contract price. In one count of its complaint the plaintiff alleged a cause of action for the full contract price agreed to be paid. In another count the facts were fully alleged showing the exact conditions which attended the furnishing and installing of the elevators.

[6] We do not think that the mere failure of the lien claimant to offset against the contract price the credit of $340 in the statement of its claim of lien, where it does not appear that its failure so to do amounted to a willful intent to assert that which the claimant knew to be false, should deprive it of its security which the law provides it may have for its debt, especially where the amount of offset is such a small part of the whole contract price as agreed to be paid. Section 1202, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "any person who shall willfully include in his claim filed under section one thousand one hundred and eighty-seven, work or materials not performed upon or furnished for the property described in the claim, shall forfeit his lien."

[7] It has been held that the provisions of this section are penal in character, and must be strictly construed, and that the evidence must be clear and convincing that a violation was willful and intentional before a court will take away the right of the claimant to a lien. Pacific Mutual L. I. Co. v. Fisher, 106 Cal. 224, 39 Pac. 758; Schallert-Ganahl L. Co. v. Neal, 91 Cal. 362, 27 Pac. 743. In Macomber v. Bigelow, 126 Cal. 9, 58 Pac. 312, referring there to an objection made that there was a variance between the evidence and complaints and claims of lien, the Supreme Court, quoting from McGinty v. Morgan, 122 Cal. 103, 54 Pac. 392, said: "The statute is a remedial statute, and, for the purpose of carrying into effect the object for which it was enacted, is to receive a liberal construction, and the notices which, under its provisions, are required to be given, have regard to substance rather than to form."

[8] The point is also made by the assignee, but not insisted upon with much vigor, that, as the contract for the furnishing of the elevators provided for the payment of more than the sum of $1,000 and was not recorded, it is void. This contract was not a contract properly to be termed one for the doing of construction work, but rather one for the furnishing of material, and the elevator company was a materialman rather than an original contractor. The statute requiring building contracts which provide for the payment of more than $1,000 to be recorded does not therefore apply. Hinckley v. Field's Biscuit Co., 91 Cal. 136, 27 Pac. 594; Roebling's S. Co. v. Humboldt Electric L. & P. Co., 112 Cal. 288, 44 Pac. 568; Bennett v. Davis, 113 Cal. 337, 45 Pac. 684, 54 Am. St. Rep. 354; Bryson v. McCone, 121 Cal. 153, 53 Pac. 637. We have examined carefully the very voluminous transcript filed in this case, which in the main sets out the pleadings of the parties to the several actions which were consolidated, and we fail to find that the assignee made any answer to the second amended complaint of the Otis Elevator Company. The second amended complaint appears in the transcript followed by a demurrer of the assignee to the said second amended complaint, but it neither appears that any answer was afterwards filed, nor that any ruling of court was made upon the demurrer. Neither does it appear by any of the stipulations entered into that the allegations of this complaint were deemed to be denied for the purposes of the trial. Yet counsel on both sides have argued the propositions which we have referred to as though issue were made upon all of the matters involved in the action, and evidence was also introduced at the trial by both the claimant and the assignee. Of course, if the demurrer was never ruled upon, the case of the Otis Elevator Company was never at issue and was not ready for trial at the time trial was had thereof; but as it appears that the case of this claimant was treated at the trial as though fully at issue, and has been so treated by the several counsel on this appeal, we have considered the questions argued in the light of that assumption.

[9] Thomas Foulkes was in our opinion properly allowed a lien for electrical work done in and about the hotel building. The point is made by the assignee that there was a variance between the proof and the recitals in the notice of lien, in that the notice set forth that the work had been completed according to the provisions of the contract, when, in fact, the work had been stopped at the fourth story of the building. The notice of lien contained the recitals required by the statute to be therein stated, and it is not claimed that these recitals incorrectly set forth the facts, except in the one particular noted. It was not strictly incorrect to say that Foulkes had completed his work, under the circumstances shown in this case. He did complete all of his work, which was to be paid for according to the amount done, and not in the way of a lump or aggregate sum for the entire work. The building was stopped by the owner at the fourth story, and Foulkes, the contractor, was in no way in default at that time. Foulkes alleged in his amended complaint that the work was accepted as complete, and this allegation the assignee did not deny in his answer. The notice of lien gave very full information as to the claim and the amount thereof, and stated all the facts required by the statute in proper form and with substantial accuracy.

[10] Thomas Chisholm entered into a contract with the hotel company on or about the 15th day of September, 1906, whereby he agreed to grade, fill in, and otherwise improve the grounds surrounding the hotel building. He was to furnish trees, shrubs, plants, flowers, seeds, bulbs, etc., to be used in the making of such improvements, and to employ necessary labor to grade, fill in and improve the grounds. The reasonable cost of the plants, trees, and shrubs furnished by him, and the actual cost of labor employed, was to be paid to him, and, in addition thereto, he was to receive the sum of $20 per week for his own services. The court found that there was a balance of $2,712.61 due the claimant, for which he was awarded a lien. It is contended that this plaintiff was entitled to a lien only for work and labor performed in grading and leveling the grounds and the making of drives and walks thereon; that no lien is created in favor of any person who furnishes and plants seeds, trees, or shrubs. The assignee argues that as the plaintiff was unable to segregate the value of the grading, excavating, etc., for which the assignee admits a right of lien might accrue, from the other labor and materials furnished, for which it is contended no lien should be allowed, the entire lien must fail. The proposition first suggested involves a consideration of the provisions of section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, in its material part, provides as follows: "Any person who, at the request of the reputed owner of any lot in any incorporated city or town, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, has a lien upon said lot for his work done and materials furnished." This section has been construed in several decisions of the Supreme Court. In Macomber v. Bigelow, 126 Cal. 9, 58 Pac. 312, it is said that "section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies to grading or other improvement of a lot, done independent of and not as a necessary part of the construction of a building." In Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986, it is held that the lot upon which the lien is authorized by section 1191 is not limited to any particular subdivision, or to official designation upon a map, but that it includes whatever territory is owned by the person for whom the improvement is made. In Williams, Belser & Co. v. Rowell, 145 Cal. 259, 78 Pac. 725, it was held that a system of sewers was such an improvement of lots within the meaning of section 1191, Code Civ. Proc., as to entitle the contractor to a lien as security for the payment for the work performed and material furnished. The furnishing and planting of seeds, trees, and shrubs, and the caring for the same for such a period of time as would insure that the seeds had become well started and that the plants and trees were thoroughly settled in the ground, would seem to be an improvement to the real estate which was among those intended to be included in the provisions of section 1191, Code Civ. Proc. It is probably not true that under the terms of this section a gardener or tiller of the soil could claim a lien by reason of labor expended in the general care of trees or crops, but under the contract made by Chisholm it appears that he was only to plant the seeds, trees, flowers, shrubs, etc., and to see that they were well started after being placed in the ground. From the testimony set out in the transcript it would seem that he made no claim for any other service done or materials furnished, and we think that the court properly allowed a lien for the amount hereinbefore mentioned. It seems to be conceded that the Wentworth Hotel grounds were at the time the contract of Chisholm was made, and at the time the work was performed and materials furnished, located within the limits of the city of Pasadena. Section 1191 in terms provides only for a lien to be given upon a lot located within the incorporated limits of a city or town.

[11] As to the claims of E. G. Judah and B. V. Collins, the only objection urged by the assignee is that as the amounts found due to these claimants in each case exceeded the sum of $1,000, and as their contracts were not recorded, such contracts should be held void. Judah was to furnish roofing and lay the same in asphalt pitch on concrete surfaces, and Collins was to furnish and set roofing tile. In our opinion neither of these claimants contracted to do work which can properly be termed construction work, but they were materialmen, and therefore their contracts were not required to be placed of record. What we have said with relation to the claim of the Otis Elevator Company on this point applies to these cases.

[12] The Hipolito Screen & Sash Company furnished screens for the windows and doors of the hotel building, which the evidence shows were actually fitted to and left upon the various openings for which they were designed. It was stipulated that screens to the value of $373.20 were at the time work was stopped upon the building stacked on the fourth floor thereof. As before noted, the evidence shows that the screens were all put in place by the contractor—not only fitted, but actually run into the grooves by which they were held, or fastened to the frames with hinges. When once so attached to the building, the screens became fixtures thereof, just as much as would a door hung upon hinges which would be removable by taking out a hinge-pin, and the fact that they were, for some one's convenience, taken down and piled up, would not destroy the right of lien acquired by the materialman so furnishing them. We think the court properly allowed a lien to this claimant.

[13] As to the claim of James S. Falls, assignee of Frank Lavine, the latter being a mechanic who was engaged on the hotel building as a lather, the appellant makes the point that the court should not have allowed said claim and a lien as security for the same, because there was a variance between the notice of lien as filed with the recorder and the proof made at the trial. More particularly specified, the objection as made is that the assignor of this claimant performed a large amount of work prior to that for which he made his claim, and that the amount of his claim represented only a balance due on account, whereas the notice of lien stated the same to be for a certain number of days' work at the agreed rate per day, without showing the whole amount earned under Lavine's engagement with the hotel company. This contention is scarcely borne out by the testimony shown in the transcript. The witness Richards, who engaged Lavine to do the lathing, testified that the amount for which the claim was made represented money due for particular work, and that there was no entire contract covering lathing to be done for the whole job. We quote from the testimony of this witness: "Whenever he (Lavine) came to a place where there seemed to be no more work for a time and then all persons stopped and the bill would be paid. He has been paid practically, I think, entirely for all work done on the hotel proper, and this work (meaning that for which the claim was made) was for the garage, really a separate proposition. Well, it entered into the hotel building, but I mean—I could not state definitely how long a time elapsed between his stopping work on the hotel building proper and his commencing work on this garage, but some little time; my impression is, several days. I think this work was not a continuation of the other work that he had been doing." The work performed by Lavine was paid for at a certain rate per day, and it appears that all work done by him previous to that performed upon the garage had been completely paid for and that no account existed in that behalf. It was therefore a correct statement to set forth in the notice of lien the number of days which the claimant was engaged on the particular work referred to, and the amount due to him therefor.

[14] A. R. Field, assignee of the Fire Pulp Plaster Company, was awarded judgment in the sum of $602.85 and a lien to secure payment thereof. The Fire Pulp Plaster Company furnished plastering material, and it was stated in the notice of lien, and also in the second cause of action set forth in the complaint of Field, that no price was agreed upon for such material, and that the reasonable value thereof was agreed to be paid. The court found in accordance with the allegations of the second alleged cause of action, which were consistent with the claim made in the notice of lien. The appellant contends that the evidence does not sustain the findings of the court. Considered as a whole, the evidence received in support of this claim in our opinion does sustain the findings of the court. One of the witnesses testified that the price of $9 per ton was quoted at the time some of the plastering material was ordered, and that this price was accepted, but it also reasonably appears from the evidence that it was contemplated by the parties that this material should be ordered from time to time as needed, and that the price to be paid therefor was not necessarily a uniform price of $9 per ton, but such a price as might be indicated by the state of the market at the particular time the merchandise was ordered. Charles E. Richards, one of the persons who supervised the ordering of this material, testified as follows: "The price on all that sort of things fluctuates, and he simply agreed to give me the lowest market price whenever we ordered the goods." The testimony of witness Richards clearly indicates what the understanding of the parties was at the time, and the court was fully warranted in making the finding in accordance with the allegations of plaintiff's second alleged cause of action.

On the appeal from the judgment entered in favor of the Richards-Neustadt Construction Company, the appellant contends that the judgment is not supported by the evidence. On behalf of the respondent here concerned, it is urged that the question of the sufficiency of the evidence cannot be inquired into for the reason that appellant's bill of exceptions contains no specification as to the particular matters embraced within the findings of the court which it is claimed are insufficiently supported by the evidence. This point was made by the same counsel with respect to the claims of Field and Falls previously considered herein. The judgment as to those cases was sustained by the evidence, conceding that the record properly preserved to appellant the right to raise question as to that matter.

[15] It is a fact, however, that in the bill of exceptions there are contained no specifications pointing out wherein the evidence is deemed to be insufficient to support the decision of the court, and for that reason, under the provisions of section 648, Code of Civil Procedure, the appellant is not in a position to insist upon the evidence being reviewed by this court for the purpose of determining whether or not the judgment is thereby supported. In the case of San Luis Water Co. v. Estrada, 117 Cal. 168, 48 Pac. 1075, the Supreme Court has said: "It is true, as a general proposition, that this court will not review the evidence in a bill of exceptions, unless it specifies the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to sustain the decision. Code Civ. Proc. § 648." And again, in the case of Swift v. Occidental Mining, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 161, 74 Pac. 700, we find these expressions: "No reference to the evidence is required in the specification except to say that it is insufficient to justify the particular finding called in question. * * * The object of the rule requiring these specifications is, first, to shorten the statement of the evidence by excluding everything irrelevant to the specified fact; and, second, to notify the opposing party of the particular finding called in question, in order that he may see that the statement fairly and fully presents the evidence bearing upon that particular matter. This object accomplished, the statute is satisfied." There was in this case no motion for a new trial, and while it is true that a party is entitled upon an appeal from a judgment to have the evidence reviewed, providing the appeal is taken within six months after entry of the judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 939), there is no provision in case of such an appeal which dispenses with the usual requirements affecting the preparation and form of a bill of exceptions, where the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a decision is sought to be questioned.

[16] It is the law as contended for by appellant that there can be no assignment made of a debt provided to be secured by the mechanic's lien law (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183–1203a) which will carry with it to the assignee the right to enforce a lien, where such assignment is made prior to the lien having been perfected by the assignor. The authorities uniformly hold that, while the assignment of a debt may carry with it the lien given for its security, in order that this result shall accrue in favor of the assignee, the lien must have been perfected prior to the time the assignment was made. Duncan v. Hawn, 104 Cal. 10, 37 Pac. 626; McCrea v. Johnson, 104 Cal. 224, 37 Pac. 902; Rauer v. Fay, 110 Cal. 361, 42 Pac. 902. As we have suggested, however, the objection made on this point by appellant involves a consideration of the matter as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings made by the court, and that matter cannot be considered on the state of the record as it is here presented.

[17] The Meyberg Company made a claim, which was sustained by the court and a lien awarded, for the furnishing of special lighting fixtures, and installing them in the hotel building. The fixtures were all manufactured at the factory of the claimant, and the work of installing them constituted in value but a very small part of the total compensation agreed to be paid by the hotel company. This claimant was a materialman, and, although the contract price was the sum of $2,900, it was not necessary that such contract should have been recorded. The further point is made by appellant that the materials furnished were not such as to entitle the claimant to a lien, as they were fixtures not permanently attached to the structure. With this contention we do not agree.

[18] The various articles furnished by this claimant were designed especially for use in this hotel building, and they did become a part thereof by being regularly attached thereto, and in our view constituted as much a part of the building as did the doors, windows, and other attachments and appurtenances which were fastened by means of hinges, cleats, and other similar arrangements. They constituted a necessary part of the completed structure in view of the use for which it was designed to be put, and we think came fairly within the definition of materials for which a lien is designed to be given by the Constitution and statute.

The same points are made with respect to the claim of Ferve-Pettibone Company, and for the same reasons which have been given with respect to the claim last above considered the judgment in favor of this claimant should be sustained.

[19] The court refused to allow a lien as security for the payment of the claim for laundry machinery furnished by A. T. Hagan Company. This claimant filed its notice of lien with the recorder on July 11, 1907. The hotel company on the 8th day of April, 1907, had filed a notice with the recorder setting out that work had ceased on the hotel building, and that the building had been accepted by the owner. The trial court found, and we doubt not correctly, that the hotel company having abandoned the design of completing the building at that time, and having filed the notice just referred to showing an acceptance of the building, that this notice was in effect a notice of completion and that the time for filing of liens then commenced to run. It has been held that a building will be deemed completed, even though not constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications, where the owner abandons the intent to make it a completed structure at any time during the course of work upon it. In Schwartz v. Knight, 74 Cal. 432, 16 Pac. 235, reaffirmed in Marchant v. Hayes, 120 Cal. 137, 52 Pac. 154, it is said: "The Code does not mean that the building, if, as in this case, it was intended to be a dwelling house, must be completed in all respects as contemplated by the plans and specifications, or even that it shall have become habitable as a dwelling. Ordinarily the lien cannot be filed until a building is so completed. But when it is made to appear that it was the original purpose of the owner to erect and build it in part only, or that the owner, having proceeded to erect the house in part, abandoned his design of finishing it, the building should be held to be completed, within the meaning of section 1187, from the time it was so built in part. The purpose of the owner may be inferred from his acts or omissions, but the ultimate fact to be determined is his original or substituted purpose to leave the building unfinished." The trial court, therefore, properly held that the claim of lien of the Hagan Company was filed too late, and that the claimant was not entitled to a lien.

[20] The Pacific Coast Planing Mill Company appealed from the judgment denying it the right to a lien for lumber and finishing material furnished for the hotel building. In their notice of lien the statement of the demand, etc., was in the following form: "And the following is a statement of the terms, time given and conditions of said contract, to wit: Lumber material, mill finish, furnished between July 31, 1906, and March 30, 1907, amounting to the sum of $15,436.57, which said sum was to be paid in installments on the delivery of the said material at the various dates of delivery." The proof made at the trial showed that prices were agreed upon for various of the material furnished and that payment therefor was to be made on the 10th day of each month for all material so furnished during the preceding month. Appellant contends that the trial court erred in holding that there was a variance between the notice of lien and the proof. We think that the judgment with respect to this claim is correct. Conceding that the statement in the notice of lien as to the amount to be paid was sufficient to indicate that that amount was in accordance with prices agreed upon, still the notice contained a statement as to time of payment which was in direct variance with the evidence offered by the claimant. We think this variance was fatal to the right of the claimant to a lien. The statute requires the notice of lien to set forth a statement of the demand, after deducting all just credits and offsets, with the name of the owner and, "with a statement of the terms, time given and conditions of his contract." In order for a materialman or contractor to perfect his lien, it is necessary that this statement be made substantially in the form required by the statute. This requirement is not relaxed where the claimant is a person dealing directly with the owner, rather than a laborer or materialman engaged through the agency of a contractor. If such a notice is insufficient in one case, it is insufficient in all cases. Here there was a misstatement at least as to the time of payment. The provisions of the statute were therefore not complied with. There is nothing in the case of McGinty v. Morgan, 122 Cal. 103, 54 Pac. 392, cited by appellant, inconsistent with this view.

[21] Yard & Hichborn were denied by the trial court the right to enforce a lien for money due under a contract made with the hotel company. This contract provided that the contractors, under the direction of the architect, should perform and finish the entire carpentry and joinery required in the construction of the hotel building, according to the plans and specifications. It was provided that there was to be paid by the owner to the contractors the net cost of the work, plus 5 per cent., which 5 per cent. should be compensation to the contractors for services, and accounts for labor were provided to be paid for on the second and fourth Saturdays of each month upon statements to be rendered by the contractors to the owner, giving the names of the parties employed, the wages paid per day and amounts of labor performed; and the material used was to be paid for upon presentation of a bill for the same from the parties of whom it was purchased, and upon certificate of the architect. Subdivision 6 of the contract provided as follows: "That the said contractors shall be paid 75 per cent. as the work progresses; the balance of 25 per cent. of their commissions for purchasing, hiring of labor and superintending of work, shall be retained until thirty-five days after the building is fully completed, and then paid with the final certificate of the architect, which shall not be issued before the work under this agreement is fully and finally completed." This contract was a contract for construction. It was undoubtedly so regarded by the parties, for it was reduced to writing and recorded in the usual form. Its effect was not merely to employ the contractors as agents of the owner to negotiate for labor and materials and superintend the work of building. It is clear from the terms of the contract that the cost of labor was to be paid directly to the contractors, and not to the employés engaged by such contractors to do work upon the building. See Malone v. Big Flat Gravel M. Co., 76 Cal. 578, 18 Pac. 772. The contract was such a contract as is required by the provisions of section 1183, Code Civ. Proc., to be reduced to writing and recorded.

[22] It was defective in its provisions, however, in that 25 per cent. of the whole contract price was not made payable 35 days after final completion of the contract. Twenty-five per cent. of the profit to the contractors, otherwise termed as commission in the contract, only, it is conceded by respondent, was reserved for payment 35 days after the completion of the building. The contract was therefore void and no right of lien accrued for the benefit of the contractors. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1184; Morris v. Wilson, 97 Cal. 644, 32 Pac. 801; Spinney v. Griffith, 98 Cal. 149, 32 Pac. 974; Willamette, etc., Co. v. College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. 629; Merced Lumber Co. v. Bruschi et al., 152 Cal. 372, 92 Pac. 844.

As to the George H. Tay Company, the judgment is modified by deducting from the amount for which said claimant was adjudged entitled to a lien and a foreclosure thereof, the sum of $2,970.69. As to John Douglas Company, the judgment is modified by striking from the amount for which said claimant was adjudged entitled to a lien and a foreclosure thereof, the sum of $1,810.38. As to Carpenter & Biles Mill & Lumber Company, the judgment is modified by deducting from the amount for which said claimant was adjudged entitled to a lien and a foreclosure thereof, the sum of $566.59. The judgment as entered by the trial court in all other respects as to other claimants is affirmed. The orders denying motions for new trial as made by the Pacific Coast Planing Mill Company and Yard & Hichborn are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1911.)

Mechanics' Liens (§ 48*)—Right to Lien—Materials Furnished But Not Used.

There is no lien upon a building for materials furnished and necessary for its completion according to its original plan, but left unused by reason of a change of plan by the owner after the materials have been delivered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

In Bank. Petition for a rehearing. Denied.

For opinion of the District Court of Appeal, see 118 Pac. 103.

PER CURIAM. The sole question presented by the petition for a rehearing of this cause is whether the law secures a lien upon a building for the value of materials furnished (and necessary) for its completion according to its original plan, but left unused by reason of a change of plan by the owner after the materials have been delivered. Upon this question the views of the District Court of Appeal are sustained. Other questions discussed in the opinion of that court, several of which are novel and difficult, have not been considered.

CONDON v. DONOHUE. (S. F. 5,630.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 18, 1911. Rehearing Denied Oct. 18, 1911.)

1. Contracts (§ 44*)—Building Contracts—Filing—Validity—Enforcement.

Plaintiff orally agreed to construct a building for defendant according to certain plans for $33,000. The written contract, when presented to defendant for execution, called for $35,000, and when defendant objected plaintiff stated that he put in $35,000 because the agreed price would look too cheap, and that he would give defendant a private contract. The contract was thereupon signed as prepared, and filed for record. Immediately after its execution, plaintiff wrote and delivered to defendant a private memorandum, by which he agreed to complete the building for $33,000. Held, that such memorandum was a part of the contract between the parties, and, never having been filed, the whole contract was unenforceable under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, requiring building contracts to be in writing when the amount exceeds $1,000, and the memorandum filed in the office of the county recorder; otherwise "they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. Contracts (§ 44*)—Building Contracts—Statutes.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1202, relating to mechanic's liens, and providing that if the owner and contractor, directly or indirectly, agree that the written contract filed shall appear to show the contract price to be less than it really is, and it shall accordingly so show, then the contract shall be void, and no recovery shall be had thereon, etc., relates to a case where the entire contract as written is properly filed, but fails, by design of the parties, to state the real consideration, and does not apply to a case where a part of the contract was not filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by David Condon against Timothy Donohue. Judgment of dismissal, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

J. F. Cowdery (Wal J. Tuska, of counsel), for appellant. E. F. Conlin (J. L. Nagle, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The plaintiff, a building contractor, brought this action to recover an amount alleged to be due as the reasonable value of labor and materials furnished in the construction of a building at the corner of Hayes and Gough streets, in San Francisco. The defendant relied on the claim that all of the same were furnished in pursuance of a written contract between the parties for the construction of such building for $33,000, that plaintiff abandoned his contract without completing the same, and that he was compelled to finish the same at his own expense, at a cost, reasonably incurred, of some $5,000 and more in excess of the contract price. By cross-complaint he sought judgment for the damage so caused. The judgment was that plaintiff take nothing, and that defendant recover simply his costs. This is an appeal by defendant on the judgment roll from the judgment and from an order made after judgment, denying defendant's motion, made under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate the judgment, annul the conclusions of law, and enter a judgment in favor of defendant for $5,578.80, as well as costs.

It is urged that the order last referred to is not an appealable order. It is immaterial in this case whether it is or not, in view of the fact that there is an appeal from the judgment, and the questions involved on the appeal from the order are likewise presented on the appeal from the judgment. But it has been held that such an order is appealable, as a special order made after final judgment. Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 76 Pac. 659, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154; Bond v. United R. R., 113 Pac. 366.

[1] The facts found, so far as material here, are as follows: Plaintiff orally agreed to construct the building, according to plans and specifications prepared by himself, for $33,000. On February 28, 1907, he presented to defendant a written contract for execution, in which contract the price stated was $35,000. Objection being made to the price stated, plaintiff said that he put it at $35,000, instead of $33,000, "because $33,000 would look too cheap, and he would give a private contract." Thereupon the paper was signed by the parties with $35,000 specified as the contract price, and defendant on the same day filed the same for record in the office of the county recorder. About 20 minutes after this paper was executed, plaintiff wrote and delivered to defendant a private memorandum, which was never filed for record. By this paper, plaintiff agreed to complete said building for the sum of $33,000. Undoubtedly this paper constituted a part of the written contract between the parties. On March 1, 1907, plaintiff commenced work on the building, and continued such work until May 2, 1907, when the frame was up. Completion to this stage entitled him, under the terms of the contract, to one-eighth of the contract price, and a dispute arose between the parties as to whether the true contract price was $35,000 or $33,000. Defendant paid plaintiff $4,125, which was on the basis of a contract price of $33,000, and refused to pay more. Plaintiff then, on May 2, 1907, abandoned his contract, having paid for work, labor, and materials furnished an aggregate sum of $3,044.75. He had contracted to pay for lumber already delivered, $5,934.78, and for mill work to be subsequently delivered and which was delivered, $1,500, both of which amounts defendant subsequently paid. On May 13, 1907, defendant commenced work on said building, and completed it, according to the plans and specifications, on September 6, 1907. In so completing the contract, the defendant used the materials delivered under contracts made by plaintiff. The cost of the building to defendant, including the $4,125 paid to plaintiff, was $38,578.90, and this expenditure by defendant was reasonable in amount.

Upon these facts, the trial court concluded, as matter of law, that defendant's "neglect to file the $33,000 modification part of the contract in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco, where the property is situated, made the contract wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto."

Defendant's claim is that upon the facts found, it should be held, as matter of law, that the contract is valid between the parties, and that consequently he is entitled to recover the damage occasioned him by plaintiff's failure to complete the same, viz., the difference between the agreed price of $33,000 and the actual cost of the building. It is not disputed that, if the contract may be regarded as valid between the parties, the facts found entitle defendant to the amount claimed as damages for the breach thereof.

The conclusion of the lower court that the contract was wholly void, and that no recovery could be had thereon by either party, was based, of course, on the provisions of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, as it stood at the time of the transaction in question. That section is contained in title 4 of part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which title is entitled "Enforcement of Liens," and in chapter 2 of such title, entitled "Liens of Mechanics and Others upon Real Property." The section, after providing for a lien in favor of persons performing labor upon or furnishing material in the matter of the construction of a building, etc., which lien shall extend to the entire contract price, requires that every such contract shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds $1,000, and that the same, or a memorandum thereof, setting forth certain things, "shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder of the county, or city and county, where the property is situated; * * * otherwise, they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party; and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." The italics are ours. It cannot seriously be questioned that there was, in view of the facts found, a failure to comply with the provisions of this section, and the question is as to the effect of the portion of the section that we have italicized, where the rights of any party, other than the owner and the contractor, are in no way involved. May the contract be treated as valid as between the parties thereto?

Defendant's claim for damages is, of course, based on the alleged contract. He is seeking damages for the breach thereof on the part of plaintiff, and his cause of action therefor is one on the alleged contract. The portion of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, that we have heretofore quoted expressly provides that if the provisions of such section as to the filing of the contract in the recorder's office are not complied with, the contract shall be wholly void, "and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto." Language more clearly precluding any action by either party on the contract in the event of noncompliance with such provision could not have been chosen by the Legislature, and, unless we can find some warrant for the conclusion that the provision is not applicable where the rights of lien claimants are not involved, the effect is necessarily to prevent a recovery of damages by defendant upon the facts shown by the findings. No such warrant can be found, based upon any reasonable construction of the language used. To our minds, it is plain that the provision is in the nature of a penalty imposed upon parties for failure to comply with provisions of the lien law designed to protect the rights of subcontractors, materialmen, artisans, and laborers. It was apparently considered essential to such protection that, where the contract price exceeds $1,000, such contract, or a memorandum thereof, showing certain specified things, be filed in the county recorder's office prior to the commencement of the work. That the Legislature might lawfully require such filing in furtherance of such purpose, and declare the contract unenforceable, unless it be so filed, without unlawfully invading the right of contract, cannot be doubted. "The Legislature may prescribe the form in which contracts shall be executed, in order that they may be valid or binding" (Stimson Mill Co. v. Braun, 136 Cal. 122, 125, 68 Pac. 481, 482 [57 L. R. A. 726, 89 Am. St. Rep. 116]), and, unless an attempted provision in that behalf is manifestly without foundation in reason, it cannot be nullified by the courts. The fact that the provision is contained in the part of our statute law relating to liens and the manner of their enforcement does not warrant a construction confining its operation to those cases where the rights of lien claimants are involved. It is a part of the general plan devised for the protection of possible lien claimants, and is very properly placed in the title of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to such matters.

The decisions of this court are not opposed to our conclusion as to the effect of this provision, but, on the contrary, support it. Certain of the earlier decisions, which are reviewed and considered in the later case of Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 170, 65 Pac. 391, were apparently to the effect that, in the event of noncompliance with the provisions of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, not only were both parties precluded from any action on the contract, but also that the provisions of the contract could not be relied upon by the owner as constituting the measure of the contractor's recovery, in an action in assumpsit for the labor and materials furnished by him, or as forbidding a recovery by him, where the special contract under which the work was done and materials furnished had not been complied with. In Laidlaw v. Marye, supra, the earlier decisions were reviewed, and it was concluded that the true rule in such a case is, not that the contract is valid and binding between the parties in the sense that either party may enforce its terms as against the other, for the language of the statute expressly prohibits any action looking to that end, but simply that, as it could not have been intended to give to the contractor in such a case greater rights as against the owner than would have been his, had he complied with the law in the matter of filing the contract for record, in any action brought by him for the reasonable value of the labor and materials furnished, the only action remaining to him in view of the statutory provision, the contract must remain, to use the language of this court, "not the basis of his recovery, but the measure and test of his right to recover." Laidlaw v. Marye, supra. The italics are ours. It is declared that he may not recover for something which the owner never in fact ordered or contracted for, and that he will not be allowed to recover as the reasonable value of the labor and material furnished a sum in excess of that specified in the attempted contract. In other words, according to Laidlaw v. Marye, supra, the contractor "must still show a substantial compliance with its terms to warrant any recovery at all, and the measure of his recovery, even under implied assumpsit, must be limited, as to him, by the contract price." In the case just cited, the contractor was denied recovery, in an action for the reasonable value of materials and labor, because there was a substantial variance, to the damage of the owner, between the work called for by the unrecorded contract and the work done, and the failure to complete the work so called for had not been waived or excused in any way. There is nothing in the opinion intimating that the court entertained the view that either party could maintain any action on the contract, as the defendant here seeks to do by virtue of his counterclaim and cross-complaint. The language of the opinion is most carefully guarded in this respect, indicating very clearly the views of the justices concurring that, as was substantially stated in a quotation therein from Barker v. Doherty, 97 Cal. 10, 31 Pac. 1117, it is apparent from a cursory reading of the statutory provision that the contract is void as forming the basis of a recovery, and that no legal liability can be created by any of its provisions. The later case of Sullivan v. California Realty Co., 142 Cal. 201, 75 Pac. 767, was an action in equity by the owner against the contractor to cancel a building contract which had not been properly filed for record. The contractor had already furnished materials and begun work, and there was no offer by the plaintiff to pay for this work or material, or to place the defendant in his former position. One of the grounds of the decision in favor of the contractor was simply, that, as held in Laidlaw v. Marye, supra, as between him and the owner, the contract must remain, not the basis of recovery by him, but the measure and test of his recovery, and so remaining the owner was not entitled to have the same canceled. The opinion of Judge Cooper in that case cannot be taken as deciding more than this. Portions of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal of the Second district, in Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Higgins, 8 Cal. App. 514, 526, 97 Pac. 414, 420, are in conflict with the views we have stated, but this court expressly withheld its approval from such portions, and denied a rehearing here solely because they were not essential to the judgment given by that court.

[2] There is nothing in the provisions of section 1202, Code of Civil Procedure, to assist defendant. That section refers to an entirely different case, a case where the entire contract, as written, is properly filed in the recorder's office, but, as written, fails, by design of the parties, to state the real consideration. The provision of section 1183 applied in this case precludes any action on the contract in every case where there has been a failure to file the whole of the written contract, and it is entirely immaterial whether a court may feel that the omission was of such a nature that no right was in fact prejudiced thereby.

It thus appears that the learned judge of the trial court was correct in his conclusions of law, and that the judgment given is supported by the findings of fact.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

COOKSON et al. v. HAMILTON et al.

(S. F. 5,600.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 18, 1911. Rehearing Denied Oct. 18, 1911.)

WILLS (§ 548*)—TESTAMENTARY TRUST—CONSTRUCTION—"ANY DECEASED CHILD."

Testator died leaving him surviving a son and two daughters and two grandchildren, children of a deceased son and daughter, who died before the execution of the will. To these two grandchildren he bequeathed pecuniary legacies, and then directed that the residue of his property should be held in trust, to pay one-third of the net income monthly to each of his three remaining children, and, on the death of either of said children of testator without issue, to pay his or her one-third share of the net income to the survivors of them, share and share alike, and to the children of "any deceased child" by right of representation, and, on the death of the last survivor of testator's children, all the property and estate representing the one-third share or interest of any child who may have died without issue. Held, that the term "any deceased child" referred only to children living at the time of the execution of the will, and who had been made beneficiaries of the trust, so that, on the death of testator's son, who was one of the three surviving children, without issue, his one-third share of the net income passed to his surviving sisters, and was not to be divided among them and the grandchildren, whose parents died prior to the death of the testator and the making of his will.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Charles C. Bemis, as trustee under the will of David R. Jones, deceased, against Annie D. Cookson and others and Mabel Dodge Hamilton and others, adverse claimants to a portion of the income of certain trust property. From a determination on an order of interpleader, finding such income to belong to claimant Cookson and others, claimant Hamilton and others appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Garret W. McEnerney, for appellants. John A. Wright and John F. Barnett, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought by Charles C. Bemis, as trustee of the trusts created by the last will of David R. Jones, deceased, against various persons claiming a portion of the income of the trust property, to compel said persons to interplead among themselves and procure a determination of their several claims. On stipulation of the parties, the trustee having deposited in court the amount in dispute, an order was made discharging him from all liability in regard thereto, and requiring the defendants to interplead among themselves with respect to their several claims. The plaintiffs in interpleader, Annie D. Cookson and Lily Butterfield, the other plaintiffs being their respective husbands, filed their complaint, claiming the whole of said money, and the defendants in interpleader, Mabel Dodge Hamilton and Beatrice Jones, filed their answer, claiming all of the same. On motion, judgment on the pleadings was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs in interpleader. This is an appeal from such judgment by said defendants.

The rights of the respective parties depend upon the construction to be given to clause 5 of a trust created by the will of David R. Jones, deceased, and declared by the decree of distribution in exactly the same language used in the will.

David R. Jones died testate on September 11, 1903, leaving surviving one son, John R. Jones, and two daughters, plaintiffs Annie D. Cookson and Lily Butterfield, and also two grandchildren, defendants Mabel Dodge Hamilton and Beatrice Jones, the former being the only child and lawful issue of Mary Jane Dodge, a daughter of deceased, and the latter being the only child and lawful issue of David H. Jones, a son of deceased, both of whom had died before deceased executed his last will. By his will, deceased gave to said Mabel Dodge Hamilton $75,000, and to said Beatrice Jones $75,000, which legacies were paid in full prior to distribution. He gave all the rest of his property to Charles C. Bemis in trust for the following purposes, viz.:

"1. To hold, invest, manage and control the same and to receive the income therefrom.

"2. To pay monthly to testator's son, John R. Jones, during his natural life, one-third of the net income derived from said trust estate.

"3. To pay monthly to testator's daughter, Lily Butterfield, during her natural life, one-third of the net income derived from said trust estate.

"4. To pay monthly to testator's daughter, Annie D. Cookson, during her natural life, the remaining one-third of the net income derived from said trust estate.

"5. Upon the death of either of said children of said testator without issue, to pay his or her one-third share of said net income to the survivors of them, share and share alike, and to the children of any deceased child by right of representation.

"6. That upon the death of either of said testator's children leaving issue, one-third of the original trust estate with its accretions shall at once descend to and vest in the issue of such deceased child, and the trustee shall pay over and deliver the same forthwith absolutely to such issue.

"7. Upon the death of the last survivor of said testator's children, all the property and estate representing the one-third share or interest of any child who may have died without issue shall vest absolutely in and go to the heirs at law of such child so dying without issue."

In due course, namely, on May 29, 1905, the residue of the property was distributed to the trustee. The surviving son, John R. Jones, died without issue in the month of June, 1905. The foregoing facts are shown by the pleadings.

The question presented is whether, under clause 5 of the trust, the whole of the one-third share of the net income which would have gone to said John R. Jones, in the event that he had continued to live, goes to the surviving daughters of the testator, the plaintiffs herein, or is to be divided, share and share alike, among them and the children of children of the testator who died prior to his death, and prior to the making of his will. The learned judge of the trial court concluded that the whole of said one-third share of the income belongs to the surviving children, Lily Butterfield and Annie D. Cookson, and that the provision of clause 5, "and to the children of any deceased child by right of representation," referred only to children of such deceased children as were living at the time of the execution of the will, and had been made beneficiaries of the trust. In other words, that such provision was solely for the purpose of allowing the children of any such deceased beneficiary to take in his or her place the share of said income which would have gone to such beneficiary under the other provisions of clause 5, if he or she were still alive. That this is the true meaning of the provision in both the will and decree of distribution seems very clear to us.

Taking all of the provisions of the trust scheme together, in the light of the admitted facts, including the bequests made by the will to the two defendant grandchildren, the meaning of clause 5 is, to our minds, so clear as to reasonably admit of no other construction than that given to it by the learned judge of the trial court. The trust provisions were obviously solely for the benefit of the three living children and their issue. The children of such children as had died prior to the making of the will were specifically provided for by other provisions of the will; $75,000 being given to each. These provisions having been made, the testator proceeded to create a trust for his surviving children and their issue. As long as the three surviving children continued to live, no other person was permitted to enjoy any portion of the income of the trust property, but the income of the same was to be paid, in one-third parts, to said three children. If any of said children died leaving issue, no one outside of said issue was to participate in his or her share, which at once vested in such issue, free of the trust. Upon the death of any of such children without issue, the trust was not to terminate as to the share of the child so dying, but was to continue until the death of the last survivor, when, the purpose of the trust having been fully accomplished, such share was to go to the "heirs at law" of such deceased child. In the meantime, under clause 5, the income of such share was to be divided, share and share alike, among the survivors of said three children, and "the children of any deceased child by right of representation." The bringing in, under the phrase just quoted, of the children of David H. Jones and Mary Jane Dodge, for whom specific provision had already been made, would appear to be foreign to the whole purpose of the trust scheme, and the language used is not reasonably susceptible of any construction that would include them. The only children of testator specifically mentioned in the provisions relating to the trust were the surviving children, John R. Jones, Lily Butterfield, and Annie D. Cookson, and the term "any deceased child," in clause 5, in the connection in which it was used, would naturally be taken as referring only to such of the children as were so named, and for whose benefit primarily the trust was created. If it had been intended to include known children of children already deceased in this income distribution, the natural thing would have been to specify them as intended to be so included. The term "any deceased child," in the connection in which it is used, would reasonably appear to refer only to children living at the time of the execution of the will.

But all-important in the ascertainment of the intention is the language "by right of representation." The one-third share of the income which would have gone to the child dying without issue, if he had lived, is to go "to the survivors of them (the three children), share and share alike, and to the children of any deceased child by right of representation." Learned counsel for appellants earnestly contends that these words technically mean no more than that the children of deceased children shall take per stirpes, instead of per capita. They do mean this, of course; but they further necessarily imply that the children so take, as a class, because of the death of a parent who would have taken, had he lived, and as his representatives. As his surviving children, they are to take his share—the same share their parent would have taken, if living. The use of these words by the testator indicates very clearly his intention simply to place the children of any one of the three children who may die in the same position with reference to the income that the parent would have been, had he continued to live.

In our opinion, there is nothing in clause 7 of such a nature as to warrant a different conclusion. This clause is in fact no part of the trust, but is a testamentary disposition of property subject to the trust, and is not one in favor of children of deceased children, as such, but is to "the heirs at law" of any child dying without issue. It has very little, if any, bearing, on the question of the intent of the testator as to the manner in which the income of the trust property shall be applied by the trustee.

We find nothing in the cases cited by learned counsel for appellants in support of his claim that appears to us to demand a conclusion contrary to that reached by the lower court.

It is not claimed by defendants that the provisions of the decree of distribution are any more unfavorable to defendants than the provisions of the will. In fact, as we have said, the trust provisions of the will have been placed, word for word, in the decree, thus making the trust provisions of the decree follow the terms of the will absolutely. In view of what we have said, it is clear that no prejudice resulted to defendants from the refusal of the trial court to allow them to amend their answer by setting up the will of the testator. Notwithstanding such amendment, the plaintiffs would still have been entitled to judgment upon the facts shown by the pleadings.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LANKERSHIM.

(L. A. 2,604.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1911.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 208*) — LICENSES (§ 7*) — CLASS LEGISLATION — DISCRIMINATION AGAINST PARTICULAR PERSONS.

Los Angeles ordinance licensing and regulating occupations, and by section 54 providing that every person or corporation maintaining for the purpose of letting office rooms or storerooms a building containing more than 30 rooms shall as a license pay $1 per year for each office room, and $3 per year for each storeroom, is invalid, being class legislation, in artificially separating persons engaged in the same business, contrary to both the general law and Los Angeles charter authorizing the city to impose license taxes upon occupations, which provides that no discrimination shall be made between persons engaged in the same business otherwise than proportioning the tax on the amount of business.

2. LICENSES (§ 9*)—ORDINANCES—CONSTRUCTION.

While every intendment is to be indulged in favor of the validity of a municipal ordinance imposing a license fee for the carrying on of a particular business, the courts cannot uphold an ordinance when clearly invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against J. B. Lankershim. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

John D. Works and Bradner W. Lee, for appellant. Leslie R. Hewitt and John W. Shenk, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to recover moneys due under a revenue license ordinance of the city of Los Angeles providing "for licensing and regulating the carrying on of certain professions, trades, callings and occupations." Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial defendant appeals. While thus described as "regulatory," an inspection of the ordinance discloses that it is an ordinance simply for revenue, the only attempt at regulation being the prohibition against conducting or carrying on any of the enumerated professions, trades, callings, or occupations without first procuring a license so to do. Section 54 of the ordinance is as follows: "Sec. 54. For every person, firm or corporation maintaining, managing or conducting a building for the purpose of letting office rooms or store rooms, the following license: For every building containing more than 30 rooms, $1.00 per year, for each office room, and $3.00 per year for each store room contained in said building." Defendant is admittedly the owner of an office building containing more than 30 rooms which are rented or leased.

Against the enforcement of this license ordinance and against its validity, it is first urged that the ordinance in design and in effect levies an unequal and ununiform tax upon property which the owner may elect to rent (Const. art. xiii, § 1); that an owner's right to rent his property and receive the rents thereof is one of the inherent rights of property ownership; that to call the renting an "occupation" is a mere subterfuge, and that to exact a license tax for the right to conduct this so-called "occupation" is but an attempt to evade the law forbidding unequal taxation. The question thus presented is certainly a serious one. If a man owning an office building with offices to rent who has paid all taxes, state, county, and municipal upon his property is to be charged a dollar a room for every office he rents under a declaration that he is engaged in the "occupation" of "conducting a building" for the purpose of letting office rooms and that, consequently, a license may be exacted on the occupation, equally well might the board of supervisors under the guise of licensing the "occupation of renting land" exact from the farmer a dollar per acre for all farming lands which he might rent.

[1] But in the present case we need not pause to determine this point, for the ordinance in the matter here under review is certainly obnoxious to the general law and to the charter provisions in its unjust discrimination between persons engaged in the same business. It imposes a burden upon one owner which it does not impose upon another in the same class. We need do no more than refer to such familiar cases as Ex parte Mirande, 73 Cal. 365, 14 Pac. 888, Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 230, 24 Pac. 383, City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604, County of El Dorado v. Meiss, 100 Cal. 268, 34 Pac. 716, Hellman v. Shoulters, 114 Cal. 136, 44 Pac. 915, 45 Pac. 1057, and Van Harlingen v. Doyle, 134 Cal. 53, 66 Pac. 44, 54 L. R. A. 771, which lay down the general principles touching the limitations upon the power to impose burdens or immunities upon classes. The charter of the city of Los Angeles speaks upon the precise subject-matter, and in authorizing the city to impose a license tax upon occupations, businesses, and trades to raise revenue for the city expressly provides "that no discrimination shall be made between persons engaged in the same business otherwise than by proportioning the tax on any business and amount of business done." While, then, it is held that all businesses of a certain class may be subjected to a license tax in a single amount, or what is much more equitable, that the license tax may be imposed in proportion to the business done (Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Gas Co., 152 Cal. 765, 93 Pac. 1006), it is distinctly forbidden by this charter, as it is by the general law of this state, to discriminate in the matter of licenses between persons engaged in the same business unless that discrimination takes the form of regulating the amount of the license in proportion to the amount of the business done. So here conceding, but only for the purpose of this decision, that the renting by an owner and the receiving of rents from his own property is an "occupation" and conceding, further, that the owners of office buildings who rent rooms therein for office purposes form a class which may be segregated for the purposes of license taxation, it is still plain that no valid distinction exists based upon the size of the building or the number of offices for rent. Surely a man who owns a building with 30 office rooms for rent is engaged in no different "occupation" than the man alongside of him owning an office building with 29 office rooms to rent, and if, as in the case of this ordinance, a tax is to be levied at the rate of a dollar a room upon the person engaged in the "occupation" of renting office rooms, no reason appears or is shown why, belonging to the same class as they do, the man who rents 5 office rooms should not pay $5 if the man who rents 50 is compelled to pay $50. The contention that for the purposes of taxation the municipal council may draw a class line at 30 rooms and declare those who rent 30 rooms and over are engaged in an occupation, while those who rent less than 30 rooms are not engaged in the same occupation, is purely fanciful, as would be plainly exemplified if the ordinance imposed a tax upon those who rent from 1 to 30 rooms and relieved from the tax those who rented over 30 rooms. Yet, if this asserted ground of classification is substantial, the city council would have the power to do precisely this thing.

No ordinance which has come under the review of this court has ever gone to the limits of this ordinance or has been upheld if it has done so. In Ex parte Sisto Li Protti, 68 Cal. 635, 10 Pac. 113, the license charge was regulated according to the number of employés. There was no objection there made that a laundry which employed nobody was exempt from a license fee; the sole objection being that the fixing of the license in accordance with the number of employés was not a sound basis of classification. In Ex parte Lemon, 143 Cal. 558, 77 Pac. 455, 65 L. R. A. 946, by the license tax upon restaurants, all restaurants were taxed, but the tax was graded and made less in the case of small restaurants where the cooking and service were by the proprietor or members of his family. No question was there presented of the omission of any part of the class, the attack being made upon the differences of the class by reason of the nature of the business. So in Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 Pac. 725, 32 L. R. A. 527, it was held that an ordinance imposing a license tax upon traveling salesmen higher than the license tax upon the merchant who sold the same goods at a fixed place of business was founded in a legitimate distinction.

[2] The well-settled rule that "every intendment is to be indulged in favor of the validity of a municipal ordinance imposing a license fee for the carrying on of a particular business" means that a court will be zealous in its search for any substantial ground for upholding such an ordinance when attacked; but it does not mean that the court must shut its ears to reason and declare in every case that because an ordinance has been passed there must be valid reasons for its existence. The true principle, repeatedly affirmed in this state, is thus expressed by the Supreme Court of Georgia: "The Legislature has absolutely no power to classify persons, natural or artificial, engaged in precisely the same occupation, laying a tax upon some of them and excepting others, or imposing a tax not operating uniformly upon all." Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wright, 97 Ga. 114, 25 S. E. 249, 35 L. R. A. 497.

The ordinance here, therefore, is unjust and discriminatory in making an unwarranted exception in favor of members of the same class, or what is the same thing phrased differently, imposing upon a part of a class artificially created a burden not imposed upon all who stand in the same relation to the same subject-matter (City of Pasadena v. Stimson, supra), for which reason the ordinance as to the section under consideration is invalid.

The judgment and order are therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 108*)—ORDINANCES—REFERENDUM PETITION—TIME OF FILING—"FINAL PASSAGE."

Los Angeles City Charter, § 39, provides that all ordinances finally adopted shall be published, and until such publication no ordinance shall be valid, but does not provide when it shall be published; and section 198b provides that no ordinance shall go into effect before 30 days from the time of its final passage and its approval by the mayor, and if during said 30 days a petition, signed by a certain number of electors, protesting against its passage, be presented to the council, the ordinance shall be suspended, and the council shall reconsider it, and, if it be not repealed, shall submit it to a vote of the electors. Held, that the 30-day period for filing the referendum petition commenced to run from the final passage of the ordinance by approval by the mayor, or its passage over his veto, and not from the date of its publication; the term "final passage" merely meaning favorable action on the ordinance by the council.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Suit by F. H. Solomon against George Alexander, Mayor of the City of Los Angeles, and others, to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haas, Garrett & Dunnigan, for appellant. Leslie R. Hewitt, Ex-City Atty., and John W. Shenk, City Atty., for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal involves a construction of the "referendum" provision of the city charter of the city of Los Angeles.

Section 39 of the charter provides that "all ordinances finally adopted under the provisions of this charter shall be published * * * by at least one insertion in some daily newspaper printed and published in the city of Los Angeles and until and without such publication * * * no ordinance shall be valid or take effect." Section 198b provides that no ordinance passed by the city council (except emergency and street improvement ordinances) "shall go into effect before 30 days from the time of its final passage and its approval by the mayor; and if during said 30 days a petition, signed by electors of the city equal in number to a certain percentage of the vote cast at the last preceding election for certain officers, protesting against the passage of such ordinance, be presented to the council, the same shall thereupon be suspended from going into operation and it shall be the duty of the council to reconsider such ordinance, and, if the same is not entirely repealed the council shall submit the ordinance, as provided in section 198a of this charter, to the vote of the electors of said city, either at the next general election or at a special election to be called for that purpose. * * *"

On October 5, 1909, the city council of the city of Los Angeles adopted an ordinance entitled "An ordinance regulating dance halls and providing for the granting and revocation of permits therefor," which ordinance was approved by the mayor of the city on October 16, 1909, and was published in the Los Angeles Daily Journal on October 19, 1909. On November 16, 1909, pursuant to said section 198b, and in an attempt to comply with its provision, a referendum petition was filed with the city clerk, but, notwithstanding its filing, the city council disregarded it, and refused to take any action upon it, on the ground that it had not been filed within the time provided in said section 198b of the charter.

Plaintiff, the proprietor of a public dance hall in the city of Los Angeles, alleging that the mayor and city council and chief of police maintained that the filing of said petition did not suspend the operation of said ordinance, and were proceeding to enforce it, to his irreparable injury, brought this action to enjoin the enforcement of said ordinance. A general demurrer to his complaint was sustained, and plaintiff declining to amend judgment was entered against him, from which this appeal is taken.

The only point involved on this appeal is, When does the 30-day period within which the referendum petition must be filed commence to run? Does it begin to run from the time of the approval of the ordinance by the mayor, or from the date of the publication of the ordinance?

In the present case, if it commenced to run from the date of the approval by the mayor, it is conceded by the appellant that the referendum petition was filed too late by a day. If, on the other hand, the time within which to file the petition ran from the publication of the ordinance, the petition was filed in ample time, and it was the duty of the council to have acted with reference to it as section 198b of the charter provides.

The position of the appellant is that by the use of the term "its final passage and approval by the mayor," in the referendum clause, is meant the publication of the ordinance, because section 39 of the charter provides that "an ordinance shall not be effective until its publication"; that "final passage" means the "taking effect" of the ordinance by publication.

We cannot agree with this claim. On the contrary, the publication of the ordinance has nothing to do with fixing the time when the right to file a referendum petition commences to run. Publication of the ordinance could not, at any time prior to the 30 days from the final passage and approval of the ordinance by the mayor, put the ordinance in force. The ordinance, it is true, could not become effective until after such publication; but such publication, if made at any time prior to 30 days after its final passage and approval, would only put the ordinance in a position of being capable of enforcement after the expiration of 30 days allowed for filing the referendum petition, because the referendum clause declares that the ordinance shall not go into effect until then. It could only go into effect 30 days after the final passage and approval, and then only if publication was made. If the referendum petition is filed within the 30 days, then the ordinance, as the referendum section further provides, is suspended from going into operation. This is true whether the ordinance has been published or not.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The stress of the argument of appellant is addressed to the use of the word "final," as it is employed in the referendum provision, "final passage and approval by the mayor of the ordinance." He insists that "final passage" includes putting the ordinance into effect by publication. But a construction of the charter provisions satisfies us that "final passage" of an ordinance, as used in the referendum clause, means something quite different from the taking effect of the ordinance by its publication.

Under the charter of Los Angeles, legislative power is vested in the city council to be exercised by ordinance, and subject to the power of approval or veto by the mayor, with further power in the city council to pass an ordinance over the veto of the mayor. When an ordinance receives the requisite favorable action of the city council and the approval of the mayor, it is "finally passed," and if it is returned by the mayor with his veto, and is passed thereover, it is equally "finally passed," though to this latter situation the term "finally passed" has more exact application. But, whether favorably acted on by the council and approved by the mayor, or favorably acted on over the veto of the mayor, such "final passage" has reference only to favorable legislative consideration of the ordinance by the council as distinct from the going into effect of the ordinance after such action and by publication.

Section 39 of the charter, which provides that all ordinances "finally adopted" shall be published, and until publication shall not take effect, is found among the provisions of the original charter of the city, adopted in 1889. The referendum section, suspending ordinances from going into effect before 30 days from the time of "final passage and approval," was inserted in the charter by amendment in 1903.

It will be observed that in section 39 ordinances "finally adopted" are then to be made effective by publication. This, of course, means final legislative action in passing an ordinance, as distinct from putting it into effect by publication; and this section recognizes them as entirely different things. There is no distinction in meaning between the phrase "finally adopted," as used in section 39, and "finally passed," as found in the referendum clause; they are synonymous, and, as "finally adopted" in section 39 does not mean taking effect of the ordinance by publication, but only favorable action by the council itself, so equally "finally passed" in the referendum clause does not mean taking effect by publication, but solely favorable action by the council on the ordinance.

Now, while we have considered more particularly the meaning of the phrase "finally passed," because under the charter this term would be applicable to final favorable action by the council in passing an ordinance. whether it received the approval of the mayor, or is passed over his veto, it is to be observed that by the referendum clause during 30 days from the time of its "final passage and approval by the mayor" the ordinance shall not go into effect, and if during said 30 days a petition, protesting against the passage of said ordinance, be presented to the council, it shall be suspended from going into operation. When the charter clause speaks of the "approval by the mayor" in connection with "final passage," there can be no doubt but that simply the legislative enactment of the ordinance is meant, as a period from which the 30 days to file a protesting petition shall begin.

This is the obvious meaning to be given to the section. The purpose was to afford the electors of the city a reasonable opportunity to protest against legislation which they deemed objectionable, and to provide for the filing of such protest before the ordinance became effectual. In such a scheme one of the essential things to be provided for was to fix a definite time within which such protest could be presented. To say that such time was intended to be from the publication of the ordinance provides no certainty as to time, because the charter does not provide when an ordinance shall be published after its passage and approval. On the other hand, after an ordinance is passed by the council, those interested in objecting to the ordinance know that the mayor has but 10 days after its presentation to him to act upon it. They can thus readily ascertain whether his action is favorable or adverse, and the result of the action of the council, if it is the latter, and govern themselves accordingly. There is a degree of certainty as to time by making the period for protesting run from the final passage, if passed over the veto of the mayor, or its final passage and approval if he approves it, which could not be afforded if the time was to run from the indefinite and uncertain period when the ordinance might be published.

Counsel for appellant cite us to a number of cases where it was held that the terms "after the passage of the act," "at the time of the passage of the act," or "prior to the time of the passage of the act," meant the time the act took effect. Harding v. People, 10 Colo. 387, 15 Pac. 727; State ex rel. Churchhill v. Bemis, 45 Neb. 724, 64 N. W. 348; Mills v. State Board, etc., 135 Mich. 525, 98 N. W. 19. But in these cases it was uncertain and doubtful when the act in question took effect; no time was specified, nor any definite language from which that fact could be ascertained. Under such circumstances, it is only a reasonable construction to hold that the passage of the act meant when it took effect. But in the referendum clause here the term "final passage" of the ordinance is not used alone, as was the term "passage of the act" in the cases cited. It is used in connection with the approval of the mayor. Effect must be given to this language, and no other effect can be given than that the time when legislative action was complete, and approved of is the date from which the right to file a referendum petition commences to run.

In this view the referendum petition here in question was filed too late, and the trial court properly sustained the demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur. The numerous decisions cited by counsel for appellant, holding that such expressions as "the final passage" (of legislative acts) refer to the date (subsequent to their approval by the executive) when, by their terms, or by constitutional provision, they first became operative, were made in cases involving the question whether the rights or duties of individuals or public officers were changed or affected by the act before the time it was to take effect. As to this question, it was necessarily held that "final passage" and similar expressions referred to the date when the act first became operative. It could not have been held otherwise without defeating the manifest policy of a constitutional or statutory provision suspending the obligation of a new rule of conduct until its terms can be made known, and the affairs of those affected by it adjusted to the changed conditions. No such principle of construction applies to the referendum provisions of the charter of Los Angeles, the avowed intention of which is to prevent an ordinance against which a sufficient protest is filed from ever taking effect, unless ratified by a popular vote. This case furnishes an illustration of how an ordinance could, under appellant's construction of the charter, become and be operative for one day, notwithstanding the opposition of a sufficient percentage of protestants, and cases can easily be supposed in which, upon the same construction, objectionable ordinances might become operative and remain so for weeks, and then be suspended by protest and finally defeated by popular vote. It is easy to see how much inconvenience and confusion this might involve.

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—DESCRIPTION BY METES AND BOUNDS—PROPERTY CONVEYED.

A mortgage covering a large tract, described therein by metes and bounds, includes any lots, blocks, and streets in an addition within the exterior limits of the tract described, though not specifically referring to them.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 554*)—FORECLOSURE—DEED—CONSTRUCTION—FAVORABLE TO GRANTOR.

Civ. Code, § 1069, requiring every grant by a public officer or body, as such, to a private party to be interpreted in favor of the grantor, refers to grants of public property, and does not apply to a sheriff's sale of private property under mortgage foreclosure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1582–1591; Dec. Dig. § 554.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 533*)—FORECLOSURE—SALE—INTEREST ACQUIRED.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 700, providing that the purchaser of real estate acquires all the right, title, and interest of the judgment debtor on the day of the levy of execution, where the judgment is not a lien upon the property, and, if it be a lien, acquires all the judgment debtor's interest on or after the date it became a lien, a purchaser under a sheriff's deed at mortgage foreclosure sale acquired all of the judgment debtor's right, title, and interest in the property when the mortgage lien attached.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1554; Dec. Dig. § 533.*]

4. BOUNDARIES (§ 20*)—PROPERTY CONVEYED—CENTER OF STREETS.

In view of Civ. Code, § 831, providing that an owner of land bounded by a street is presumed to own to its center, though the contrary may be shown, and section 1112, providing that a transfer of land bounded by a highway passes title to the soil to the center thereof, unless a different intent appears, a sheriff's deed upon mortgage foreclosure, conveying lots and blocks by numbers and letters, passed title to the purchaser to the middle of abutting streets; the sheriff's deed having the same effect as a deed from the mortgagor would have had.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Louise B. Freelon against H. A. Adrian and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Toland & Rogers and Morrison, Cope & Brobeck (Edward Hohfeld and W. I. Brobeck, of counsel), for appellant. G. H. Gould, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. In 1886 plaintiff owned a large tract of land in Santa Barbara county, a portion of which she platted into lots and blocks, and the map thereof entitled "Map of Las Piedras addition to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal.," was on February 10, 1888, recorded in the records of Santa Barbara county, having indorsed thereon a duly acknowledged grant, dedication, and abandonment to the public of a right of way over the streets platted on the map, which included, among others, certain streets, named Freelon avenue, Live Oak avenue, Loma, Orena, and Montgomery streets, which were laid out on the map as affording access to the lots in the blocks, and also bounding the blocks thereon. On May 14, 1892, plaintiff executed to William Barber a deed absolute in form, but intended as a mortage, which deed described the tract conveyed by metes and bounds, and included within its exterior limits, among other lands, the Las Piedras addition, although no reference was made to the addition or the map thereof, save to except from the conveyance a few lots and blocks described by reference to the map thereof. In 1895 this mortgage was foreclosed, and in that year the sheriff of the county of Santa Barbara issued to William Barber as purchaser at the execution sale under said decree of foreclosure a deed, which was duly recorded, and which, as far as involved here, conveyed part of the property mortgaged by designated lots and blocks as delineated on the map of the Las Piedras addition, and another part of said addition, lying north of Freelon avenue as delineated on said map, by metes and bounds, the north line of Freelon avenue being referred to as the southern boundary, which, with the other general boundaries, described an acreage of 51 acres. On December 9, 1895, William Barber conveyed to Sheffield and Edwards the 51 acres lying north of the north line of Freelon avenue, and described in the deed from the sheriff by metes and bounds, and in 1900 William Barber made a gift deed to his wife, Elizabeth J. Barber, of the other property described in the sheriff's deed to him. On October 3, 1901, Elizabeth J. Barber and Sheffield and Edwards decided to change the course of Freelon avenue, and for that purpose entered into an agreement and interchanged deeds, the effect of which, as far as it could be done by the parties, was to vacate Freelon avenue as delineated on the map of the Las Piedras addition, and to substitute therefor another avenue similarly named and running through the lands of Barber, Sheffield, and Edwards. This arrangement affected only that portion of Freelon avenue lying between the lands of Mrs. Barber and those of Sheffield and Edwards. Some four years subsequently Mrs. Barber had the Las Piedras addition south of Freelon avenue resurveyed, and a new map thereof made. In such survey and map some of the streets were retained as originally established, but Live Oak avenue and Loma, Montgomery, and Orena streets were closed and abandoned. Freelon avenue was also changed to conform to that avenue as relocated under the Barber, Sheffield, and Edwards agreement and deeds, and thereby a portion of said avenue abandoned. This map was entitled "Map of new subdivision of a portion of the Las Piedras addition to the city of Santa Barbara," and was filed for record on March 2, 1903, and on the same day the board of supervisors of Santa Barbara county (the lands being then outside the city limits of the city of Santa Barbara), upon the petition of Mrs. Barber theretofore filed, consenting to and praying for an order for the abandonment of the avenues and streets above described, made an order abandoning and discontinuing them, and accepting the streets as delineated on the new map. On February 21, 1908, plaintiff brought this action to quiet title to a large portion of the land described in the mortgage from her to William Barber, and the exterior limits of which embraced, together with other lands, that portion of the original, as well as the new, plat of the Las Piedras addition lying south of Freelon avenue, including the avenue itself. A large number of persons were made defendants, but Elizabeth J. Barber was alone served with process. She answered, denying that plaintiff had any interest in the property, alleged her own ownership to certain portions thereof, which alone are actually involved in this controversy, pleaded also the statute of limitations, and by cross-complaint asked that her title be quieted.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The findings of the court were in favor of defendant, except as to a small strip to which defendant disclaimed ownership, and which was awarded to plaintiff, and from the judgment thereon entered against plaintiff and in favor of defendant, quieting her title, plaintiff appeals, as she likewise does from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

While under her complaint plaintiff asserted title to a large tract of land including the Las Piedras addition, no claim to that extent was asserted on the trial; her sole claim of ownership being limited to the strips of land consisting of Freelon avenue, Live Oak avenue, and Loma, Montgomery, and Orena streets, as originally located on the map of said addition, and which were closed and abandoned under the resurvey and new map filed by Mrs. Barber on March 2, 1903, and all of which streets were vacated and discontinued by order of the board of supervisors of Santa Barbara county on that day. It appears from the record that none of the streets in the Las Piedras addition, otherwise called the Freelon map, have been used by the public; the platted tract being in its native condition. No interest of the public in any streets is involved here; the only question being one between the parties litigant as to the ownership of the strips of land represented by the streets above named, which were by the resurvey of the addition abandoned.

Appellant, in support of her claim of title to these abandoned streets and avenues, asserts that: (1) The filing of the map of the Las Piedras tract, in 1886, constituted merely an offer to dedicate to the public the avenues and streets indicated thereon. (2) The mortgage (in form a deed) from her to William Barber amounted to a withdrawal of this offer of dedication. (3) The description in the deed from the sheriff to William Barber under the foreclosure sale, by making reference to the lots and blocks by letter and number, conveyed only the lots and blocks so designated, and did not convey to Barber any title to streets on which said lots and blocks abutted. (4) The sheriff's deed to Barber for that portion of the tract north of Freelon avenue did not convey title to the avenue itself. (5) Whatever title Barber acquired depended on the deed to him from the sheriff, and as the foreclosure out of which it issued was a proceeding in invitum such deed must be construed most strongly against the grantee under it. Claiming that all these points are well taken, appellant insists that she never parted with her title to these avenues and streets.

[1] We will not discuss the claims urged under the first two points, namely, that the filing of the Las Piedras map was merely an offer to dedicate, and that the mortgage to William Barber amounted to a withdrawal of the dedication. Let it be conceded that all this is true, yet, we do not perceive how it is of any advantage to appellant. If the filing of the map was a mere offer to dedicate, which the mortgage to Barber had the effect of withdrawing, she retained no title to any of the avenues and streets delineated upon the map which did not pass to Barber under the mortgage to him, if its descriptive calls were sufficient to include them. And they were. Her mortgage to him was not solely of the lots and blocks in the Las Piedras addition by dimensions or by metes and bounds, even if that fact would be of any importance in determining the quantum of title that passed under such a description. The description in the mortgage was in fact of a large tract of land of which the Las Piedras addition was only a part, and the tract was described by metes and bounds, which included within its exterior limits the entire addition, and the effect of such a description in the mortgage was to impress a lien upon the entire title and interest of the appellant of all property owned by her within its exterior calls. It operated as any other conveyance would, and conveyed all the title which appellant had to any property included within the description in the mortgage, and if she owned lots and blocks and streets within the addition, as that addition was brought within the general exterior boundaries, whatever interest she had therein, and of whatever character, was embraced in the mortgage.

The third point advanced by appellant is that, as the description in the deed from the sheriff to Barber under the foreclosure proceedings was by reference to lots and blocks by letter and number, such a description served to convey only the lots and blocks so designated, and did not give the grantee title to the streets and avenues upon which said lots and blocks abutted. The particular claim of the appellant in this regard is that, as it appears from an inspection of the map referred to in the deed that all Barber was having conveyed to him were lots and blocks included within scientifically defined lines and measured by precise number of feet, that expression was thus given by the deed that the conveyance to him was only of lots and blocks having a definite number of square feet of land, and excluded the idea that title to the streets abutting thereon was intended to pass.

[2] In this connection is made the fifth point that in construing the sheriff's deed to Barber a construction must be placed upon it most strictly against the grantee; appellant citing, as supporting this latter proposition, section 1069 of the Civil Code; Cullen v. Sprigg, 83 Cal. 63, 23 Pac. 222; and Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 175, 50 Pac. 277. But neither the section quoted nor the cases cited have any relation to conveyances by sheriffs. They have reference to grants of public property by public officers or public bodies to private persons. The Cullen Case speaks "of public grants to private persons," and "grants by the state" are referred to in the Oakland Case. As to the map having the dimensions marked upon it, this is true as it is usually true of any correct map of a subdivision or addition. But the conveyance to Barber is not of lots and blocks by precise numbers of feet, but by numbers or letters, which is not, of course, a conveyance by metes and bounds.

[3] The mortgage of the appellant to Barber embraced her title to all lots, blocks, and streets in the addition, and was subject to sale in satisfaction of the indebtedness secured thereby. Under a sheriff's deed, a purchaser acquires all the right, title, and interest of the judgment debtor in the property sold. Code Civ. Proc. § 700. When such a deed is executed, by the doctrine of relation, it is deemed and taken as though executed as at the date when the lien of which it is the sequence originated (Foorman v. Wallace, 75 Cal. 552, 17 Pac. 680), and "the effect of the sale is itself * * * to invest in the purchaser the title of the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage." Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600–610, 29 Pac. 220, 222.

Section 831 of the Civil Code provides that "an owner of land bounded by a road or street is presumed to own to the center of the way, but the contrary may be shown;" and section 1112 of the same Code provides that "a transfer of land bounded by a highway passes the title of the person whose estate is conveyed to the soil of the highway in front to the center thereof unless a different intent appears from the grant." If the appellant had made a deed to Barber of the lots and blocks in the Las Piedras addition, designating them simply as streets and blocks therein, it would not be questioned for a moment but that under such a conveyance his title extended to the middle of the street upon which said lots and blocks so conveyed abutted, and if the conveyance had been of all the lots and blocks in the addition, simply designated as such, he would have taken title to all the streets.

[4] So, under the authorities above referred to, there is no good reason to be advanced why the sheriff's deed, which is in effect the deed of appellant, and is deemed to be executed as on the date of the mortgage under which title to these streets was conveyed, should not be given the same effect, and be held to grant and convey the same title, as her simple conveyance would have done.

The conclusion we have reached makes it unnecessary particularly to discuss the fourth point made as to Freelon avenue. Title to it passed under the sheriff's deed to Barber as effectually as did the title to the other streets involved in the action. Our conclusion that title to these avenues and streets vested in Barber under the sheriff's deed, and by conveyance from him to defendant, makes it unneccessary to consider the claim of appellant that she had acquired title thereto by adverse possession.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by George M. Pruitt against the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial after verdict and judgment against him, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Halsted and S. M. Johnstone, for appellant. Morton, Pruitt & Goodrich, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal, originally before the District Court of Appeal for the Second appellate district, resulted in a judgment affirming the order of the superior court, granting the plaintiff a new trial after verdict and judgment against him. A petition for rehearing in this court was thereafter granted.

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal, written by the late Justice Taggart, is as follows:

"Action by father to recover damages for loss of 16 year old son, who died from injuries sustained by the derailment of one of defendant's trains while the son was a passenger thereon. Verdict and judgment were for defendant, and a motion by plaintiff for a new trial was granted. This appeal is by defendant from the order of the superior court, granting a new trial.

"Defendant is a common carrier of passengers, operating a line of railroad between San Pedro, Cal., and Salt Lake, Utah, via the cities of Los Angeles and Pomona, Cal. On the morning of March 3, 1907, Walter C. Pruitt, the son of plaintiff, purchased a ticket from defendant, and became a passenger upon one of its regular trains from Pomona to Los Angeles. He rode in the smoking car until within the city limits and near Seventh street of Los Angeles city, at which point he and a companion by the name of Thomas went upon the front platform of the smoker next to the baggage car. At or about the time they did so, the train ran into an open switch, and was derailed and wrecked. The engine was overturned, and the baggage car wrenched from between the smoker and the engine, so that the front end and platform of the smoker came into collision with the engine, and Pruitt and his companion were both thrown about the platform and injured, and so scalded by the steam escaping from the boiler of the engine that they died in a few hours. There was some conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the young men had reached the platform at the time of the accident, but the jury found in response to a special interrogatory submitted to them that Pruitt was upon the platform, and this is sustained by evidence.

"It appears from a stipulation, read in evidence that prior to the accident, and just before reaching Seventh street, the train was running at a speed of 35 to 40 miles an hour. That the train whistle blew, the Fourth street station was announced by the conductor, and the speed was reduced to about 25 miles per hour when the accident occurred. That the distance from Seventh street to Fourth street station is 2,500 feet. That the train was going to stop at the Fourth street station, and that after the whistle blew, and the station was announced, and the train had slackened its speed, Pruitt and Thomas arose from the seat in which they were riding, which was the fourth from the front door of the car, and stated in the hearing of passengers in the car that they were going to get off at the Fourth street station. That at least half a dozen other passengers in the same car, who intended to leave the train at that station, arose simultaneously with Pruitt and Thomas from their respective seats, and were making preparation to leave the car. None of the passengers, except Pruitt and Thomas, left the inside of the car, or were scalded or bruised or seriously injured, or injured at all, except a few slightly. The smoking car left the rails, but was not overturned or wrecked or injured to any material extent. That there was conspicuously posted on both ends of, and inside of each and every car, the printed rules and regulations of defendant, regarding the conduct of passengers, in plain, conspicuous type, among which rules was the following: 'Notice to Passengers. (1st) Passengers are not allowed to ride on the engine, or on the baggage, mail or express cars, or on platform or steps of cars, and are required to remain in their seats while train is in motion, and at all times to keep their heads and arms inside of the car windows.' At all the times mentioned, there were vacant seats in the car that Pruitt and Thomas might have occupied, if they had so desired.

"Acting upon the theory that, if it were shown that Pruitt was injured on the platform of the car in violation of the printed regulation so posted, under the provisions of sections 483 and 484 of the Civil Code, the corporation defendant was not liable for damages for the injuries sustained by him, the trial court advised the jury that there was but one thing for them to consider: 'That is whether or not Walter C. Pruitt, the deceased, was on the platform at the time of the accident;' and in accordance with this view instructed them: 'If you believe from the testimony that he was, then the plaintiff cannot recover.' It was the contention of plaintiff that it is not the intent and purpose of the sections of the Code mentioned to require that a passenger remain quietly in his seat in a railroad car until the train comes to a full stop at the station before arising and preparing to go out of the car; and he requested the court to give to the jury certain instructions framed upon the theory that whether or not Pruitt was negligent in going upon the platform after the whistle blew, the station had been announced, and the speed of the train had slackened, was to be determined by the jury as a question of fact. These instructions the trial court refused to give.

"Another instruction given by the court advised the jury that: 'The deceased had a right to presume that the train upon which he was riding would stop long enough at the Fourth street station to enable him and the other passengers to alight after the train should come to a stop. He was not required to and should not, before the train came to a stop, go upon the platform to be ready to get off when it did stop.' This instruction embodies a literal application of section 484, when taken alone. In reaching the true intent and purpose of the law, these two sections (483 and 484) must be construed together. As originally enacted, section 483 was in the form of a proviso to a section of an act, of which section 484 was the principal clause, entitled 'Act to provide for incorporation of railroads and the management thereof,' etc. Section 48, Stats. 1861, p. 625. The apparent purpose of this section (48), and of the sections of the Code (483 and 484), was to absolve railroad companies from liability for injury to passengers who were riding upon the platform in violation of the posted rules, provided there were seats furnished for them to occupy inside the car, but it cannot be presumed in the face of the commonly known habits of the traveling public, and the conveniences arranged for travelers by the railroads in this state, that it was intended thereby to say, as the last-mentioned instruction in effect says, that if a passenger goes upon the platform of a car, and is injured while there, the railroad company may by the posting of such a rule absolve itself from liability, whatever the circumstances, purpose, motive, or reason which induced him to go, provided the train was in motion at the time, and regardless of the cause of the injury.

[1] "If a passenger voluntarily goes upon the platform solely for the purpose of riding there, notwithstanding accommodations are provided for him within the car, the intent of the law would no doubt justify a trial court in instructing the jury, as a matter of law, that the railroad company is not liable, because the passenger has violated its rules. But where the question of the necessity of a passenger going upon the platform is involved, as, for instance, where he is seeking to protect himself against an anticipated or threatened injury, or there is an invitation, either implied or express, by the company to do that which requires that he go upon the platform, while the train is in motion (for example, to move from one car to another in order to smoke at the place or in the car provided for that purpose, or to go to the dining car for the purpose of eating, or where the train stops at a way or flag station and the time to get off is limited and he is asked, or beckoned to, by the conductor to come to the platform, so that he will be ready to get off with the least possible delay to the train), it can hardly be said that the going upon the platform is a violation of the rule, or within the meaning and intent of the law. Under such circumstances, the question whether it is necessary, or there is such an invitation from the railroad company as to constitute a waiver of the violation of its posted rules, or to estop it from taking advantage of such violation, is a mixed one of law and fact, and should be submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions.

"That the case before us is among the last-mentioned classes is held by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in the case of Thomas v. San Pedro, etc., Co., 170 Fed. 129 [95 C. C. A. 371], wherein the question of law before the United States court was the same as that now before us, and arose upon the facts attending the injuries and death of Thomas, the companion of Pruitt, caused by the same accident; the two cases being identical in the respect here considered. The court in the Thomas Case reviews quite a number of decisions from other jurisdictions, but rests its conclusion upon a construction of sections 483 and 484 of the Civil Code made by the Supreme Court of this state in Mitchell v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 87 Cal. 62 [25 Pac. 245, 11 L. R. A. 130].

[2-4] "The sounding of the whistle, the announcement of the station, the reduction of speed, the nearness of approach to the station, the length of time ordinarily given for passengers to leave the train at this station, the number of passengers who expect to alight, etc., were all facts to be considered in determining whether there was such an invitation as released the deceased from his obligation to obey the rules and regulations relating to remaining in his seat while the train was in motion. They were to be considered in determining whether Pruitt acted with ordinary prudence in preparing to get off the train. What constitutes ordinary prudence is always a matter of relative significance. The special circumstances and surroundings of each case are to be noted and the conduct of the parties tested by the standard of what would be the conduct of a reasonably prudent man under a similar state of affairs. If the state of facts is such that all reasonable minds must draw the same conclusion therefrom, the court may say, as a matter of law that contributory negligence has been established; but, if reasonable men may fairly differ in such conclusion, the question of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury, and this whether the facts be conflicting or undisputed. Johnson v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 154 Cal. 285, 295 [97 Pac. 520].

"While a difference may be recognized between this case and one in which the ordinary question of contributory negligence is involved, because of the application of the provisions of section 484, nevertheless the invitational character of the acts of the defendant, and their relation to its responsibility, are all matters affecting the question of the contributory negligence of the deceased, and determinable in the same manner. The New York Court of Appeals, in the case of Buel v. New York Cent. R. R. Co., 31 N. Y. 319 [88 Am. Dec. 271] (a case approved by our Supreme Court in Mitchell v. S. P. Co., supra), says: 'The statute was intended to prevent the imprudent act of standing or riding on the platform, but not to absolve railroad companies from responsibility for every injury which might happen at that place, when a passenger is passing over it, while jutifiably entering or leaving the car.' So it is said in the Thomas Case: 'It is also usual for passengers to prepare to leave their car before the train reaches the station at the place of destination, and they are permitted to proceed towards and sometimes upon the platform of the car for that purpose while the train is still in motion. It is therefore manifest that this rule is subject to the qualification that a passenger may leave his seat in a car while the train is in motion and go upon the platform of the car if, under all the circumstances, such action is prudent and careful, and whether it is so or not is a question of fact for the jury.'"

This decision of the District Court reaches what we deem to be the proper construction to be given to sections 483 and 484 of the Civil Code. In its opinion the District Court refers only to the cases of Mitchell v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., 87 Cal. 62, 25 Pac. 245, 11 L. R. A. 130, and the case of Buell v. New York Central R. R. Co., 31 N. Y. 319, 88 Am. Dec. 271, cited therein, and Thomas v. San Pedro, etc., Co., 170 Fed. 129, 95 C.

C. A. 371, in support of its conclusion, and it is earnestly insisted by appellant that the Mitchell Case (which he claims should control the question in this state) not only does not sustain the contention of the District Court of Appeal, but, on the contrary, is opposed to it, as is the weight of authority elsewhere. In the case here at bar, the superior court refused to instruct the jury, at the request of plaintiff, that it was for them to determine as a question of fact whether, under the circumstances attending his going upon the platform contrary to the rules of the company, the deceased was or was not guilty of contributory negligence. On the contrary, the court instructed them that the only question to be considered by them was whether, when the accident occurred, the defendant was or was not on the platform, and if they found he was plaintiff could not recover. The right of the plaintiff to have the jury thus pass upon the question of negligence as a question of fact was denied, and the court by refusing, on the one hand, to instruct the jury as requested by plaintiff, and in giving, on the other hand, the instruction asked by defendant, took that question from them and decided, as matter of law, that if the deceased was on the platform when the accident occurred, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, it constituted negligence per se, which precluded a recovery by plaintiff.

Appellant claims that this view of the court and the instruction so given to the jury in harmony with it are supported by the Mitchell Case referred to above; that under that authority the conduct of the deceased in this case in going upon the platform to be ready to alight from the train when it stopped at the station, was unnecessary and in violation of the rules and therefore per se negligence. But there is nothing in the Mitchell Case upon which any such claim can be based. In that case the train on which plaintiff was injured, in running down a heavy grade on a new and curved track, was derailed, and plaintiff injured. When the train began to descend the grade, plaintiff was in the smoking car, but had left it, and was on the platform when the accident occurred. He testified that the steepness of the grade and unusual speed at which the train was descending it, in connection with the fact that the road was new and temporary, led him to believe that an accident would occur; that he left the smoking car and went out on the platform, intending to jump therefrom to the sand on the inside of the curve, whereby he would escape with less injury than if he remained on the car, but that he had no sooner got to the platform than the car was overturned, and he was thrown to the ground and injured. The defendant offered evidence tending to show that plaintiff had been on the platform some minutes before the accident occurred and on the theory of this defense the court instructed the jury as to contributory negligence. Plaintiff obtained a verdict. On appeal the instructions given on the trial were brought under review.

One instruction was: "If you find from the evidence that at the time plaintiff left his seat in the smoking car there was no imminent peril of life or limb and no apparent danger, but that such imminent peril of life or limb or apparent danger arose after plaintiff took his position on the platform of the car, then plaintiff cannot recover and your verdict must be for the defendant." This court approved this instruction, and it is from such approval that appellant insists that the views and instruction of the trial court were correct; that, as the deceased was on the platform for the purpose only of alighting from the train when it reached the station, he was voluntarily and unnecessarily there, in violation of the rules of the company, and that the trial court properly instructed the jury to that effect as matter of law. Undoubtedly, as under the facts stated in this instruction in the Mitchell Case, where a passenger, while the train is in motion, is riding upon a platform thereof at his own volition, and without any necessity, real or apparent, for being there, this will constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law. And if the deceased in the case here was upon the platform under such circumstances, as matter of law he was guilty of contributory negligence. This would follow, of course, because all reasonable minds under such circumstances could only reach one conclusion—that of negligence. But where, as pointed out and discussed in the above opinion of the District Court of Appeal, the facts and circumstances surrounding and accompanying the act of the deceased in going upon the platform are such that reasonable men might differ upon the question whether his presence there constituted contributory negligence or not, a question of fact is presented to be determined by the jury under proper instructions.

In the Mitchell Case itself, the question whether Mitchell, in being upon the platform at the time the accident occurred, was or was not guilty of contributory negligence was submitted to the jury as a question of fact. In addition to the instruction above quoted, the court, among other instructions, in the Mitchell Case, gave the following: "If you believe that plaintiff went upon the platform under reasonable apprehension of a derailment of the train, and for the purpose of jumping off in case of an accident, and while there for that purpose was injured by the overturning of the car, I instruct you that his being on the platform under these circumstances was not riding or standing on the platform within the meaning of the rule which prohibits such riding or standing." The court further instructed them: "If the danger of overturning was imminent, and the plaintiff, acting upon the instinct of self-preservation, placed himself in the position which appeared to him, as a reasonable man, to be most safe, and make such choice as a person of ordinary prudence and care, placed in the same situation, might have made, this does not constitute negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The peril of remaining in the car or going upon the platform is to be judged by the circumstances as they then appeared, and not by the result." These instructions were also approved.

It will be observed from these instructions that no rule is laid down in the Mitchell Case that the presence of a passenger on the platform, in violation of the rules of the company, constitutes of itself contributory negligence, but, on the contrary, that whether he was acting with ordinary care and prudence, or was negligent in going on the platform, was to be determined by a consideration of all the facts and circumstances attending his being there. The Mitchell Case recognizes that the rules of the company, posted in compliance with the Civil Code sections, are not absolute and inflexible, but are subject to the qualification as declared in the above opinion of the District Court of Appeal, and whether one is or is not guilty of contributory negligence in going upon the platform of a car while it is in motion, in violation of the rules of the company, depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, and is to be determined by a consideration of whether, under all the circumstances, his conduct in doing so was prudent and careful, and whether it was or was not is a question to be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court.

Whether a passenger is negligent or not in leaving his seat and approaching towards the platform or is actually on the platform of a train while it is motion, in violation of the rules and regulations of the company, after the station at which he intends to leave the train has been announced and the train is approaching, is held in the following cases to be a question of fact for the jury: Schultze v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 32 Mo. App. 438; Scheiber v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 61 Minn. 499, 63 N. W. 1034; Barden v. Boston, Clinton & Fitchburg R. R. Co., 121 Mass. 426; Newton v. Central Vermont R. Co., 80 Hun, 491, 30 N. Y. Supp. 488; Balt. & O. Ry. Co. v. Meyers, 62 Fed. 367, 10 C. C. A. 485; Thomas v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co., 170 Fed. 129, 95 C. C. A. 371; Wylde v. Northern R. R. Co., 53 N. Y. 156; Romine v. Evansville, etc., R. R. Co., 24 Ind. App. 230, 56 N. E. 245; Lane v. Spokane Falls & N. R. Co., 21 Wash. 119, 57 Pac. 367, 46 L. R. A. 153, 75 Am. St. Rep. 821.

In Schultze v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., supra, the facts were practically the same as here, and the statute of Missouri under consideration there similar to our section 484 of the Civil Code. In that case the engine whistle blew, the porter announced the station where the plaintiff, a passenger, was to get off, and the train slackened its speed. Plaintiff went to the platform and stepped down on the steps, thinking the train was stopping. Discovering that it was not, he started to go back into the car, and a sudden jerk of the train threw him off, injuring him. This being substantially all the evidence, the defendant, at the close of the case of plaintiff, moved for an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, which was denied. Plaintiff had judgment, and on appeal defendant raised as error the denial of its motion for an instruction. In passing on this question, the court said: "It is difficult to see what act or acts of plaintiff in this case could be imputed to him as negligence. He was a passenger to Lee's Summit, and expected to get off there; the whistle was blown for this station, the train began to check, and the porter passed through the car and announced the station. There certainly was nothing careless or unreasonable in the conduct of plaintiff in preparing to get off the train. While he might have remained in his seat until the train came to a standstill at the depot, his approaching the door and platform in the manner stated in his evidence certainly was not such contributory negligence as to disprove the cause of action stated in his petition. He evidently expected to alight from the train. * * * In our opinion, the case at bar does not fall within the spirit and object of section 800 of the Revised Statutes, 1879. It cannot be reasonably claimed that the plaintiff was riding or remaining on the platform of the car in the sense condemned in this statute. As before suggested, he was induced to go there to alight from the train by the conduct of defendant's agents and servants. The whistle signaled the station, the train checked, the porter announced the station—what might have been reasonably expected of a passenger expecting to leave the train at that point? * * * The defendant will not be heard to say that the plaintiff's conduct under such circumstances is negligent for the purpose of a defense to the action."

In Scheiber v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., supra, the Minnesota court said: "It is not negligence per se for a passenger in a railway car, as it approaches a station, to leave his seat and go to the door of the car in order to alight when it stops; neither is it such negligence under all circumstances, for him to ride on the platform, or go upon it before the car stops for the purpose of getting off when it does stop, for there may be cases where from necessity, or by the express or implied invitation of those in charge of the train, a prudent man would do so; but, in the absence of such facts, it is such negligence."

In Thomas v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. Ry. Co., supra, the facts were identical with those here. In fact, Pruitt and Thomas were fellow passengers on the train of defendant, left their seats together, and started for the platform with the intention of alighting at the station which was their destination, when they were both so badly injured as to cause their death. The same attorneys who represent the respective parties in this case were also attorneys in the Thomas Case. In that case the circuit court before which it was tried granted the motion of defendant for a nonsuit; the court deciding as matter of law that deceased, Thomas, was guilty of contributory negligence in going on the platform of the car while in motion, in violation of the rules and regulations of defendant. The Circuit Court of Appeals in reversing the judgment went into a full examination of the authorities on both sides (practically the same as are cited here), quoted from them, and pointed out that the cases relied on by appellant here and cited there were clearly distinguishable in their facts from those presented in the case at bar, and holding that under the same facts presented there, and which are involved here, it could not be said in view of the authorities that the conduct of the deceased in going upon the platform was so reckless or negligent as to make the question of his contributory negligence one of law; that it was a question upon which reasonable minds may differ, and therefore a question of fact to be determined by the jury under proper instructions.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. Section 484 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "Every railroad corporation must have printed and conspicuously posted on the inside of its passenger-cars its rules and regulations regarding fare and conduct of its passengers; and in case any passenger is injured on or from the platform of a car, or on any baggage, wood, gravel, or freight car, in violation of such printed regulations or in violation of positive verbal instructions or injunctions given to such passenger in person by any officer of the train, the corporation is not responsible for damages for such injuries, unless the corporation failed to comply with the provisions of the preceding section." It is then a positive law of this state, to which we are bound to give effect, that, in case any passenger is injured on or from the platform of a car in violation of the printed and conspicuously posted regulations of the company, the company is not responsible in damages for such injury. It is admitted that among the printed and conspiciously posted regulations of this company was the following: "Notice to Passengers. (1st) Passengers are not allowed to ride on the engine, or on the baggage, mail or express cars, or on the platform or steps of cars, and are required to remain in their seats while the train is in motion." That this is a salutary rule, and that its observance would have saved the life of plaintiff's son, is proved by the fact that he and his companion alone, of all the passengers on the train, were seriously injured by the accident which cost them their lives, and this solely by reason of the fact that they had left their seats and gone upon the platform of their car while the train was moving at the rate of 25 miles an hour. Such being the case, it is not what was decided or left undecided in Mitchell v. So. Pac. R. R. Co. that bars a recovery of damages, but it is the positive terms of a statute which, in my opinion, is not subject to the qualifications and exception which are imposed upon it by the opinion of the court.

BARENDT v. McCARTHY, Mayor, et al.

(S. F. 5,507.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1911. On Petition for Rehearing, Oct. 7, 1911.)

1. OFFICERS (§ 82*)—INJUNCTION—PURPOSE OF RELIEF—TITLE TO PUBLIC OFFICE.

Injunction does not lie to try title to public office.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

2. OFFICERS (§ 82*)—INJUNCTION—PURPOSE OF RELIEF—PROTECTION OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

While title to public office may not be tried in an injunction suit, equity will protect the possession of de facto officers by injunction pending quo warranto proceedings to determine their title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

3. OFFICERS (§ 82*)—INJUNCTION—PURPOSES OF WRIT—TITLE TO PUBLIC OFFICE—DE FACTO OFFICERS.

The mayor of a city, with power to appoint and remove members of the board of health, gave due notice of the removal of plaintiff and the other officers of the board of health, and appointed others in their place, all apparently pursuant to the city charter, and, the office of the board of health being locked and plaintiff having the keys, the new appointees had the door opened and took possession, and are conducting the business of the board in the usual manner. Held, that the mayor's appointees were at least de facto members of the board, and an injunction will not be granted, restraining them from removing plaintiff from the actual possession of his office as a member of the board; proceedings in the nature of quo warranto being his remedy.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George Sturtevant, Judge.

Suit by Arthur H. Barendt against P. H. McCarthy, Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco, and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Barclay Henley and Arthur H. Barendt, for appellant. Cleveland L. Dam, George Appell, and A. L. O'Grady, for respondents McCarthy and Sharp. Frank J. Murphy, for respondent Martin.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants. The complaint alleged that Arthur H. Barendt was a member of the board of health of the city and county of San Francisco, duly appointed; that the mayor and chief of police of that city and county had, in the absence of the health officer and the members of the board of health, broken into the headquarters of the board, and had placed in possession thereof Arthur M. Sharp, as a pretended successor of plaintiff, and other persons, assuming to succeed plaintiff's associates. The complaint further averred that the appointees of the present mayor assumed to hold a meeting as a board of health; that they had organized by electing a president and secretary; and that they pretended to exercise authority over all the departments properly subject to the control of plaintiff and his associates. There was a further averment that defendant P. H. McCarthy claimed a right, as mayor of the city and county of San Francisco, to remove plaintiff from office, and that in the exercise of that asserted authority he had made an order purporting to declare plaintiff's place on the board of health vacated, and to substitute Arthur M. Sharp in his stead. The power and authority of the mayor in the premises was denied, and an injunction was prayed, restraining defendants from removing or attempting to remove plaintiff from actual possession of his office as a member of the board of health of the city and county of San Francisco.

To this complaint defendants demurred, and thereafter the matter was heard on an order to show cause. At the hearing the following facts appeared by affidavit: On January 28, 1910, Mayor P. H. McCarthy, of the city and county of San Francisco, made an order removing Arthur H. Barendt, George B. Somers, William F. Wilson, Thomas W. Huntington, and Joseph E. Cutten, as members of the board of health, immediately notified the board of supervisors of such removal, and furnished said supervisors with a statement of the cause for his action. This statement was entered of record in the proceedings of the said board of supervisors. Among the causes for the removal specified in the statement were acts of plaintiff and his associates in "willfully and knowingly appointing to positions in the health department of the said city and county persons not qualified for and not eligible to such positions and willfully and knowingly approving and auditing the salary demands of the said persons." The mayor then made an order appointing Arthur M. Sharp, Germain Pouchan, Frank J. Klimm, Thomas B. Roche, and Dennis J. Murray, members of the board of health, and certificates of appointment were delivered to said appointees. On January 31, 1910, the holders of the certificates from the mayor went to the office of the board of health, presented their credentials to the chief clerk, and demanded entry into the meeting room of the board. Finding the door locked, and being informed that the health officer alone had a key, they secured the services of a locksmith, who opened the door for them. No member of the board of health as it was constituted prior to January 31, 1910, was present while the members of the new board were gaining entrance to the meeting room. Four days later the complaint herein was filed.

[1] It is thoroughly settled that title to public office may not be tried in a suit for an injunction. Mr. High, in his work on Injunctions, says (4th Ed. § 1312): "No principle of the law of injunctions and perhaps no doctrine of equity jurisprudence, is more definitely fixed or more clearly established than that courts of equity will not interfere by injunction to determine questions concerning the appointment or election of public officers, or their title to office; such questions being of a purely legal nature, and cognizable only by courts of law. A court of equity will not permit itself to be made the forum for determining disputed questions of title to public offices, or for the trial of contested elections, but will in all such cases leave the claimant of the office to pursue the statutory remedy, if there be such, or the common-law remedy by proceedings in the nature of a quo warranto." In White v. Berry, 171 U. S. 377, 18 Sup. Ct. 917, 921 (43 L. Ed. 199), Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, quoted approvingly from the opinion in Sawyer's Case, 124 U. S. 223, 8 Sup. Ct. 482, 31 L. Ed. 402, as follows: "It is equally well settled that a court of equity has no jurisdiction over the appointment and removal of public officers, whether the power of removal is vested, as well as that of appointment, in executive or administrative boards, or officers, or is intrusted to a judicial tribunal. The jurisdiction to determine the title to a public office belongs exclusively to the courts of law, and is exercised either by certiorari, error, or appeal, or by mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, or information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, according to the circumstances of the case, and the mode of procedure established by common law or by statute. No English case has been found of a bill for an injunction to restrain the appointment or removal of a municipal officer. But an information in the court of chancery for the regulation of Harrow School within its undoubted jurisdiction over public charities was dismissed, so far as it sought a removal of governors unlawfully elected; Sir William Grant saying: 'This court, I apprehend, has no jurisdiction with regard either to the election, or a motion of corporators of any description.' Attorney General v. Clarendon, 17 Ves. 488, 491. In the courts of the several states, the power of a court of equity to restrain by injunction the removal of a municipal officer has been denied in many well-considered cases; citing Tappen v. Gray, 3 Edw. Ch. [N. Y.] 450, reversed by Chancellor Walworth on appeal, 9 Paige [N. Y.] 507, 509, 512, whose decree was affirmed by the Court of Errors (7 Hill [N. Y.] 259); Hagner v. Heyberger, 7 Watts & S. [Pa.] 104 [42 Am. Dec. 220]; Updegraff v. Crans, 47 Pa. 103; Cochran v. McCleary, 22 Iowa, 75; Delahanty v. Warner, 75 Ill. 185 [20 Am. Rep. 237]; Sheridan v. Colvin, 78 Ill. 237; Beebe v. Robinson, 52 Ala. 66; and Moulton v. Reid, 54 Ala. 320." He also quoted with approval the language of Judge Lurton (who was at that time a circuit judge), in Morgan v. Nunn (C. C.) 84 Fed. 553, to the effect that: "A court of equity will not, by injunction, restrain an executive officer from making a wrongful removal of a subordinate appointee, nor restrain the appointment of another."

[2] But, while equity will not determine title to public office in a case of this kind, appellant invokes the rule that the possession of officers de facto will be protected by injunction pending a litigation in the nature of quo warranto to determine their title. He maintains that, although he and his associates are not in physical possession of the books, papers, and meeting place of the board of health, they are the de facto members of that body, and are entitled to be restored to that possession of which they were deprived by the trickery and intrusion of the men appointed by Mayor McCarthy.

[3] But the mere fact that possession of the place of business and indicia of an office was obtained by entrance in the absence of former holders, or even by force when they were present, does not of necessity entitle those persons thus dispossessed to reinstatement pending the determination of the legal title. Scott v. Sheehan, 145 Cal. 691, 79 Pac. 353; Brower v. Kantner, 190 Pa. 182, 43 Atl. 7. In the present case, the respondent members of the board of health are in possession of the office, exercising the functions thereof, under color of authority. It is immaterial, for the purposes of this discussion, whether or not the mayor may remove a municipal officer without a hearing, and thus create a vacancy. To decide that question would be determining the title to the office. The membership of the board of health of San Francisco is a "municipal affair" (People v. Williamson, 135 Cal. 415, 67 Pac. 504), and therefore, having proceeded under the provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, the mayor has bestowed upon his appointees a color of title, no matter what might hereafter be determined in a proper action regarding the right of the deposed officers to notice of the charges against them and a hearing thereon. The charter of the city and county of San Francisco vests in the mayor the power to appoint members of the board of health. Article 10, § 1. The members of the board being appointed by him may be removed for cause. Article 16, § 18. And the mayor seems to have followed the provisions of the charter with reference to notifying the board of supervisors of the cause of removal of an officer, and his statement of such cause seems to have been entered of record in the proceedings of the board in accordance with the charter. Article 16, § 20. Certain it is that the appointees must be recognized as persons acting under commissions issued by the proper authority, and as persons conducting the business of the board of health in the usual manner. They have color of authority, possession of the indicia of office, and they are serving the public as the board of health, having so served for several days before the appellant sought the intervention of a court of equity. That they are de facto officers admits of small doubt.

This is not a case where "two contending boards are simultaneously acting." Morton v. Broderick, 118 Cal. 485, 50 Pac. 644. In such a case title to the office de jure draws to it the possession de facto, which, as was said in the case last cited, "is but a concise expression of the rule that in mandamus, where conflicting boards of officers are acting simultaneously, each under a claim of right, since there cannot be two de facto boards or officers, that one alone will be recognized as the de facto board or officer which is acting at the time under the better apparent legal right." But here, as we have seen, the assertion of the appellant that he is a de facto officer is not based upon any claim that he and his associates have performed duties of a board of health since January 31, 1910. The case of Braidy v. Theritt, 17 Kan. 468, has been cited by appellant as supporting his theory. In that case an officer was granted a writ after he had been out of office 13 days. An analysis of that case, however, will show that it is really not opposed to the views here expressed. Theritt had been re-elected councilman, and had received his certificate. Braidy claimed the same office by appointment from the mayor, but held no certificate. When the latter presented himself at the meeting place of the council to claim his office, Theritt caused other councilmen to withdraw with him, intending that there should be no quorum for the transaction of business. The office being legislative, Braidy could perform its functions only by participating in a meeting of the legislative body. The court found that prior to Theritt's withdrawal Braidy had not exercised any of the duties of the office; that Theritt's withdrawal from the meeting was only for the purpose of preventing a quorum from assembling, not being in any sense an abandonment of his claim to the office; and that Theritt having the certificate of election was entitled to be considered still in possession of the office. Braidy, not having performed any of the functions of the office before Theritt's temporary absence, and having no color of title, was properly held to be neither an officer de facto nor de jure. In this case, however, the members last appointed to the board of health had been commissioned, had entered upon the duties of the office, and were holding its indicia, and were actually serving the public as members of the board of health when plaintiff first sought relief by injunction. They had actually taken part in the business of the board. We cannot escape the conclusion that even if they obtained their advantage by trickery, as appellant asserts, they were the de facto officers at the time relief by injunction against them was sought, and that therefore the writ prayed for was properly refused. Plaintiff had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the statutory equivalent for proceedings in the nature of quo warranto. It follows that the conclusions reached by the learned chancellor who presided at the hearing in the superior court were correct, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

SLOSS, J. I dissent. At a time when the plaintiff and his associates were lawfully occupying positions as members of the board of health, the mayor undertook to remove them and to appoint other persons in their places. While the fact is not stated in so many words, it appears clearly enough from the averments of the complaint that the mayor took this action without any notice to the incumbents, and without affording them any opportunity to be heard in their defense. On January 31, 1910, the persons appointed as successors went to the rooms occupied as the offices of the board of health. The plaintiff and his associates were not present, but demand was made of an inspector that such new appointees be admitted to the rooms of the board. It was found that the rooms were locked, whereupon, after unsuccessful efforts to gain entry through the window and by means of a fire escape, recourse was had to the services of a locksmith, who opened the door. The new appointees then took possession of the rooms and of all the official records and papers of said board. Two days thereafter, on February 2, 1910, the plaintiff verified the complaint herein, and the action was commenced on the 4th of February. The plaintiff and his associates never acquiesced in the attempt to remove them from office, and never abandoned their offices. On the contrary, they proceeded with all reasonable diligence to assert their rights to possession, and their intention to contest the legality of the mayor's action.

On these facts it seems clear to me that the plaintiff was entitled to the injunction which he sought. It is, of course, the established rule that a court of equity will not take jurisdiction of an action for the purpose of trying the title to public office. But it is also well settled that, where there is a bona fide contest between two persons, both claiming to be entitled to the same office, a court of equity will issue its injunction to protect the officer in possession against the interference of an adverse claimant, until the latter has established his title by appropriate proceedings at law. High on Injunctions (3d Ed.) § 1315; Brady v. Sweetland, 13 Kan. 41; Braidy v. Theritt, 17 Kan. 468; Guillotte v. Poincy, 41 La. Ann. 333, 6 South. 507, 5 L. R. A. 403; Goldman v. Gillespie, 43 La. Ann. 83, 8 South. 880; State v. Superior Court, 17 Wash. 12, 48 Pac. 741, 61 Am. St. Rep. 893; Reemelin v. Mosby, 47 Ohio St. 570, 26 N. E. 717; City of Huntington v. Cast, 149 Ind. 255, 48 N. E. 1025; Sullivan v. Haacke, 5 Ohio N. P. 26. The soundness of this proposition is not questioned in the main opinion. It is, however, stated that on the facts here shown the new appointees, rather than the plaintiff and his associates, were in possession of the office. I think this conclusion rests upon a mistaken view as to what constitutes possession of an office. An office is a franchise; it consists of the exercise of intangible rights and duties pertaining to its occupant; and possession of the office does not depend on the mere physical holding of the rooms and furniture ordinarily used in the performance of the functions of the office. Mead v. Treasurer, 36 Mich. 416; Lawrence v. Hanley, 84 Mich. 399, 47 N. W. 753; Brady v. Sweetland, supra; Braidy v. Theritt, supra; Sullivan v. Haacke, supra. Actual possession can be obtained from the occupant of an office by his surrender or abandonment of the office, or by his ouster in the course of legal proceedings, and in no other way. Oliver v. Jersey City, 63 N. J. Law, 653, 44 Atl. 709, 48 L. R. A. 412, 76 Am. St. Rep. 228; Mead v. Treasurer, supra; State v. Draper, 48 Mo. 213; Hallgren v. Campbell, 82 Mich. 255, 46 N. W. 381, 9 L. R. A. 408, 21 Am. St. Rep. 557; Braidy v. Theritt, supra; In re Cleveland, 51 N. J. Law, 311, 17 Atl. 772.

If the plaintiff and his associates had been in session as a board of health at the time of the entry of the persons assuming to act as their successors, and the latter had forcibly thrown them out of the rooms and installed themselves therein, it would hardly, I think, be claimed that possession of the office had at once passed from the old board to the new. I do not think the case is any different where, in the absence of the occupant, access to the rooms is obtained surreptitiously or, as in this case, by the use of such force as is involved in picking the lock of the door. "It would be a strange doctrine to announce," says the court in Braidy v. Theritt, supra, "that whenever an officer steps out of the place where he usually does business that any person who may choose to claim the office may at once step in, and become immediately an officer de facto. Such a short road to obtain a contested office has never yet been opened." A person asserting title to an office which he finds to be occupied and claimed by another should not be permitted to establish his disputed right by resort to the kind of means here employed. Nothing can be more unseemly or detrimental to the public interest than a struggle between contending claimants for the physical possession of rooms, documents, and records employed in the performance of the functions of a public office. Proceedings in the nature of quo warranto (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 803-810) furnish an adequate and the appropriate remedy for usurpation of office. This is, indeed, recognized by the majority opinion, but I think the court misapplies the doctrine in saying that this remedy was open to the plaintiff. In my view the plaintiff, being first in possession, and not having surrendered or abandoned his right, was entitled to the protection of the writ of injunction. The defendants, who were seeking to oust him, were the ones who should have been compelled to resort to proceedings in a court of law to establish their right. Scott v. Sheehan, 145 Cal. 661, 79 Pac. 353, should not be regarded as an authority supporting the position of the respondents here. The decision in that case was made immediately after the disputed question of title to the office had been finally adjudicated (Sheehan v. Scott, 145 Cal. 684, 79 Pac. 350), and the appeal from the order of injunction presented a moot question, or, as the court puts it, one "purely of academic interest." Under these circumstances, the finding of the trial court was sustained without a careful examination of the evidence.

I think the judgment should be reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

SHAW, J. The appellant asks a rehearing of this case upon the ground that the decision and some remarks in the opinion conflict with the decision and opinion in Bannerman v. Boyle, 116 Pac. 732, decided June 8, 1911.

There is nothing inconsistent in the two decisions. They determine different questions upon different facts. In this case the title to the office is not, and could not be, in issue. The decision, in brief, is that if one is a de facto officer (that is, in actual peaceable possession of the office, claiming the right to hold it and regularly performing its duties), his title cannot be assailed by a suit in equity to enjoin him from doing so; nor will an injunction issue upon a suit by the true holder of the title to an office to restrain the usurper and others from removing the true holder, where it appears that the true holder was ousted, and the usurper was in peaceable and undisturbed possession at the time suit is begun, and for the four days next preceding. The decision in the Bannerman Case, upon the question on which it is supposed to conflict, was that, under the conditions there existing, a de jure officer who has been unlawfully ousted may compel payment of his salary by a suit in mandamus against the auditor, that in such mandamus suit the title of the plaintiff to the office may be put in issue and tried, and that, under the San Francisco charter, a member of the board of education cannot be removed by the mayor, except for good cause, and after he has been given a hearing as to the cause, or an opportunity to be heard thereon. The usurper was not a party in the Bannerman Case. Neither the auditor nor any authorized representative of the city or state is a party to the Barendt suit. The respective points decided in the two cases have no bearing on each other.

At the time these things took place, a removal without hearing of a San Francisco officer was generally believed to be lawful, under the supposed application of the decision of In re Carter, 141 Cal. 316, 74 Pac.

997, a case under the San Diego charter, to the provisions of the San Francisco charter. This indicates that Barendt's removal was not made in bad faith by the mayor, and that the persons appointed by him to fill the supposed vacancies believed they had the right of possession. The opposite inference would be drawn since the decision in the Bannerman Case that such removal cannot be made without a previous hearing. In view of the provisions of sections 75 and 76 of the Penal Code, making it a misdemeanor to willfully and knowingly intrude into an office to which the intruder has not been elected or lawfully appointed, and a felony for one to withhold from his successor an office after his term has expired, or to willfully and unlawfully withhold from any person entitled thereto any property, records, or papers belonging to the office, it is not likely that other attempts of this kind will occur in the future.

In explanation of the language of the opinion in this case, it is to be remarked that this case was first submitted and the opinion herein was written before the Bannerman Case was decided; otherwise some of the statements in the opinion might perhaps have been omitted as unnecessary to the discussion. Counsel misunderstand the effect of the remark in the opinion that "the mayor seems to have followed the provisions of the charter with respect to notifying the board of supervisors of the cause of removal of an officer, and his statement of such cause seems to have been entered of record in the proceedings of the board in accordance with the charter." These things were done regularly as the charter prescribes, but in the connection in which this passage occurs it does not mean that the removal was for that reason valid, without any previous hearing as to the cause. These facts were stated solely as foundation for the argument that these records, coupled with a certificate of appointment by the mayor, regular on its face, gave defendant, Sharp, color of title to the office.

[4-6] The decision does not leave the people or the ousted officer without civil remedies. Such officer may obtain his salary, as stated, or he may apply for leave to sue in quo warranto, which we must assume would be granted in all proper cases, thus giving a remedy for both the officer and the people. The people would also be entitled to protection by the auditor or treasurer withholding the salary of the office from the usurper, in which event the usurpation, if it should occur, would probably soon come to an end.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

CUTTEN v. McCARTHY, Mayor, et al. SOMERS v. SAME. HUNTINGTON v. SAME. (S. F. 5,511, 5,512, 5,513.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1911. Rehearing Denied Oct. 7, 1911.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George Sturtevant, Judge.

Suits by Joseph E. Cutten, by George B. Somers, and by Thomas W. Huntington against P. H. McCarthy, Mayor, and others. From decrees for defendants in each case, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Barclay Henley and Arthur H. Barendt, for appellants. Cleveland L. Dam, George Appell, and A. L. O'Grady, for respondents McCarthy and Sharp. Frank J. Murphy, for respondent Martin.

PER CURIAM. These cases being exactly similar in all particulars to Barendt v. McCarthy (S. F. No. 5,507) 118 Pac. 228, in which the opinion was filed this day, the judgment of the lower court in each of them is, upon authority of that case, affirmed.

BOUCHARD v. ABRAHAMSEN et al. (S. F. 5,248.)

1. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 42*)—ISLANDS—RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN OWNERS.

Where defendant's patent granted under a survey bounded his land by the meander line of a navigable river, defendant's land extended only to the high-water mark, and an island or accumulation formed in the channel of the river did not belong to defendant, but was subject to Civ. Code, § 1016, providing that islands and accumulations formed in the bed of navigable streams belong to the state if there is no title or prescription to the contrary, and, even though it subsequently became attached to defendant's land, he could only claim to the point of the last channel between the island and his land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 253-255; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

2. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 42*)—NATURAL WATER COURSES—RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN OWNERS.

In an action involving title to land forming in a navigable river which defendant claimed was included in his patent to the mainland, and which plaintiff claimed was subject to Civ. Code, § 1016, declaring that all islands or accumulations of land formed in the beds of navigable streams belong to the state, an instruction charging the jury to find for defendant unless the land was an island was erroneous in failing to take account of the accumulations mentioned in the statute.

3. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 42*)—RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN OWNERS—INSTRUCTIONS.

and which plaintiff claimed was subject to Civ. Code, § 1016, declaring that islands or accumulations of land formed in the beds of navigable streams belong to the state, an instruction charging the jury that if they found that this land was not an island, and was included within the meander line of defendant's property, their verdict should be for defendant, in connection with an instruction charging that to constitute an island in a river the same must be of permanent character, and not surrounded by water when the river was high, was erroneous, not only in directing the jury to consider the present condition of the island, when the controlling consideration was what was its nature at the time defendant acquired the mainland, but in incorrectly interpreting the statute.

4. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 37*)—LANDS UNDER WATER—PATENTS—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a patent to public land called for the meander line of a river as located in a survey made some years earlier, the patentee took only to the high-water mark described in the survey with such accretions as might have been added since.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Clifton H. Connick, Judge.

Action by Henry Bouchard against Jesse Abrahamsen and another. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying his motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. F. Quinn and L. F. Puter, for appellant. F. A. Cutler and Frank R. Sweasey, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action in ejectment to recover from the defendants the possession of the western portion of what is known as Coonskin Island, situated on Lower Eel river, in the county of Humboldt. The complaint charged in two counts. The first alleged ownership, possession, right of possession, and ouster by defendants. The second rested upon possession and right of possession only, with ouster by defendants. The answer was by denial. The cause was tried before a jury, which rendered a general verdict in favor of the defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

To the understanding of the legal contentions, it is proper to say that the evidence establishes without conflict that the land in controversy was originally formed in the navigable waters of Eel river about a mile and a half above its mouth by a drift or snag in the river channel. This drift, originally of small dimensions, checked the current and caused the deposit of detritus, thus gradually forming an island. As is usual in such cases, the accretions were for the most part added to the lower end, so that the river here running westerly the westerly end of this island gathered accretions and continued to grow. The island had its beginning in 1866. Eel river about this island is admittedly a navigable stream. The island was for years separated from the mainland by two channels. That to the south, though the narrower and shallower, was often used by sailing vessels in their river commerce. The river here is affected by the ocean tides, and at the time of the trial of this action, while there was a dispute in the testimony as to whether the channel between the south bank and the island was absolutely dry at low tide, it was undisputed that at other stages of the tide there was water in the channel from 100 feet to 150 yards in width. The island thus continued to grow until at the time of the trial it contained more than 21 acres of land. Plaintiff and defendant Andreason owned land upon the mainland south of the river; the bank of the river at high tide being the limit of their northerly boundaries. Their lands are contiguous, and the dividing line projected into the river and across the island would divide the latter into two unequal portions; the western portion being formed by the latest accretions. This is gravelly and unfit for cultivation, but possesses a value for fishing purposes. In 1903 defendant Andreason built a dividing fence across the island and took and continued to hold possession of this western part, asserting that it belonged to him by virtue of his patent to the shorelands from the state.

So far the evidence is without conflict, and, indeed, there is very little conflict between any parts of the evidence. Thus, it is shown by plaintiff without substantial conflict that in 1886 he purchased from the state the mainland opposite the eastern portion of the island, that he found the whole island unoccupied, that he took possession of the whole of it and proceeded to exercise and continued to exercise full dominion and control over all of it. He cleared it of brush and raised crops upon such part of it as was suitable for cultivation, and he built a fence running north and south through the island, which fence was constructed along the line of high tide and inclosed and protected the cultivable land from wandering cattle. The land outside of the fence was sandy and gravelly and not suitable for cultivation, and, moreover, it was impracticable to maintain a fence further westward than the line where he constructed his fence because it would be washed away by high water and the tides. He did, however, use the western portion in all suitable ways. There was a cabin upon it, and for years he rented the cabin with fishing privileges. He gathered the driftwood which settled upon the lower end, and prohibited others from taking the driftwood.

When the cattle of defendant Abrahamsen (the tenant of defendant Andreason) wandered out to the island, as they occasionally did, he always caused them to be driven off. No one else ever exercised any acts of dominion or control over the island during these many years, though Abrahamsen and Andreason were both well aware of his possession and claim of right of possession, and, finally, plaintiff had the land surveyed, and from and including the years 1898 and 1899 and continuously thereafter it had been assessed to him and he had paid all taxes. The description and assessment covered the western portion of the island, the portion here in controversy.

The defendant Andreason testified that he had been in possession of the island since 1884, but from his subsequent evidence it is quite plain that this use of the word "possession" is his own conclusion, for that testimony is to the following effect: Witness had known the island since 1884 when he purchased the mainland from the state. He lived upon his land for about two years, when he leased it. During the time he was there, he never drove his cattle to the island, and, when they wandered over, he would bring them back. He did not take any interest in the island after he rented his place in 1886. He never cut a stick of wood on the island or sunk a hole in the ground prior to the time when he put up his fence in February, 1903. He never put any mark to show any dividing line between his land and Bouchard's and never had the island surveyed. Unless his patent to the mainland carried with it the western portion of the island, he had never paid any taxes upon the island. The evidence of Abrahamsen, Andreason's tenant, was to the effect that he had been a tenant and had had possession of Andreason's land for about 15 years. His cows went over onto the island whenever they were down by the river. He had no notice from Mr. Bouchard that the latter claimed the western end of the island. He knew of the cabin there, and he knew that it was occupied. Mr. Bouchard told him that he could not let any fishermen in the cabin, and he replied that he did not care. He knew that Bouchard had built the fence. Mr. Bouchard and the members of his family always drove off his cattle when they went onto the west end of the island. He never told them that he had the island under lease and had a right to have his cattle there. All that he told them was that when they drove his cattle off he did not want them "dogged"; that is, he did not want them forced to run. He never made a complaint about driving his cattle off other than to tell the boy he did not want his cows "dogged." He never drove any of his cattle over to the island. He did not look after the island and did not do any act upon the island. His landlord, Mr. Andreason, never took him over and put him in possession of the island. Whenever he saw his cattle upon the island he himself always drove them home.

[1] Defendant's additional evidence touching title is that he is the owner of the mainland embraced in swamp land survey 41, the northern boundary of which lands follow the meanderings of the south bank of the Eel river. Defendant's land by this survey and patent, of course, extends no further than high-water mark on the river. Heckman v. Swett, 99 Cal. 303, 33 Pac. 1099. Section 1016 of the Civil Code declares that "islands and accumulations of land formed in the beds of streams which are navigable belong to the state if there is no title or prescription to the contrary." Defendant's contention is that Coonskin Island is not an island belonging to the state within the meaning of this language, but (quoting from their brief) "that the waters of Eel river suddenly changed its channel and that this (Coonskin Island) was at best a sand bar extending from defendant Andreason's land, defendant's northern boundary forming the south bank of Eel river; that, as the meander line established by swamp and overflow survey 41 was coincident with the south bank of Eel river, the land in controversy was within this meander line, and, consequently, was a part of the lands patented; that Eel river always flowed north of Coonskin Island, and at no time did any portion of it flow in its natural course between said land and the upland of defendant; that there was a depression on the south side through which water ran only during an extreme high tide."

We have thus been at pains to set forth the evidence, not in consideration of the proposition that it is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury since that question in the condition of the record is not before us, but because it is necessary that the evidence and varying contentions of counsel should be clearly understood when we come to review the instructions of the court which are complained of by appellant. Whatever may have been the condition of Coonskin Island at the time of the trial, no doubt can be entertained from the evidence that it was originally a true island formed in the channel of a navigable stream. There is no word of evidence "that the waters of Eel river suddenly changed its channel and thus made a sand bar." The testimony is overwhelming and is undisputed that it was formed as above described, and that it was an island at the time plaintiff acquired the mainland south of it. But, if by any conceivable interpretation of the evidence it could be said that it was not originally an island, still it was not a sand bar formed by a sudden change of channel "and extending out from defendant Andreason's land." If it was not a true island, the utmost that can be said is that it was an accumulation of land contemplated by section 1016 of the Civil Code original title to which belonged in the state. And, finally, it should be added that, if in the course of time and by the process of shoaling such island or accumulation did become attached to the mainland defendant's patent, calling for the meander line of the south bank of Eel river at high water would not and could not be stretched so as to include this land. Such meander lines upon the banks of streams subject their owners to loss by erosion and a corresponding gain by slow accretion. The utmost that defendant could claim in such a case would be an extension of his line to the point of the last vestage of the channel between the island and his land, the accretions of the island belonging to the island and the accretions upon the south bank belonging to the mainland. This, however, is a very different thing from claiming title to an island or to an accumulation because subsequent changes connect it with the mainland, and in this case, as we have said, even the connection with the mainland is in sharp dispute, the evidence of the defense at the utmost being to the proposition that at low tide there is such connection. Fillmore v. Jennings, 78 Cal. 635, 21 Pac. 536; Glassell v. Hansen, 135 Cal. 547, 67 Pac. 964; Buse v. Russell, 86 Mo. 209; Salem Imp. Co. v. McCourt, 26 Or. 93, 41 Pac. 1105; Hahn v. Dawson, 134 Mo. 581, 36 S. W. 233; Benne v. Miller, 149 Mo. 228, 50 S. W. 824; Bellefontaine Imp. Co. v. Niedringhaus, 181 Ill. 426, 55 N. E. 184, 72 Am. St. Rep. 269; Moore v. Farmer, 156 Mo. 33, 56 S. W. 493, 79 Am. St. Rep. 504; Holman v. Hodges, 112 Iowa, 714, 84 N. W. 950, 58 L. R. A. 673, 84 Am. St. Rep. 367.

The test of the true character of Coonskin Island is not what court or jury may find to be its present condition, but what was its form at the time the state parted with its title to the mainland? If at that time it was an island or an accumulation in waters admittedly navigable, then it belonged to the state and subsequent shoaling of the waters whereby a connection was made with the mainland would not operate to change or divest the original title. Again, it is equally well settled that the accretions to such an island or accumulation become part of the island or accumulation itself, and the possession of the island or the accumulation is a possession of such accretions. Bellefontaine Imp. Co. v. Niedringhaus, 181 Ill. 426, 55 N. E. 184, 72 Am. St. Rep. 269.

[2, 3] A just complaint made against the instructions given in this case is that the court refused to charge in the precise language of section 1016 of the Civil Code, and likewise failed to enlighten the jury upon the principle of law above adverted to, namely, that it was the condition of the land at the time the state parted with its title to the adjacent mainland and not at the time of the trial which determined its character. Thus instruction 20 is as follows: "If you find from the evidence that Eel river is a navigable stream and in which at the point where the land in dispute lies the tide ebbs and flows, and that said Eel river is the northern boundary line of defendant's land, then I charge you that, although said boundary line is one which may gradually and imperceptibly change, yet it became and is a certain and fixed boundary of defendant's land and up to which his legal title extends; and, if you find from the evidence that the land in controversy not being an island lies between the said meander line as established by that state survey and the southern bank or water line of Eel river, then I charge you that the defendant Andreason was the owner of said land and entitled to the possession of the same on the 15th day of February, 1903, unless you find from the evidence that he had in some manner become divested of the same." This instruction takes no account of the fact that the land, even if it were not an island, still if it were an accumulation would belong to the state, and would not be included in defendant's patent. But even more serious than this is the declaration that "if you find from the evidence that the land in controversy not being an island lies between the said meander line," etc. Here the jury was instructed that the character of the land at the time the state parted with its title to the mainland was not only not controlling, but was not to be considered, and that the present condition alone was to be regarded by them, and so if they found that it is not an island, and is included within the meander line, it belonged to defendant. The misleading character of this instruction is emphasized by the one next given, where the court charged that "to constitute an island in a river the same must be of a permanent character, not merely surrounded by water, when the river is high, but permanently surrounded by a channel of the river and not a sand bar subject to overflow by a rise in the river and connected with the land when the water is low." This instruction again directs the attention of the jury to the present condition of Coonskin Island when the controlling consideration is what was its nature at the time defendant acquired the riparian mainland. Land originally an island and formed in the bed of a navigable stream belongs to the state, but even if not originally an island, or if after originating as an island it ceases to be an island and becomes an accumulation, such land also belongs to the state, and an instruction to the effect that land not an island formed in the bed of a navigable stream does not belong to the state excludes such accumulation, and is therefore erroneous. Instructions touching accumulations were proffered by plaintiff, but, as has been said, were refused by the court.

[4] It was also error for the court to instruct that defendant would take by his patent to high-water mark as it existed at the date of the patent. He would take to the high-water mark described in survey 41 made 10 years before his patent with such accretions as might have been added since. Glassell v. Hansen, supra; Buse v. Russell, supra; Salem Imp. Co. v. McCourt, 26 Or. 93, 41 Pac. 1105; Hahn v. Dawson, 134 Mo. 581, 36 S. W. 233.

For these reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: MELVIN, J.; SHAW, J; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.

LAWYER v. LOS ANGELES PAC. CO.

(L. A. 2,622.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1911.)

1. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—OPERATION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE OF PERSON INJURED—PERSONS WALKING ON TRACKS.

On alighting from a street car, plaintiff started to walk down the track, there being no sidewalks, and heard a car following him, and saw the headlight. Being near the left track and out of danger from the right, he proceeded, and was struck by the car which, contrary to usual custom, was upon the left track. Held that, as it is not negligence per se to walk between the tracks of a street railway, and as plaintiff had a right to believe the cars would be operated in their usual way, he was not guilty of negligence as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 239–257; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 165*) — NONSUIT — INFERENCES FROM EVIDENCE.

In determining the propriety of nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's case, the evidence most favorable to plaintiff must be accepted as true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 374; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 5*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING NEGLIGENCE PER SE.

No act which the majority of men would do under similar circumstances, and which is usually done with safety, is negligence per se.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—TAKING CASE FROM JURY.

Where reasonable minds might draw different conclusions as to the question of negligence, it is one for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277–353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIONS.

In an action by a pedestrian run down by a street car, where he alleged that no bell or whistle was sounded, and the defendant denied that allegation, an objection was properly sustained to a question asking him if he would have heard any whistle or bell sounded within two blocks of where he was struck, as calling for the conclusion of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2159; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIONS.

In an action by plaintiff, who was run down by a street car, a question as to whether, when the witness first saw plaintiff, he was in a position where the car would strike him was improper in calling for a conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149–2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

7. STREET RAILROADS (§ 113*)—OPERATION—INJURIES—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action by plaintiff, who was run down while walking upon the tracks of a street railroad, testimony as to when the brakes were applied after striking plaintiff was immaterial, bearing neither upon the issue of the speed of the car, nor showing care not to injure plaintiff.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by Thomas Lawyer against the Los Angeles Pacific Company. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying his motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Gray, Barker & Bowen and Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, for appellant. Gurney E. Newlin, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial in his action for damages for personal injuries. Defendant's motion for nonsuit was granted, and we are called upon to determine whether or not the court erred in its action on said motion. The evidence in plaintiff's behalf showed that at the time of the injury he was walking between the tracks of the defendant corporation on Santa Monica avenue, in the county of Los Angeles. The hour was between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening. Plaintiff left the car at Vermont avenue, and started westerly along Santa Monica avenue toward his home. After walking about four blocks, he came to a place where there was no sidewalk, and as the street was muddy he took a well-beaten path near defendant's south track, which he followed in its course beside the track for a distance of 150 feet, and then, still using the path, went across the south track to the space between the two tracks, where the beaten footway continued. In his account of the accident, plaintiff testified: "There was a street intersecting Santa Monica avenue from the north, and I had just passed, crossed that street on Santa Monica avenue, about 30 feet, when I saw a light flash on the north track, and I heard the car coming, and then stepped back to the south track, and I expected the car to run on the north track, so I stepped to the south. I stopped and looked around, facing the north, and looked to the east. Just happened to look around, and saw the car within 10 feet of me, and I made a quick dodge, but it came too fast. I could not dodge it. I dodged off towards the north track." The step of the car struck plaintiff, and he sustained very severe injuries. At the time of the accident, the rain was falling, the mud was deep, and the footpath between the tracks was the only convenient place for pedestrians. The space between the inner rails of the two tracks was about 9 feet in width, and in this strip were placed the poles from which the trolley wires were suspended. The car was running very rapidly at the time of the accident, and the bell had not been sounded, nor had the whistle been blown, while the car was traversing more than two blocks to the eastward of the point where plaintiff was struck. Contrary to custom, the car was being operated in a westerly direction on the south or left-hand track. Plaintiff's showing, therefore, is that he was proceeding along a beaten pathway between defendant's tracks; that defendant's car approached him from the rear without any sound of bell or whistle and moving contrary to custom on the left-hand track; that seeing the flash of the headlight on the track upon which the car proceeding in that direction was commonly operated he hastened to a place supposed by him to be a safe one, and which ordinarily would have placed him out of danger; and that he was then struck by the car, which was running very rapidly.

[1] Respondent concedes that plaintiff introduced at the trial sufficient evidence to make out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant in the operation of the car, but the granting of the motion for nonsuit is defended upon the ground that the evidence conclusively established such negligence on the part of plaintiff as contributed proximately to cause the accident. Appellant insists that the question whether or not he was guilty of contributory negligence was one of fact for the jury, and that under the evidence his conduct was not such that the court could say, as matter of law, that he was guilty of negligence. Being between the tracks of an electric railroad upon a public street is not negligence per se. The street is for the use of the public, although the car, which can be operated only on the track, has the better right to that part of the thoroughfare, to which pedestrians must yield when necessary. The rights of a company operating street cars are otherwise not superior to those of persons who may be walking on the street. See Shea v. Potrero & Bay View R. R. Co., 44 Cal. 428; Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 279, 55 Pac. 908; Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Traction Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 Pac. 677. The person walking upon that part of the street near the tracks of an electric railway has a right to believe that those in charge of the street cars will operate them in the usual manner, and will take the customary precautions. The rights and duties of the pedestrian and the motorman in a case like this are reciprocal, and the conduct of either must be considered in the light of all of the circumstances of the particular case in determining whether or not it amounted to negligence. Here the plaintiff had the right to expect that defendant's servant would sound the warning bell as the car approached, particularly because he had just passed a cross street. He naturally and properly expected that any west-bound car would be run according to custom on the north track. It is true that after plaintiff left the sidewalk, he saw a light in the direction of Vermont avenue, but it was more than 1,000 feet distant, and he could not tell whether it was the headlight of a car or a street lamp. Under such circumstances, it was not his duty to postpone his entry upon the path between the tracks until he became certain of the source of this light. His first intimation of the car's approach was the flashing of the headlight on the north track and the rumbling of the car. He was then near enough to the south track to be in danger from a car traveling on it, and out of the way of any car that might be moving on the north track. He walked about 10 feet after he saw the flash of the headlight, turned toward the north and east, and then saw the car almost upon him, approaching on the south track.

[2] There is some contradiction in his testimony regarding the number of feet traversed by him after he saw the gleam of the headlight, but we must take the version most favorable to plaintiff in determining the propriety of a nonsuit.

[3] Can we say that plaintiff's conduct under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence offered in his behalf amounted to negligence per se? No act "which the majority of men would do in the existing circumstances, and which we may presume is usually done in safety, is negligence per se." Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Traction Co., supra. Measured by this standard, we think that the action of the court below in granting the motion for nonsuit was improper.

[4] This, we think, is clearly a case covered by the rule that, "if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury." Johnson v. S. P. R. R. Co., 154 Cal. 295, 97 Pac. 525. Our attention has been called to the case of North Chicago St. R. R. Co. v. Irwin, 202 Ill. 347, 66 N. E. 1077, which is almost on all fours with the one at bar. There the essential facts were as follows: Plaintiff's decedent was riding a bicycle between the tracks of the railroad company, going in the same direction as the car. The hour was near midnight and the car, contrary to the usual custom, was running on the left-hand instead of the right-hand, track. The speed was from 12 to 15 miles an hour. When within 25 or 35 feet of the rider, the motorman sounded his gong, but did not slacken the speed of the car. The man on the bicycle turned to go from the space between the tracks upon the left-hand track, and was struck by the car and killed. In the opinion sustaining the denial of appellant corporation's motion for a peremptory verdict in its favor, this language, peculiarly applicable to the matter we are here considering, is used: "Whether the motorman was in the exercise of ordinary care for the safety of persons who might be upon the street, or the appellee's testator guilty of contributory negligence, were properly regarded by the trial court as being questions of fact. There was no allegation in the declaration that propelling the car northward upon the westerly or south-bound track was an act of negligence, still the court did not err in permitting the appellee to prove the existence of the custom of running all north-bound cars on the east track and all south-bound cars on the west track. The existence of this custom entered into the consideration of the question whether the motorman was in the exercise of ordinary care in propelling the car northwards on the west track at such a rate of speed as 12 or 15 miles per hour, and also bore upon the question of the carefulness or negligence of the deceased in leaving the space between the tracks and going upon the west track, in order to be out of danger from a car moving northward."

[5] The plaintiff, who was a witness in his own behalf (after he had testified that no bell or whistle was sounded on the approaching car before it struck him), was asked the following question: "If any bell or whistle had been sounded within two blocks from where you were struck that night, could you have heard it?" The court sustained the objection upon the ground that a conclusion of the witness was called for. This ruling was correct. The answer contained a denial of the allegation in the complaint that no bell was sounded and no whistle was blown as the car approached plaintiff. One of the questions which, under the pleadings and proof, the jury would have been called upon to determine was this issue of fact. The question propounded to Mr. Lawyer was not within the rule announced in Raymond v. Glover, 122 Cal. 471, 55 Pac. 398. In that case a witness was permitted to testify that one person was within hearing of a remark made by another, on the ground that "nonprofessional witnesses are allowed to express opinions based on facts within their personal observation, when the facts cannot be so described as to enable another to draw any intelligent conclusion therefrom."

[6] The court properly refused to permit Miss Carrie Byers, a witness, to state whether or not, when she first observed Mr. Lawyer about 200 feet ahead of the car, he was in a position where the car would strike him. Obviously any declaration on that subject would be a conclusion drawn by her from the facts—a deduction which the jury might make, as well as the witness. However, on cross-examination, Miss Byers did testify without objection that plaintiff was "where he would be hit."

[7] The court did not err in sustaining the objection to the question propounded to witness Byers: "How long after Mr. Lawyer was struck was it before the brake was applied?" The speed of the car was a matter in issue, and there was some evidence regarding the distance the car moved after striking plaintiff. It therefore would have been proper to inquire at what distance from the point at which Mr. Lawyer was struck the brakes were applied, but we do not see how the length of time elapsing between the impact of the car against the man and the application of the brakes would be material.

No other suggested errors require attention. The judgment and order are reversed.

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 86*)—EXECUTORY CONTRACT—ABANDONMENT BY PURCHASER.

Plaintiff bought land for an orchard, paying therefor and taking title in himself, induced by assurances of C., resulting in the making by them of a contract, whereby C. was to pay plaintiff half the purchase price, and share in the profits and losses of the orchard, and the course of cultivation and management indicated by C. should be followed. Held, that the consideration being executory, so far as C. was concerned, and he never having paid anything, by way of service or otherwise, but having, on demand for payment, repudiated his agreement, and refused to pay, he by his repudiation lost all rights under the contract, so that, nothing having been done to re-establish them, title to the land was properly quieted in plaintiff.

HENSHAW, J. This action was to quiet title. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and from that judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial defendant Carroll Allen, trustee in bankruptcy of defendant John H. Carruthers, prosecutes this appeal.

[1] We think a brief narration of the facts leading up to this litigation will prove sufficient of themselves to dispose of appellant's contentions. Plaintiff purchased and paid the sum of $8,000 for a lemon grove, taking title in himself. He was measurably induced so to do by the assurances of defendant John H. Carruthers, which resulted in plaintiff and Carruthers entering into a contract whereby Carruthers was to pay plaintiff $4,000—one-half of the purchase price—and to share in the profits and losses of the orchard. Plaintiff not being a citrus orchardist and defendant Carruthers representing that he was, it was provided that in "general matters of cultivation and management the course mainly to be followed should be indicated by the said John H. Carruthers." This purchase was made on October 24, 1907. In due course plaintiff made demand upon Carruthers to pay the $4,000, manifestly the principal consideration for the agreement, and Carruthers repudiated his agreement and refused to pay. In August 1908, Carruthers was adjudged a bankrupt debtor, and defendant Carroll Allen was elected trustee of his bankrupt estate. Carruthers never paid any part of the purchase price of the land, even after demand, declined and refused to pay, and never paid anything else to the plaintiff by way of service or otherwise. The assignee in insolvency asserting a claim to some interest in the land, this action was brought. Even in his answer there is no offer to pay the $4,000 which his bankrupt had refused to pay, nor in any other way is it sought equitably to re-establish the rights under the contract which the bankrupt had lost by his repudiation of its obligations, but the assignee, who is the only one that answers (Carruthers and his wife suffering default), alleges merely that he "is willing for the benefit of said estate to assume the obligations imposed in said contract on the part of the said John H. Carruthers," and follows this with an averment that the land is worth $12,000, and asks that it be sold, and the surplus over $8,000, which is the full purchase price paid by plaintiff, be divided between plaintiff and the trustee.

We think, as above stated, that this presentation of the facts should relieve from the necessity of any argument upon them or upon the law pertinent to them. There was no partnership. Carruthers' right to participate in the profits of the land rested wholly upon executory considerations moving from him, the principal one of which was the payment of the $4,000. He refused to make this payment and thus repudiated his contract. It may be conceded that the agreement was based upon a sufficient consideration. Indeed, there is no controversy upon this point, but the consideration, as has been said, was executory so far as Carruthers was concerned, and he refused to perform it.

[2] There was no error in admitting the testimony of the plaintiff to show what the true consideration was since the plaintiff's testimony did not in any respect tend to vary or defeat any of the conditions or covenants expressed in the written instrument. Arnold v. Arnold, 137 Cal. 291, 70 Pac. 23.

[3] As defendant was not equitably entitled to any interest in the real property, it was not error for the court to refuse to make a finding fixing the cash value of the property.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

[1] The most serious question in the case,

and the one upon which the justices of the Court of Appeals found themselves unable to agree, is whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict. The facts presented to the jury were the following: The deceased and defendant (both Chinamen) were laborers upon the Zuck ranch in the neighborhood of Gilroy. They were employed by Zuck through the medium of a "boss Chinaman" residing in Gilroy. They occupied a cabin upon the ranch and were engaged in hoeing beets. They worked together, apart from the other farm hands. While so living together in this cabin and doing their own cooking, they were not on amicable terms. They did not associate together in friendship. They went to and from their work separately and by different routes. Disagreements and quarrels were frequent, as evidenced by their loud wrangling voices. Their language, however, was Chinese, and was not understood by the white men on the place. But at least one cause of their dissension, as appeared from the testimony of Chinese witnesses, was over the matter of cooking. They had been in Zuck's employ for about three weeks, making occasional visits to the neighboring town of Gilroy, where their Chinese "boss" resided. Their work was not satisfactory, probably owing to the differences between them. On May 10, 1904, at about 8 o'clock in the evening, the defendant came to Zuck, stated that he was suffering from a severe toothache, that he wanted to go to Gilroy to have his tooth treated, and would not work the next day, but would the day following. This was on Monday evening. It was imperative that the beets should be hoed. The work was being neglected, and on Tuesday Zuck went to the town of Gilroy to get a note from the "boss Chinaman" instructing the two men either to work with more fidelity or to leave the place. He returned from Gilroy and went to their cabin about half past 5 or 6 o'clock in the afternoon to deliver to them the message, and found one of them, Chin Hong, dead upon the floor of the cabin, shockingly mutilated from the blows of an axe. The blood-stained axe itself, which had been used by the two Chinamen in cutting wood for their fire, was afterward found concealed near-by. Chin Hong had evidently been dead for some time. The defendant had disappeared, leaving his personal effects, blankets, clothes, etc., in the cabin. So far as known, he did not go to Gilroy, nor have his teeth treated. He was seen by two other Chinamen who had worked with him, who knew him, and who recognized and spoke to him, sitting upon the outside platform of a country store 20 or more miles away from Gilroy and on the main highway to the city of San Jose. He appeared tired, and, in answer to questions of his Chinese acquaintances, replied that he was looking for work. This was about mid-day of Tuesday, the day following the Monday evening upon which the prosecution declares the murder was committed. Upon the discovery of the crime search was made for the defendant, but he had disappeared. He could not be found in his usual haunts. So far as could be learned he did not communicate with his friends, and it was several years afterward that he was discovered and arrested in the city of San Jose. After his arrest he was confronted with certain Chinese witnesses who testified to knowing him and to having seen him in Gilroy. He vehemently denied ever having been in Gilroy.

By the appellant it is contended that all this amounts to mere circumstances of suspicion, that the evidence at most shows only unexplained flight, and that this, while a circumstance pointing to guilt, has never been held to be sufficient to uphold a conviction. But in fairness it must be answered that there is much more than the mere circumstance of unexplained flight. There is the evidence of the quarrels and of the hostility that existed between the two men. There is the abandonment by the defendant of his personal effects. There is the circumstance that the murder was committed with an axe which was in the possession of the Chinamen, and which was hidden by the murderer. There is the false statement to the employer about his desire to go to Gilroy to have a tooth treated. There is the statement that he would return to work, which he never did. There is his absence from his haunts and associates, and his vehement false denial after his arrest that he had ever been in Gilroy. It is, of course, within the bounds of possibility that the crime was committed by some other person, in the absence and without the knowledge of the defendant. But, if so, it leaves all of the statements and the whole course of conduct of the defendant unexplained and unexplainable; for there would then appear no reason why, as an innocent man, he should have lied; why he should not have returned for and taken his effects; why he should not have given notice to his employer and to his Chinese "boss" that he was going elsewhere to work, nor any reason why in seeking work he should have abandoned his personal belongings, so important to the laboring Chinaman; and, finally, there is no reason why he should have absented himself and should have made denial of his presence in Gilroy, which repeated presence was abundantly established by witnesses.

[2] The moral certainty which the law in its humanity exacts before upholding the conviction of a man charged with crime does not exclude every speculative and fanciful possibility, and it is only by the indulgence of such a possibility that it can be said that the evidence did not establish this defendant's guilt.

[3] In the information the name of the deceased is given as Chin Hong. Certain of the witnesses spoke of him, as appears by the transcript, as "Chin Yong." The contention that this is a substantial variance, and that the two names refer to different human beings, with the resulting doubt as to whether in fact Chin Hong or Chin Yong was the victim of the murder, is not well founded. It is plain that the references were to one and the same person. Even if the doubt can be regarded as a serious one the answer is that it was a question of fact for the jury to answer, and it was resolved against the defendant and appellant's contention by their verdict. People v. Fick, 89 Cal. 149, 26 Pac. 759.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

HABEAS CORPUS (§ 30*)—GROUNDS FOR RELIEF—UNLAWFUL IMPRISONMENT.

Where the prisoner was arrested upon a charge of violating one statute, and his conduct as set out in the complaint clearly showed a violation of another statute, the imprisonment was lawful, and he could not secure his liberty by habeas corpus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

In Bank. Petition of Miller, in behalf of L. Rogers, for writ of habeas corpus, to be directed against D. A. White, Chief of Police. Writ denied.

Frank J. Murphy and Charles N. Douglas, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The writ was denied at the time the petition was presented, for the following reasons: The prisoner was arrested upon a charge of violating the provisions of a new section of the Penal Code, numbered 330a, enacted April 21, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 951), making it a misdemeanor to keep or maintain any mechanical device, upon the result of the operation of which money or other valuable thing is staked or hazarded. The complaint upon which he was arrested seems to have been very carefully drawn with a view to showing that in this instance the method of operating the particular machine in question involved no possible risk of loss to the outsider, while it compelled the proprietor to part with three cigars for the net value of one. It shows, however, that by putting a price upon the cigars somewhat in excess of their value the operation of the machine would involve some hazard to the customer, and in the long run a probable gain to the proprietor over and above the profits of a legitimate business. The law, therefore, in its general operation may be found promotive of sound public policy, although in particular instances it may not thwart the benevolent intentions of more altruistic dealers. The serious question presented for consideration is the constitutionality of the act, or rather of those portions of section 330a which are alone applicable to the machine here described, and its method of operation; the contention being that they are not embraced in the title of the act, and are consequently invalid.

The material portion of the title reads as follows, "relating to gambling by the use of slot machines or card dice or other dice having more than six faces or bases each," and the complaint upon which the prisoner was arrested shows very clearly that his machine has no slot, and has no connection with card dice or dice of any kind.

Evidently there is here suggested a constitutional question of more or less difficulty; but we have not found it necessary to decide it in disposing of this petition. Conceding for the present the alleged infirmity of the statute of 1911 as applied to other devices than slot machines and dice with more than six faces, there still remain other and older statutes covering the facts alleged in this complaint. The prisoner's machine, operated as it is manifestly designed to operate, is nothing more nor less than a lottery, as defined in section 319 of the Penal Code, and by section 320 every person who contrives, prepares, or sets it up is guilty of a misdemeanor. And, so far as the lawfulness of the imprisonment is concerned, it is of no consequence that a violation of section 330a was charged in the complaint, instead of sections 319, 320, under which the facts bring the offense.

In the matter of the estate of B. L. A. Munroe, deceased. From an order, Ella J. Gates appeals. Affirmed.

Patterson Sprigg, for appellant. W. J. Mossholder and Marks P. Mossholder, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal by Ella J. Gates from an order whereby the superior court refused to appoint her executrix of the last will and testament of B. L. A. Munroe, deceased. Both Gates and the public administrator petitioned for letters and the latter was granted letters of administration.

Munroe died testate, devising a part of his real property and bequeathing all of his personal property to said Ella J. Gates. The will did not in terms mention an executrix, but the last sentence contained the words "Said Ella J. Gates to be without bonds." The will was admitted to probate, and the court ruled that the testator intended to nominate the woman as executrix without bonds. Thereupon the public administrator, P. J. Layne, presented objections and written opposition to the issuance of letters to her on the grounds of her incompetency by reason of her drunkenness and her want of integrity. The court found that she was not incompetent by reason of drunkenness, but that her want of integrity was established, and this latter ruling is the one against which appellant's counsel directs his principal attack.

[1] George Pringle, a police officer, testified that he had known Ella Gates for fifteen years; that during the five or six years preceding the time of his testifying he had frequently seen her in saloons drinking; that she, a negress, had for a time lived in a saloon with a white man in the lower part of the city of San Diego; and that every time she got drunk she would hire a horse and buggy, and would drive furiously through the streets. Another policeman testified that Ella Gates had lived with different negroes, and that at one time she resided with a white man. There was other testimony given by the mother of Ella Gates and by one Wright, who lived on the lower floor of the house in which she occupied a room on the upper floor, tending to show that she was at that time living with a man named Ramsey, who was not her husband. William H. Wetherbee, a police officer, testified that some years before the hearing Ella Gates had been arrested three times for vagrancy. Some of this testimony was contradicted by witnesses called on behalf of appellant, but we must here not weigh conflicting evidence, but determine whether or not that given on behalf of the respondent is sufficient to support the finding of want of integrity in Ella Gates. Undoubtedly mere immorality is not sufficient to justify a court's refusal to appoint as administrator or administratrix one who is duly nominated for such appointment by will. In re Bauquier, 88 Cal. 307, 26 Pac. 178, 532; Estate of Newman, 124 Cal. 693, 57 Pac. 686, 45 L. R. A. 780; Estate of Gordon, 142 Cal. 131, 75 Pac. 672. In the first-mentioned proceeding, it was held that the application of one nominated as an executor cannot be denied for want of integrity merely because petitioner has a claim against the estate. The second was one in which this court upheld the issuance of letters of administration to a widow who had contracted a bigamous marriage, and the opinion in the last-mentioned proceeding merely held that a petitioner for letters need not negative in his petition the existence of the disqualifications mentioned in section 1369 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the matter before us, the disqualifying facts as presented by the witnesses called on behalf of the public administrator were much stronger than those which were reviewed in the proceedings cited above. Here, according to the testimony, the woman was not only immoral, but promiscuous; prone to disorderly conduct; once the consort of a man, who in spite of difference in race lived with her at a saloon "in the lower part" of the city; had been arrested several times for vagrancy; and was living at the time of the trial in meretricious relations with one Ramsey. Sometimes such a woman may be one of "integrity" in the usual affairs by business, and, if the court had granted her petition, perhaps the finding in her favor would not be disturbed. But when the court had her before it, and the judge, having listened to the testimony and having observed her demeanor, found from the evidence that her depravity as shown amounted to a want of integrity, we cannot say that there was no substantial evidence upon which to base such a finding.

[2] The public administrator was a person entitled to apply for appointment. The will was admitted to probate without objection, but the executrix named was found to be incompetent. This placed the matter in exactly the same position as if it were one of intestacy. Section 1350a, Code Civ. Proc. In such a case the public administrator is entitled to petition for letters of administration with the will annexed. Estate of McDonald, 118 Cal. 278, 50 Pac. 399.

The order from which the appeal is taken is affirmed.

EDSON & FOULKE CO. et al. v. WINSELL et al. (Sac. 1,855.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1911.)

1. Waters and Water Courses (§ 152*)—Irrigation Rights—Priority—Findings—Evidence.

In a suit to settle conflicting irrigation rights to the waters of a creek, evidence held to sustain findings that defendants had a prior right to 300 inches of the water of the creek, based on prescription and beneficial use, and that plaintiff's use of the waters of the creek was permissive, and in subordination to defendants' rights.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 178*)—NOTICE TO AGENT—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action to determine water rights, plaintiffs' ditch tender testified that he was in charge of the ditch for plaintiffs "as their agent, managing it for them," evidence that witness made requests of defendants for permission to use the water of the creek, and as to his declarations that he would only take the water under their license, was admissible to show notice to plaintiffs that defendants were maintaining adverse possession of the water, and refused to allow witness to take the water which plaintiffs claimed was their own.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 152*)—PRIORITY OF RIGHTS—ADVERSE CLAIM—EVIDENCE.

Where defendants claimed a prior right to the waters of a stream by adverse possession, evidence that on one occasion, when plaintiffs' ditch tender had turned the waters of the creek into plaintiffs' ditch, C., acting for defendants, immediately caused the waters to be turned back, and on meeting the ditch tender threatened him with violence if he ever interfered with the water again, and stated to him that if his employer wanted the water he should come up and arrange for it, to which the ditch tender apologized and promised never to interfere with the water again, was admissible as evidence of defendants' continued assertion of right made to an agent of the adverse claimant.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County, John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by the Edson & Foulke Company and others against Leona J. Winsell and others. Judgment for plaintiffs for less than the relief demanded, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Gillis & Gillis, Taylor & Tebbe, and Jas. R. Tapscott, for appellants. Sweeny & Tillotson, Chas. A. Garter, W. A. Richardson, and Jas. D. Fairchild, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to settle conflicting claims to the waters of Parks creek, a tributary of Shasta river, plaintiffs alleging their ownership of or their right to water from the Shasta river canal or Big Ditch, a canal originally carrying water for mining purposes, later for agricultural and domestic purposes. This canal took its waters from the Shasta river, carrying them down stream until it crossed Parks creek. The supply from the Shasta river was fed by a ditch which tapped the waters of Parks creek about a quarter of a mile above the point where the canal crossed the creek. This "lead" ditch carried the waters of Parks creek into the main canal, and thence on to the lands which it supplied. The defendants were owners of farming lands on Parks creek, which lands were irrigated by waters from the creek. The water system for supplying defendants' lands comprised one ditch above the lead ditch of plaintiffs and numerous other ditches below this lead ditch. Plaintiffs, in effect, conceded to defendants the right to the first 40 inches of the water in Parks creek, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and claimed for themselves all of the next 1,000 inches. They asserted title by appropriation through themselves and their predecessors, initiated more than 40 years before the commencement of the action. The complaint charged defendants with a disturbance of these rights and sought an injunction. Respondents denied the alleged or any interference with the rights of plaintiffs, joining issue upon all of these matters, and further asserted in themselves the right by prior appropriation to the first 600 inches of water flowing in Parks creek. They pleaded the right to the same amount of water by prescription, denied the use by plaintiffs of any part of this 600 inches excepting under their permission from time to time given. By cross-complaint a prescriptive right and title to the same amount of water was pleaded, which water it was alleged was and had been for many years beneficially employed by them for agricultural and domestic purposes. Under this cross-complaint, they sought affirmative relief. The cause was tried by the court without a jury and resulted in a judgment denying plaintiffs relief, and decreeing to defendants, against the plaintiffs, the right to take and use at all times the first 300 inches of the water of Parks creek. It further decreed to plaintiffs the right to take all in excess of 300 inches up to 1,040 inches, after which the parties were entitled to use any excess over this 1,040 inches in moieties. Following this judgment, plaintiffs moved for a new trial and have appealed from the order denying their motion.

[1] Their principal attack is directed against the findings declaring a prior right in defendants to 300 inches, based upon prescription and beneficial use, with further findings in the same connection, to the effect that the use of the waters of Parks creek by plaintiffs was permissive and in subordination to defendants' rights. But the evidence upon which these findings are based, though in conflict, is amply sufficient to sustain them. It would be unprofitable to review the testimony given witness by witness, and therefore, limiting the exposition to the general and essential features, it appears that defendants and their predecessors in interest had as early as 1856 completed the ditches and used the waters of Parks creek on their lands; that the capacity of these ditches continued to be the same as when first constructed; that the ditch above the intake of plaintiffs' lead ditch had a capacity itself alone of 370 inches, and the capacity of the lower ditches was at least

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

700 inches more; that the defendants always asserted a first right against plaintiffs to the waters of Parks creek, and vigorously resented any invasion of their rights to the water, and promptly restored the water to Parks creek, that it might flow to their ditches whenever interference by plaintiffs was known to them; that in times of high water all parties had an abundance, but, when Parks creek ran low, defendants always insisted upon the first right to all the water which they required; that their use thus certainly amounted to 300 inches; that at times the ditch tender of plaintiffs or their predecessors would ask permission to divert the waters of Parks creek into his ditch, and, if the defendants were not at that time requiring the water or all of it for their own use, they assented to such diversion, but always insisted upon and maintained their first right to that use. In view of the fact that the upper ditch above the intake of plaintiffs' lead ditch itself had a capacity of 370 inches, and that there can be no serious question as to the prior right of defendants to the continued use of the full capacity of that ditch, the award to them of 300 inches in the aggregate from all the ditches certainly comes well within the bounds set by the evidence.

[2] Complaint is made of many of the court's rulings in the reception and rejection of evidence. Some of these may be grouped and considered collectively. The most serious complaint is made over the admission of evidence touching the conduct of Hughlett who, appellants assert, was their ditch tender, and nothing more than a ditch tender. The obnoxious evidence went to requests made by Hughlett of the defendants for permission to use the water of Parks creek, and to his declarations to the effect that he would only take the water under their license. It is urged that this evidence was offered in an attempt to bind the principals by the declarations of an agent manifestly without authority or capacity to bind them, and numerous cases announcing this undisputed principle are cited. But the evidence was admissible without regard to the question whether or not the admissions of Hughlett could or would bind his principals. Indeed, it may freely be conceded that Hughlett's agency was not of such a character as would give his utterances any such force or effect. Hughlett, however, testified that he was in charge of the ditch for the plaintiffs "as their agent, managing it for them." Amongst his duties was that to see that the canal was supplied with the water belonging to it. In the assertion and maintenance of their hostile claim of title, it was not incumbent upon defendants to seek out the plaintiffs personally and challenge their right to the use of the water. They were maintaining open, notorious, hostile, and adverse possession against the plaintiffs when they refused to allow their accredited agent to take the water which they, the plaintiffs, claimed was their own. Certainly notice to this agent that he could not use the water was notice to his principals, since it was the very duty of the agent to see that he did get the water, and, upon failure, his duty to notify his principals of the cause. The mere submission by the agent to the asserted rights of defendants did not bind the plaintiffs in the sense that it amounted to a recognition of those rights by them, but it did bind the plaintiffs to the extent that the defendants were doing all that the law called upon them to do in the open declaration, assertion, and maintenance of their hostile right and title. When Hughlett, as the evidence is, came to the defendants, asking permission of them to use their waters in Parks creek, it was not incumbent upon the defendants to convey any other notice to the plaintiffs of the nature of their asserted claim. It matters not how lowly may be the position of the agent or servant of a company or corporation, if, within the limits of his assigned duty, he has notice, or is charged with notice of a particular matter or thing, appertaining to that duty that notice is notice to his principal. If the ditch which he was charged with tending should have given evidence of breaking away and flooding and devastating another man's land, it could not successfully be contended that the principals did not have this notice, whether actually conveyed to them or not, within a reasonable time after the agent himself had acquired the knowledge. Crowley v. Genesee Mining Co., 55 Cal. 273; Bundy v. Sierra Lumber Co., 149 Cal. 773, 87 Pac. 622; State ex rel. Cass County v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co., 149 Mo. 104, 50 S. W. 279; Evansville, etc, R. R. Co. v. McKee, 99 Ind. 519, 50 Am. Rep. 102. For these reasons, and not because the request of Hughlett to be allowed to use the water of Parks creek in any other way bound the plaintiffs, the evidence touching the acts and conduct of Hughlett was admissible.

[3] Evidence was admitted of a conversation between A. J. Caldwell and Hughlett, and it is said that this evidence was improperly admitted as being self-serving declarations of a party in interest, upon the authority of Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2, and such cases as Poorman v. Miller, 44 Cal. 270, Fischer v. Bergson, 49 Cal. 294, Hausman v. Hausling, 78 Cal. 283, 20 Pac. 570, and Bollinger v. Wright, 143 Cal. 292, 76 Pac. 1108. The evidence was to the effect that upon one occasion when Hughlett had turned the waters of Parks creek into plaintiffs' ditch, Caldwell immediately caused them to be turned back, and, meeting Hughlett, threatened him with violence if he ever interfered with the water again, and added: "If Edson wants that water in that ditch, you send him up there, but don't you or any other hired man go up there and meddle with that water." Hughlett apologized and promised never to interfere with the water again.

But this is not the self-serving declaration, evidence of which the law forbids. This is evidence of the continuous assertion of a right, the assertion being made to the agent of the adverse claimant. It was admissible.

No other of the rulings upon the admissibility of evidence seems to call for specific discussion, and, for the reasons given, the order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FLORES. (Cr. 1,646.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1911.)

ABDUCTION (§ 1*) — OFFENSES — DEFENSES — STATUTE.

Where a girl of less than 18 years of age, who had been committed to an institution for incorrigible girls, escaped, and leaving her home became a streetwalker, remaining upon the streets six or seven weeks without any attempt being made by her parents to find her, accused, who procured her entrance into a bawdyhouse, was not guilty of a violation of Pen. Code, § 267, making it a crime for any person to take away any female under the age of 18 years from her father, mother, or guardian, without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abduction, Cent. Dig. §§ 1–10; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Tony Flores was convicted of abduction, and appeals. The Justices of the Court of Appeal being unable to agree, the case was transferred to the Supreme Court. Reversed.

James J. Van Hovenberg, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was submitted to the District Court of Appeal for the First appellate district, and the Justices thereof being unable to agree upon a judgment therein, the appeal, accompanied by the respective opinions of the Justices of that court, has been transferred to this court for determination.

The opinion written by Justice Cooper, then Presiding Justice of said District Court of Appeal, and concurred in by his associate Justice Kerrigan, is as follows:

"The defendant was accused by the information of the crime of abduction in having, on the 5th day of January, 1910, willfully and feloniously taken one Ruby Emerson, an unmarried female under the age of 18 years 'from and out of the custody of Rose Emerson, the mother of the said Ruby Emerson, without the consent and against the will of the said Rose Emerson, who then and there had the legal charge of the said Ruby Emerson.' The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and defendant was thereupon sentenced to a term of five years in the state prison, being the maximum punishment prescribed by the statute.

"It appears from the evidence that the girl Ruby Emerson was, at the time of the alleged taking, about 15 years of age. For some two years before, she had been in the habit of frequently running away from home. She had been in charge of the juvenile court, and had afterwards been committed to an institution for the care of incorrigible girls, from which place she had run away. She had not been at the home of her father and mother since the latter part of November, 1909, some six or seven weeks prior to the alleged abduction. It appears from the girl's own testimony that during this time and for several weeks she had been first at one rooming or lodging house in the city and county of San Francisco, and then at another, or, in her own language, she 'roomed every place,' and could not herself remember the names of the various places in which she had roomed. She also went under different names; among them being 'Ruby Walker,' 'Helen Walker,' and 'Helen Johnson.' It does not appear that during this time her father and mother had notified the public authorities, or made any attempt to find her. She had apparently made her escape from the institution to which she had been legally committed, and had abandoned her home, wandering on the streets at night, meeting strange men and taking them to her room, if she had one, and, if not, finding one temporarily. She testified that on January 4, 1910, she could not tell where she was living, because she did not know, but finally said that it was somewhere on Seventh street, in the city and county of San Francisco. She testified that about 7 o'clock on said last-named evening she met defendant at the corner of Seventh and Market streets, and there had a conversation with him and his companion, one William Carlin; that defendant told her he could get her a place to work in Oakland, and she promised to meet defendant and his companion at the ferry building the next morning for the purpose of going over to Oakland to find her a place to work; that she did meet defendant and his companion the next morning, and went with them across the bay to Oakland, stopping at Seventh street and Broadway at the railroad depot; that they then went into a restaurant, where defendant and Carlin had their breakfast, and from there to the station; that defendant and Carlin left her at the station while they went to see about getting her a place, and that they soon returned and informed her that she (in her own language) 'was hired,' and they told her to go down to 477 Sixth street and see the 'lady,' and that she did go. She testified that defendant told her he would get her work as a chambermaid, but in the same sentence she said that he told her to give an assumed name, and to tell the landlady that she was 20 years old, as she could not get work as a chambermaid unless she was 20. She accordingly gave an assumed name, and stated to the landlady that her age was 20. She does not appear to have made any inquiry as to chamber work, but dressed and went into the parlor with two other girls, who were inmates of the house, doing the same kind of work. She remained there about four weeks, and had a room where she received and entertained the men who patronized her according to the custom of the house. It does not appear that defendant knew the age of the girl, or that she had any father or mother living. He met her casually on the street, and offered to assist her to get regular employment in the line of business which she had chosen, and evidently at more remunerative wages. He did not solicit her, or inveigle her into a life of prostitution. His offered aid may have been, and probably was, in a spirit of kindness, if we can conceive of people in that business being kind to each other; the desire of both of them evidently being that she might have a fixed abode, where she could get more customers.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes.

"The main contention of defendant's counsel is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict in this: That it entirely fails to show that 'defendant took the girl away from her mother,' as charged in the information, and we are constrained to so hold.

"In discussing this statute, we must bear in mind its object and purpose. The intention of the Legislature evidently was to prevent young girls being lured away from the care and control of their parents or legal guardians, for the purpose of leading immoral lives, or being made prostitutes. It was for the purpose of protecting young girls who, if not virtuous, were not abandoned, or beyond the hope of reform. It was never intended to apply to girls who had already abandoned their home, and who had already become common streetwalkers or prostitutes. The section of the Code upon which this prosecution is based reads as follows: 'Every person who takes away any female under the age of 18 years from her father, mother, guardian or other person having the legal charge of her person, without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, and a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars.' The section makes it a crime to take away any female under the age of 18 years from her father or mother or legal guardian, without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution, and this without reference to whether the girl is chaste or otherwise. If she is wayward or has lost her virtue, the statute still contemplates that she shall not be taken away from her father or mother, because their love and solicitude perchance may still reform her, or bring her to see the error of her ways. No one has the right to take such a young girl away from her father or mother without their consent. In the eyes of the law, she is an infant, and no stranger had the right to deprive the father or mother of her custody. But if a girl is not in charge of her father or mother or other person described in section 267, that section does not apply, but the case is governed by the preceding section, to wit, section 266, which reads as follows: 'Every person who inveigles or entices any unmarried female of previous chaste character, under the age of 18 years, into any house of ill fame, or of assignation, or elsewhere, for the purpose of prostitution, or to have illicit carnal connection with any man; and every person who aids or assists in such inveiglement or enticement; and every person who, by any false pretenses, false representation, or other fraudulent means, procures any female to have illicit carnal connection with any man, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment.' This section deals with unmarried females under the age of 18, 'of previous chaste character,' who were not in the charge or custody of the father, mother, or legal guardian. The defendant could not have been convicted under this section, because the girl was not of previous chaste character, as evidently appears from her own testimony. Then, where a female who has lost her virtue, under the age of 18, and who has been abandoned, or who is not in the legal charge of any one, but a wanderer upon the town, is aided in being placed in a house of prostitution, no crime has been committed. No one would say from the evidence in this record that the defendant took the girl from her mother. The words mean the removal or separation of the girl from the parent or legal guardian. If the girl was not with her mother, or under the immediate control and custody of the mother, but living separate and apart from her, going from place to place of her own volition, not making her home with her mother, she was not 'taken from the mother.'

"The English statute (24 & 25 Victoria, c. 10, § 55) provides as follows: 'Whosoever shall unlawfully take or cause to be taken any unmarried girl, being under the age of 16 years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor.' The decisions in England on this statute are in accord with the construction herein given. It will be observed that the statute is similar to ours, except the age is 16, and the purpose need not be for prostitution. Instead of the words 'takes away from,' the English statute uses the words 'take or cause to be taken * * * out of the possession.' In the case of Reg. v. Primelt, 1 F. & F. 50, which was a prosecution under this section, the evidence showed that the girl was in the habit of going to dances and public houses, and was out occasionally late at night without any one to look after her, and without her mother's supervision. The Chief Justice directed the jury that, 'if they thought that the mother had by her consent countenanced her daughter in her lax course of life by permitting her to go out alone at night and to dance at public houses, this was not a case that came within the intent of the statute, but was one where what had occurred, though unknown to her, could not be held to have happened against her will.'

"In Reg. v. Mankletow, Dears. C. C. 152 (Spring Assizes, 1855), it was said: 'Supposing the girl to have abandoned her father's possession, and the prisoner then to take her away, it would not come within the statute. But supposing she conditionally abandoned the possession of her father, under the impression that the prisoner would be at a certain point to take her away, that would not be a determination of the father's possession.'

"It is said in Russell on Crime (International Ed.) vol. 3 (note to page 263), that upon the case of R. v. Meadows [1 Car. & K. 399] being cited, Jarvis, C. J., observed 'that the girl, by voluntarily going from her father's house, may have severed the possession of the father, and so could not be said to be taken out of the possession of her father.'

"The statute of New York is similar to ours, and uses the words 'shall take away any female under the age of 14 years from her father, mother, guardian or other person having the legal charge of her person.' In People v. Parshall, 6 Parker Cr. R. (N. Y.) 129, in discussing the statute, the court said: 'The remaining question is whether the second count in the indictment was sustained by evidence sufficient to be admitted to the jury. In considering this question, we are confined to the testimony of the female, Hannah Naughton, who was alleged to have been taken away, as the court below put the case to the jury solely upon her evidence, as applied to the second count. In my opinion, the evidence of the girl fell short in several respects of being sufficient to produce a conviction under that count, and first as to the taking away. The evidence of the girl does not show that she was taken away from any one according to her testimony. * * * And the testimony of the girl does not tend to show that there was any taking of her in the sense of the statute, which contemplates some positive act to get the female away from the person having the legal charge of her. Nothing of that kind appears.'

"In People v. Powellson [67 Cal. xx] 7 Pac. 35, the court said: 'The defendant was charged by indictment with taking from certain individuals having the legal charge of her person a female under the age of 18 years, for the purpose of prostitution, under section 267 of the Penal Code. There was no evidence that the infant was taken from the charge or custody of the persons named in the indictment. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.'

"The Attorney General relies upon People v. Cook, 61 Cal. 478, as supporting the contention that in contemplation of law a female under the age of 18 is in charge of her father, and that the taking was sufficient, even where the evidence shows that the girl had abandoned her home. The case does lend countenance to such contention, but an examination of it will show that the court in that case was discussing solely the question of a charge to the jury, to the effect that 'the father has by nature and by the law the legal charge of the persons of his children until they arrive at the age of majority, and that if the defendant took Rebecca from said charge, for the purpose of prostitution, it was immaterial whether the defendant knew that she had a father living, and it was equally immaterial whether the act was done with or without her consent.' The instruction might very well apply to a case where the girl had not abandoned her home, or was not living a separate and independent existence; but it will be observed that the court in the prevailing opinion does not discuss the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence. However, in a dissenting opinion written by Mr. Justice McKinstry, and concurred in by Mr. Justice Sharpstein, the learned justice said: 'I dissent. In my view, the crime defined in section 267 of the Penal Code is committed by one who "takes away" the infant from the actual charge or possession of her parent, guardian, or other person legally entitled to the charge of her person. See 9 Geo. IV, c. 31, § 20. It is not committed by one forming an immoral connection with a female who has already abandoned her home or fled from guardianship. * * * In the case before us, the female was not taken away from her father, or from Coleman, in whose employment she had been, or from any person having the legal charge of her. There is not the slightest pretense that the defendant induced her to leave the house of her father or of Coleman, or that he ever saw her until she had for a considerable period of time "been going about from place to place, sleeping in several different houses, and leading a dissolute and immoral life." However base and infamous the conduct of defendant, he can only be punished, under this information, if he has committed the crime described in section 267 of the Penal Code.'

"The case is not in point for another reason: Conceding that the father is the legal custodian of his minor child, the charge in this case is not a taking from the father, but from the mother. The father is the legal custodian, and even that custody had been taken away in this case and placed in an institution, to which the girl had been committed by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction.

"In this case, while the conduct of the defendant is not to be commended, and his mode of life shows that he associates with the lower strata of society, still we cannot affirm the judgment, unless the evidence shows that he has committed the crime charged in the information. We would not be justified in placing a construction upon this statute so as to hold the defendant, simply because he has been quilty of conduct of which we do not approve.

"The judgment and order are reversed."

The controlling question upon this appeal —the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict—is fully and clearly discussed in the foregoing opinion. The views and conclusion expressed therein upon that question are, we are satisfied, correct, and we adopt the foregoing opinion as the opinion of this court.

The judgment and order are reversed.

SPICER v. HURLEY. (L. A. 2,577.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1911. Rehearing Denied Oct. 25, 1911.)

1. Pleading (§ 122*)—Denial on Information and Belief—Effect.

A denial on information and belief by a seller of the allegations of the complaint of the buyer suing for the price paid as to the rescission of the contract of sale is insufficient, and the allegations stand admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 249–252; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

2. Trial (§ 396*) — Findings — Evidence— Sufficiency.

A finding which consists of declarations in the answer is not open to objection by defendant that there is no evidence justifying it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 935–938; Dec. Dig. § 396.*]

3. Patents (§ 196*)—Sale—Misrepresentation—Evidence—Sufficiency.

In an action for the price paid for an interest in patents issued, evidence held to justify a finding that the seller's representations that the patents were issued to him were untrue, and known by him to be untrue, justifying the seller in rescinding and in recovering the price paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Patents, Cent. Dig. § 278; Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

4. Patents (§ 196*)—Sale—Rescission.

Where a seller contracted to sell an interest in a granted patent, and executed a bill of sale, the buyer, on discovering that the seller had not been granted a patent, and that his representations were false, could rescind by offering to return what he had received under the bill of sale and demanding the return of the money paid, and the fact that under the bill of sale the buyer acquired an interest recognized in equity did not preclude him from rescinding and recovering the price paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Patents, Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

5. Patents (§ 196*)—Sales of Interest— "Patented."

Approval of an application for a patent is not the equivalent of a patent granted and issued within a contract for the sale of an interest in a patent granted and issued; the term "patented" meaning the actual issuance of a patent by the government.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Patents, Dec. Dig. § 196.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5235.]

6. Patents (§ 196*)—Sales of Interest— Rescission.

Under Civ. Code, § 1689, authorizing a party to a contract to rescind in specified cases, a buyer of an interest in patents granted to the seller may rescind on discovering the false representations of the seller and learning that the patents have not been granted, and recover the price paid; and the fact that subsequent to the rescission and the action patents have been actually granted does not affect the buyer's rights.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by S. F. Spicer against J. W. Hurley. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Long & Sweek, Amend & Amend, and F. A. Knight, for appellant. Taylor & Forgy, Frederick S. Lyon, and G. M. Spicer, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The complaint in this action sets forth four different causes of action, the first of which was abandoned on the trial and no further reference need be made to it.

The facts stated in the complaint, applicable generally to the other three causes of action, were that plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby defendant for the sum of $15,000 cash to be paid him by plaintiff was to convey to him certain interests in two patents claimed by defendant to have been granted to him by the United States government, one being for "the Hurley adjustable reversible ratchet wrench," the other for the "Hurley meat tenderer machine," and that the $15,000 cash was to be paid principally as the consideration for the improved wrench; that on November 17, 1908, pursuant to said agreement, plaintiff paid to defendant $15,000 in cash, and in consideration therefor defendant executed to plaintiff two bills of sale, one purporting to convey to plaintiff "an undivided one-sixteenth interest in and to the patent right to 'the Hurley adjustable reversible ratchet wrench,' No. 411,530, granted by the United States government under the laws relating to patents," the other purporting to convey an undivided interest in the "Hurley meat tenderer machine"; that on November 24, 1908, plaintiff discovered that no patent at all had been granted defendant for any wrench, and that plaintiff had acquired nothing under said bill of sale respecting the same; that there was at the time of the execution of said bill of sale no patent in existence upon "the Hurley adjustable reversible ratchet wrench," and that no patent had at that time been granted by the United States government under the patent laws for such a wrench. In addition to these allegations, common to all the causes of action, the second cause of action charged a total failure of consideration; the third, a partial failure of consideration in a material respect (Civ. Code, § 1689); the fourth charged fraud and deceit. It was further alleged that a prompt rescission of said agreement to purchase and a tender back of all that plaintiff had received from defendant was made by him on November 24, 1908.

[1] These allegations as to rescission were denied on information and belief. This was an entirely insufficient denial and these allegations therefore stood admitted. A trial was had on the second, third and fourth causes of action. No question was made as to the payment of the consideration by plaintiff for the execution of the bill of sale.

The court found the following facts:

"(2) That plaintiff was induced to pay said consideration to defendant by the representations thereby and theretofore made to plaintiff by defendant for the purpose of inducing said plaintiff to pay said consideration and enter into said agreement to and with defendant, which representations were as follows: 'That letters patent of the United States numbered 411,530 had been duly allowed and granted to him (said defendant) by the United States government on a certain article, to wit, the "Hurley adjustable reversible ratchet wrench"'; 'that said patent had been duly allowed and granted'; 'that he (said defendant) was the true and lawful owner of a one-sixteenth ($^1/_{16}$) in the entire United States patent right thereto'; 'that he (said defendant) could sell, transfer, and assign the said one-sixteenth ($^1/_{16}$) interest to plaintiff, and that he could vest the full title to said one-sixteenth ($^1/_{16}$) interest in said patent rights in plaintiff."

"(3) That said representations made by the defendant as aforesaid were not true and that defendant knew them to be untrue; that the letters patent of the United States numbered 411,530 were not granted to defendant and defendant never, at any time, had any interest therein; that said patent No. 411,530 was not granted for an article known as the 'Hurley wrench,' or for any wrench, or any improvements on any wrench whatever, but was granted to one William H. Pyott on September 24, 1889, for an 'improvement in automatic stop mechanism for steam engines,' and said patent was expired at and before the said November 17, 1908; that no patent of the United States at or before the making of said representations by defendant, or before the commencement of this action, or the filing of defendant's answer herein, had ever been granted or issued for said article known as the 'Hurley wrench,' or for any invention of or improvements made by defendant in wrenches, and said defendant was not, at said times, the owner of any patent rights in said wrench whatever."

It was further found that the bill of sale purporting to convey to plaintiff an interest in a patent for the "Hurley adjustable reversible ratchet wrench" did not vest in plaintiff a full or any interest in said or any patent or any patent rights whatever, and by said instrument did not sell, assign or transfer to plaintiff anything of value whatever, that the consideration for which plaintiff had paid the $15,000 had failed, and that plaintiff had promptly rescinded the contract and demanded the repayment of his money.

The conclusion of law was that plaintiff was entitled to recover the entire consideration of $15,000 paid to the defendant and judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[2] Appellant attacks finding 2 on the ground that there was no evidence that he ever stated to plaintiff that letters patent of the United States government had been issued to defendant for the wrench. But this claim of appellant is absolutely without merit because the recitals in the finding respecting this matter consist of declarations in the answer of defendant where he directly averred that he had made all the representations which are contained in the finding, among others, alleging "that the defendant represented to plaintiff that letters patent of the United States numbered 411,530 had been duly allowed and granted to him by the United States government on a certain article known as the 'Hurley wrench.'"

[3] Appellant also challenges finding 3 as not being supported by the evidence, because (to state it as it is contained in the specifications) the execution of the bill of sale would vest in plaintiff all the rights purporting to be conveyed by defendant, and did transfer everything it purported to convey. But the evidence clearly shows that defendant did not convey to or vest in plaintiff any right which it purported to do. It purported to vest him with an interest in a patent right for the Hurley wrench which had been granted to defendant, but the evidence clearly shows that no such patent had been granted to him. The attack which appellant directs against this finding is based on what he claims was the uncontradicted evidence in the case. Upon the trial defendant introduced evidence by which he sought to prove that in his negotiations with the plaintiff for a sale of the patent for his improved wrench he had explained fully to him that he had not been actually granted a patent for the wrench, but only that his application therefor had been allowed by the Patent Office, and that he did not want to have the patent issued until he had secured foreign rights thereto; that when the bill of sale for an interest in the patent for the wrench was executed, although it called for a sale of an interest in the patent therefor granted by the United States what was meant thereby, and so fully understood by plaintiff was, that a patent had only been allowed; that for all legal purposes a sale of an interest in an allowed patent was precisely the same thing as the sale of an interest in a granted patent. Appellant claims that the evidence upon these matters was uncontradicted. This is obviously untrue because the plaintiff testified that there were no such statements made or such an understanding.

What the defendant did establish was, in fact, that no patent had been granted or issued to him, but that in July, 1908, he had received from the United States Patent Office a notification that his application (application No. 411,530) for a patent for an improvement in wrenches had been examined and allowed; that a final fee of $20 must be paid and the letters patent bear date of a date not later than six months from the time of the present notice of allowance; that, if the final fee was not paid within that period, the patent would be withheld, and the only relief of applicant would be a renewal of the application with additional fees under section 4897 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3386), that at the time of the rescission by plaintiff defendant had not yet paid the final fee, and did not do so until December 17, 1908, and was then notified by the department that a patent would issue January 12, 1909. So that the contention of the appellant that plaintiff was informed of the true situation as to the patent must be disregarded, not only from the conflict of the evidence on the subject, but because of the admission in his answer that he did not only represent to plaintiff—"that letters patent had been duly allowed and granted to him by the United States government" on the Hurley wrench, but that he further represented "that he was the true and lawful owner of a one-sixteenth interest in the entire United States patent thereto," when in truth the facts were that no patent had been issued or granted to him either at the time when the rescission was made, or even when his verified answer in this case was filed.

[4] Having shown that the objections to the findings are untenable, and that the facts are as found by the court, there is little necessity for further consideration of this matter. Defendant contracted with plaintiff and agreed to sell and convey to him an interest in a granted patent, and executed a bill of sale purporting to do so. After the sale was consummated, plaintiff discovered that defendant had not been granted such patent; that his representations to that effect were false, and gave prompt notice of rescission offering to return whatever of value he had received under the bill of sale and demanded a return of the money paid by him as a consideration for the purchase. That the plaintiff under these facts, clearly proven, was entitled to recover cannot be doubted. It is no answer to say that under the bill of sale plaintiff acquired an assignment of an interest in the patent, that equity recognizes such an assignment of an interest in patents before issuance, and that such assignments carry with them corresponding rights in any patent which is subsequently issued. Defendant did not sell to plaintiff, and plaintiff was not buying, equitable rights which might fail utterly if the patent was not ultimately granted, and which, even if it was granted, plaintiff might be compelled to legalize by a lawsuit. He was purchasing legal rights and interests in a granted patent and he acquired no such interests under the bill of sale because the defendant had none to convey. Such right as the defendant had at that time to the issuance of a patent after the approval of his application was unvested and inchoate. It was conditioned not only upon his compliance with the requirements of the Patent Office in the matter of the payment of fees, but was conditioned also upon the right of the government after further consideration to reject the application and withhold the patent, which it might do if an interference or a protest were filed showing an infringement of an existing patent.

[5] It is quite evident, therefore, that the approval of an application for a patent is not the equivalent of a patent granted and issued. "The term 'patented' does not mean the preliminary proceedings, but the actual issuance of the patent under the seal of the government speaking the exercise of sovereign will investing the patentee with the grant of a monopoly." Edison, etc., v. Waring E. Co. (C. C.) 59 Fed. 358.

[6] Neither is it of any moment to say that subsequent to the rescission and the bringing of this action to enforce rescission a patent for the wrench was actually granted to defendant. The rights of the parties are governed by the conditions which existed when the rescission was made and were fixed by the rescission, for the rescission, if legally made (and it is not only established but admitted here that it was), "extinguished" the contract. Civ. Code § 1678; Wilcox v. Lattin, 93 Cal. 595, 29 Pac. 226; Smith v. Blandin, 133 Cal. 441, 65 Pac. 894.

HOMESTEAD (§ 143*)—WIDOW'S HOMESTEAD RIGHT—TIME OF VESTING.

Since the homestead vests in the widow absolutely at her husband's death, a subsequent order of distribution, distributing one-half of the homestead estate to her and one-half to the children, was void and did not affect her homestead right, and hence, in the absence of equitable estoppel, it cannot be subjected to a lien for a judgment on a note executed by the widow after the order of distribution.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Irene May Hart against J. H. Taber and another. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions to render judgment for plaintiff.

Powers & Holland, for appellant. Lee Gates, W. S. Allen, and Taylor & Forgy, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. The sheriff of Los Angeles county, one of the respondents herein, sought to sell under execution the interest of Irene May Hart in certain real property following a judgment obtained on a promissory note executed by said Hart in favor of Taber. Plaintiff claiming a homestead interest in the property as the widow of John Curry obtained a temporary injunction restraining the defendants from selling it, but after a trial of the action the superior court dissolved the injunction, found that Taber's judgment against plaintiff was a lien on the premises, and adjudged the levy of execution valid. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

There is no dispute regarding the facts. John Curry died intestate in 1904. Prior to that time plaintiff, then the wife of said John Curry and living with her husband on lot 50 of Westlake Park tract in the city of Los Angeles, which was community property, executed and caused to be recorded a declaration of homestead upon the said premises. This homestead was in existence at the time of John Curry's death. Plaintiff was appointed administratrix of her deceased husband's estate, and in December, 1905, a decree was entered distributing said property appraised as part of the estate, one-half to plaintiff and one-half to the two children of the intestate. Respondents concede that at the death of her husband plaintiff had a valid homestead on the property in question, and there is no denial that under section 1265 of the Civil Code and section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure the title vested in her without administration. The questions involved in this appeal, therefore, all arise out of her subsequent conduct and the decree of distribution above mentioned. In 1907, more than a year after distribution of the estate of John Curry, deceased, the plaintiff executed to Taber a note upon which he subsequently obtained the judgment that he seeks to satisfy by sale under execution of her interest in this property. The court concluded that the order settling the final account and for distribution in the matter of the estate of John Curry deceased, "was an adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person of the plaintiff herein, and said decree is conclusive upon the plaintiff herein as to the interest in said real property to which she was and is entitled." There was a further conclusion of law to the effect that by said order plaintiff was "estopped to claim said real property or any part thereof as a homestead or to claim any part of the same as owner except the undivided one-half part thereof."

We think that both of these conclusions were erroneous. The homestead vested absolutely in plaintiff upon the death of her husband. An order subsequently made by the probate court setting it aside to her and her children as a homestead would have been of no effect. See Saddlemire v. Stockton Sav. & Loan Soc., 144 Cal. 651, 79 Pac. 381; Estate of Fath, 132 Cal. 610, 64 Pac. 995, and cases therein cited. And upon like principle an order of distribution did not take away her homestead right, because the court was without jurisdiction to make the order. Respondents cite Blair v. Hazzard, 158 Cal. 726, 112 Pac. 298, and similar cases, holding that "a decree of distribution is a muniment of title of the highest value," and argue that they were justified in depending upon the decree in the estate of Curry as settling plaintiff's title to the property and defining its extent. The answer to this is that a valid homestead is also a high muniment of title, and that this is not an action by which they assert title to property, but only the right to foreclose an alleged lien. In Ions v. Harbison, 112 Cal. 264, 44 Pac. 572, which is the principal dependence of respondents, the property of the estate had been sold in pursuance of an order issued upon the prayer of the administrator, who failed to divulge his homestead interest. It was held that the jurisdiction of the probate court could not be questioned by one who, knowing all of the facts, took the quitclaim deed of the administrator, and sought under it to attack the judgment collaterally—that as the administrator himself had created a record which could not, on appeal, disclose the extent of his homestead claim, his grantee could not question the judgment made without the court's knowledge of the homestead right. But here we have quite a different state of facts. No fraud nor misrepresentation is attributed to plaintiff nor do respondents assert that the note (which bore interest at the rate of five per cent. per month) was accepted upon the faith and credit of Mrs. Hart's title to the real property here involved. Neither upon the doctrine of admitted jurisdiction of the probate court nor the principle of estoppel in pais was appellant precluded from asserting her homestead right, and such cases as Ions v. Harbison, supra, and Raggio v. Palmtag, 155 Cal. 799, 103 Pac. 312, have no application, but the principles announced in Saddlemire v. Stockton Sav. & Loan Soc., supra, and kindred cases should govern here.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by William Grant against W. D. Bannister and another. From an order denying a motion for new trial after judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edmund Tauszky, John F. Davis, and R. P. Henshall, for appellant. R. H. Countryman and J. B. Curtin, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought for a partnership accounting and a division of the partnership assets. Judgment passed for defendants, plaintiff moved for a new trial, and from the order denying this motion, but not from the judgment, he appeals. The attention of this court is not directed to any alleged errors of law occurring during the progress of the trial, but the consideration upon appeal is limited to a contention against the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings.

Oral negotiations between the parties resulted in their entering into articles of copartnership for the general purposes of quarrying, working, buying, and selling building stone, but for the especial purpose of so quarrying, working, and selling marble from the Gold Spring Marble Mining claim in Tuolumne county, Cal. The partnership was to continue for the term of 10 years under the directions of the defendant partners, Bannister and Hearfield. Plaintiff was to cause to be conveyed the Gold Spring Marble Mining claim, with its water rights, to the partners in the proportions of "one-half undivided" to himself, "one-quarter undivided" to Bannister, and "one-quarter undivided" to Hearfield. The two defendant partners were to pay to plaintiff $1,000, and to expend in the improvement of the quarry, in the erection of a plant, and in the carrying on of the business the sum of $16,500 within two years. Bannister was to "devote his entire time and services to the business," receiving no compensation therefor. Hearfield was to "devote his time and services" between the business of the Columbia Marble Company and the business of the firm of Hearfield, Bannister & Co., and was to receive no compensation for his services to the marble company. The profits were to be divided, one-half to plaintiff, and one-quarter each to the defendants. The losses were to be borne in the same proportion. The services to be rendered by the defendant partners is expressed as the "main inducement and consideration" for the formation of the partnership; the money contributions being described as "very secondary." If, after the expiration of two years, plaintiff desired to sell, the defendants "shall have the right to purchase by paying to the plaintiff the sum of $20,000." And, finally, it was provided: "At the expiration of the period of partnership the party of the first part shall be the owner of one-half of the property, and assets of the business, and the party of the second part the owner of one-fourth thereof, and the party of the third part the owner of one-fourth thereof, unless the interests of the parties hereto shall be changed by sales and purchases or effected by overdrafts, and that if at any time the interests of the parties hereto are changed by purchases or sales, the interest of said parties in profits and losses shall be changed accordingly." The owner of the Gold Spring Marble claim made a conveyance to these partners of the property "in the proportion of one-half undivided to said William Grant, one-quarter undivided to said David Hearfield, and one-quarter undivided to said William D. Bannister." The deed declared that: "This conveyance is made by said party of the first part to said parties of the second part hereto in accordance and compliance with the terms and conditions of certain articles of copartnership made and entered into this day by and between said parties of the second part and to enable said William Grant (son of the party of the first part hereto) to comply with and perform the conditions contained in said articles of copartnership by and on the part of said William Grant."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The defendant partners contributed the money called for by the articles of copartnership, and devoted their time and services to its conduct and management, but the business proved unprofitable. Two years and more passed, and plaintiff sold his undivided half of the quarry, following which an accounting was had of the partnership affairs, resulting in the payment by plaintiff of the amount found due from him. No business at all, or business of no consequence, was ever afterward transacted. The articles of copartnership were entered into in August, 1891, and by their terms were to continue in force for 10 years. Indeed, the attempt to quarry and market the marble had ceased prior to the date of this sale, which was in 1898, for in 1897 a lease for 10 years of the quarry was made by the partnership to third persons. The lessees, however, paid but one year's rent and the lease was allowed to lapse. This action was brought on July 31, 1900, about 18 months after plaintiff's sale of his interest in the quarry and the settlement of the partnership accounts.

His contention is that under the articles of copartnership the term of the copartnership was to be for full 10 years, during which time the defendant partners were to devote their services to the copartnership in the manner above indicated. That the articles of copartnership recited that these services were the moving consideration for the agreement, and that one of these partners, just before the execution of the articles, furnished to plaintiff a memorandum as follows:

Amount of money to be put in.	17,500
2nd part's time)) $300 per month 3rd part's time) = 3 3,600.00 per annum 7% =	51,428

That this memorandum gave evidence, in accordance with the declarations of the agreement, that the services of the two defendant partners were considered of great value; that the Gold Spring Marble Mining claim was conveyed to the Columbia Marble Company as a copartnership; that, notwithstanding the sale by plaintiff of his interest in this property, the remaining moiety still remained the property of the partnership, and that a proper adjustment and settlement of accounts would take the value of this undivided one-half into consideration, in connection with the fact that the defendants had not rendered the services contemplated, and that a true adjustment of the relations, accounts, and affairs of the copartners would be upon this basis.

The court's findings, however, were to the following effect: That the Gold Spring Marble Mining claim or quarry was not the property of the partnership, but was conveyed to and owned by the parties to the action as tenants in common, in the proportion of one-half to the plaintiff and one-quarter each to the defendants; that there was no agreement as to the value of defendants' services upon the basis of $300 per month; that after the conveyance by plaintiff of his one-half interest in the marble claim, plaintiff and defendants by mutual consent dissolved their partnership, and a full, fair, and final accounting and settlement was thereupon had between them. If these findings are supported, there is an end to the controversy.

Considering the finding of the court touching the services which the defendants were to render, and their value, it is found that in the preliminary negotiations between them for the partnership, it was estimated that the services to be rendered by each of the defendants would be worth $150 per month, but that no agreement was entered into that such should be the cash valuation of such services, or with reference to a cash equivalent of such services; nor was any amount agreed upon or fixed as the equivalent for such services and money in case said services were not rendered; nor was there any agreement between them with reference to the value of the marble quarry property; nor was the sum of $100,000, or any other sum, at any time recognized or agreed to by the parties as the value or valuation of the quarry property. Plaintiff's contention was that the quarry property was of the estimated value of $100,000; that against this the defendants were to put into the business $17,500 in cash and $51,428 upon the basis of $300 a month for their services, continuing over the period of 10 years, making the not disproportionate amount of $68,928, which they were to apply as an offset to the value of the quarry, and that at the end of 10 years, and only at the end of 10 years, were they to own the assigned one-fourth interests in the quarry. The evidence against this contention and in support of the finding is, however, that the plaintiff, who was a lawyer, being anxious to enlist the defendants, who were practical business men, in the operation of the quarry and in the conduct of a marble business, first offered to sell them the quarry for $25,000 cash, failing which he proposed articles of copartnership to last for two years, the defendants to supply the necessary money and devote their time and services, the one at the quarry, the other in San Francisco, in the product and sale of the stone. Defendants objected that the two years' time was altogether too short to justify them in the investment of so large an amount of money, and estimated, moreover, that the services which they would be expected to render would represent in value at least $150 a month each. It was in the course of this discussion that the figures above quoted were made. The two-year proposition was rejected and the 10 years finally agreed upon. The evidence of the defendant partners agrees that the articles of copartnership entered into never contemplated the valuation of their services for any other purpose than that indicated; that the contention was never made by the plaintiff, or by any one else on his behalf, that any part of the consideration for the quarter interest in the quarry which each received was the services to be rendered by them, and they both positively asserted that there was never at any time any agreement by which their services were to be measured, figured, or adjusted upon that or any other basis. The partnership business failing to be profitable, and plaintiff being in debt to the partnership, the other partners having advanced more even than the moneys called for, plaintiff undertook to accomplish the sale of his interest in the quarry, agreeing to settle his accounts with the partnership after such sale. The contemplated sale by plaintiff was to Crooks and Jarboe of his undivided one-half interest for the sum of $50,000. If it be argued that this established a value for the whole quarry of $100,000, the answer is not alone from the testimony of the defendants that it was originally offered to them for $25,000, but it is found also in the partnership articles. By those articles, if plaintiff was minded to sell his interest, the defendants had the right to purchase it by paying therefor the sum of $20,000. In contemplation of the $50,000 sale, they could have exercised this option, and themselves sold the half interest, instead of assenting to the sale which they thus permitted plaintiff to make.

[1] The finding to the effect that plaintiff and defendants owned the quarry as tenants in common in the indicated proportions, and that the quarry was not the property of the partnership, is sought to be overcome by the language of the partnership articles, by the terms of the deed, and by the testimony of the plaintiff. Against this is the testimony of the defendants, and the whole course and conduct, writings, and declarations of the plaintiff himself are at variance with this contention. The utmost that can be said for the deed is that it in terms conveys to the grantees as tenants in common, but declares that it is made "in fulfillment of the partnership agreement." It has been said that under the construction given by the court defendants' titles were not conditioned, either upon the value or the continuance of their services. The partnership proved unprofitable; a continuance of their services would but have involved the partners still further in debt; plaintiff was owing moneys to the partnership; the business had been discontinued; a lease had been made of the quarry itself—substantially the only thing within the contemplation of the partnership business; and, finally, when the lease lapsed, plaintiff made a sale of his interest in the quarry, which the grantees of that interest testified they considered meant the substitution of themselves in the place of plaintiff in the business, and included whatever interest in the personal property plaintiff might possess. To this brief statement may be added that the testimony of the defendant partners is to the effect that they also considered that plaintiff was eliminating himself from the partnership by this sale and the subsequent accounting and settlement which was had. But if it be conceded that doubt exists of the true construction of this deed, as to whether it conveyed the interests in common or in partnership (Civ. Code, § 682), then the construction put upon it by the parties themselves affords the surest and most certain test of their own understanding. True this understanding would not control the rights of creditors or outside parties, but it is controlling as between the parties themselves, and no outside interests are here involved.

[2] It is well settled that a deed or contract indefinite in terms may be made definite and certain by the practical construction of the parties to it. 1 Warvelle, Vendors, pp. 367, 375; Mulford v. Le Franc, 26 Cal. 108; Hastings v. Stark, 36 Cal. 126; Truett v. Adams, 66 Cal. 222, 5 Pac. 96; Mittau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 14, 84 Pac. 145, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275. Says this court in Widbur v. Washburn, 47 Cal. 67: "The parties have themselves so construed the deed by their subsequent acts, and there is no reasonable ground to doubt that this is the correct interpretation of it." In Hill v. McKay, 94 Cal. 20, 29 Pac. 410, it is said: "When the meaning of the language of a contract is doubtful, the acts of the parties done under it afford one of the most reliable clues to the intention of the parties." Plaintiff's own testimony forces the conclusion that he himself construed the deed as did his defendant partners. Noticing but a few matters so demonstrating: The consent to the sale made by plaintiff to Crooks and Jarboe of his one-half interest was prepared by plaintiff. It does not purport to assent to the sale of partnership property, but is a "consent to the sale by said William Grant of his undivided one-half interest in said lands and property." Plaintiff's deed to Crooks and Jarboe is a deed to "an undivided one-half interest of, in, and to that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land," etc. This deed is made by plaintiff alone, not in the name of the partnership, and does not purport to convey partnership property. The agreement for the conveyance entered into by plaintiff with Crooks and Jarboe for the sale of his undivided one-half, and signed by plaintiff, declares that plaintiff will convey to the other parties an undivided one-half of the marble quarry property, "which property was acquired by the party of the first part and David Hearfield and W. D. Bannister, and is now owned by said Grant, Hearfield, and Bannister in the proportions of one-half to said party of the first part, and one-fourth each to the said Hearfield and Bannister." An agreement entered into between the three partners in reference to the water rights conveyed as appurtenant to the quarry contained the recital that Grant, Hearfield, and Bannister "were the owners as tenants in common in the proportion of one-half to Grant and one-fourth each to Hearfield and Bannister of that certain property known as the marble quarry, with its water rights and appurtenances."

[3] Plaintiff, as has been said, is a lawyer, with knowledge of the meaning of the terms used, and throughout all of the record of their transactions there is no suggestion that he considered that the title to the property rested in the partnership, or that it was other than property held by the partners as tenants in common, and used for partnership purposes. This, of course, is in accordance with the general construction of instruments where a deed of realty to partners individually, if unexplained, vests in them undivided interests as tenants in common. Hardenbergh v. Bacon, 33 Cal. 356; Greenwood v. Marvin, 111 N. Y. 423, 19 N. E. 228; Thompson v. Bowman, 73 U. S. 317, 18 L. Ed. 736. And, indeed, it is no unusual thing that property be used for partnership purposes and not belong to the partnership. It may belong either to a third person, to one of the partners, or to the partners as tenants in common. Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 566, 17 Pac. 702; Humes v. Higman, 145 Ala. 215, 40 South. 128; Robinson, etc., v. Miller, 153 Ill. 244, 38 N. E. 1078, 27 L. R. A. 449, 46 Am. St. Rep. 883; Lindsay v. Rice, 103 Mich. 28, 61 N. W. 271; Neill v. Shamburg, 158 Pa. 263, 27 Atl. 992.

[4] The third and last finding here necessary to consider is to the effect that the partnership affairs were adjusted, settled, and the partnership discontinued long prior to the commencement of this action. No serious attack is made upon this finding. It is abundantly supported, first, by the written agreement under which the defendants assented to plaintiff's sale of his interest in the property. That agreement recited that subsequent to the sale "William Grant and ourselves will adjust all accounts arising from the transaction of the business of said firm, and that William Grant will personally account and pay over to us any moneys that may be found due on such settlement of accounts." Such an account and settlement were actually had, and plaintiff paid over some $2,500 found to be due from him. The accounts were made up by a disinterested expert of the partners' joint selection. It was considered as a final adjustment and accounting. The only thing shown upon this trial, which could be considered as overlooked or unsettled items, were expenditures made by plaintiff, and aggregating about $210—more than offset by expenditures proved to have been made by defendants and not accounted for, aggregating $315. The items and the amounts were themselves too trifling to support any claim for a new or additional accounting.

For which reasons the order appealed from is affirmed.

RANDALL v. WASHINGTON et al.

(L. A. 2,627.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1911. Rehearing Denied Nov. 1, 1911.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 131*)—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—PRESUMPTION.

Where a married woman acquired title to real estate by deed of grant duly recorded and for a valuable consideration, the disputable presumption that the property vested in the first grantee as her separate property becomes a conclusive presumption in favor of the title of a purchaser from her in good faith and for a valuable and adequate consideration.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by M. Randall against Jane Washington and husband to quiet title. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. Randall, in pro. per. Chas. S. Darden, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to quiet title to realty. Plaintiff's title was acquired by deed from Lemuel Donaldson and Delcia Donaldson, his wife, of date May 1, 1908. Defendants' title comes from a deed of the wife Delcia alone. Delcia Donaldson, such are the facts and the findings, acquired title to the property from the Golden State Realty Company by deed of March 3, 1906. The deed was a deed of grant for a valuable consideration, and was duly recorded. Title thus stood of record in Delcia Donaldson for a year and ten months, when on December 6, 1907, she conveyed the property for a valuable consideration to the defendant Jane Washington. The court further found that Jane Washington took title in good faith and for a valuable and adequate consideration.

The disputable presumption that title to the land in question vested in Delcia Donaldson as her separate property thus became a conclusive presumption in favor of the defendant Jane Washington, and the court rendered its judgment accordingly. Upon this appeal a successful effort is made to show that the property was in fact acquired by the earnings of the husband, Lemuel Donaldson; but no success attends the effort of appellant's counsel to show, and no evidence supports his statement to the effect, that defendant was not a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

ABBOTT v. 76 LAND & WATER CO.

(S. F. 5,475.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 28, 1911. Rehearing Denied Oct. 28, 1911.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 129*)—INCIDENTAL RELIEF—DAMAGES FOR DELAY.

In an action for specific performance, the court may award any legal damages suffered by delay in performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 420–423; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 593*)—RES JUDICATA—SPLITTING CAUSES OF ACTION — CONTRACTS TO CONVEY.

Under the rule that an entire claim arising under contract or tort cannot be made the subject of several suits for damages, one who elected to sue for specific performance of an agreement to convey, instead of for damages for the breach, was bound to recover incidentally thereto all his damages from delay in conveying, so that the decree for specific performance barred a subsequent action for damages from the delay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1108; Dec. Dig. § 593.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 593*)—RES JUDICATA.

If the contract claim sued on is entire, the fact that all the items of damage cannot be proved when suit is brought, or that all the damage has not been suffered, will not authorize a second action to recover such items of damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1108; Dec. Dig. § 593.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 602*) — RES JUDICATA—SUCCESSIVE CAUSES OF ACTION.

Where a breach of contract is continuous, a judgment for damages accruing before the commencement of the action does not bar a second action for damages subsequently accruing, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1047, providing that successive actions may be maintained upon the same contract whenever, after the former action, a new cause of action arises therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1117; Dec. Dig. § 602.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 602*)—RES JUDICATA—SUCCESSIVE ACTIONS—CONTINUING BREACH OF CONTRACT.

A continuing breach of contract, within the rule permitting a subsequent action for damages accruing after judgment in a prior action, where the breach is continuing, necessarily implies a continuing duty; and there can be no continuing breach of a contract to sell realty, so as to make the rule applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1117; Dec. Dig. § 602.*]

6. LIS PENDENS (§ 22*)—EFFECT OF FILING—PURCHASERS PENDING SUIT.

Where a lis pendens was filed at the commencement of actions for specific performance of agreements to convey land with irrigation rights, any sale of the land or water rights pending the action would be subject to plaintiff's rights therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lis Pendens, Cent. Dig. §§ 31, 34–37; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 156*)—RESERVATIONS—WATER RIGHTS.

A deed conveyed a system of water ditches, and "such right to use the water of K. river in said ditches as" the grantor "now possesses," and further provided that there was "saved and reserved" from the operation of the conveyance so much of the water now owned by the grantor as would enable it to fulfill any contracts for the supply of water which it had theretofore made, and the grantee covenanted to keep the ditches in such repair as would enable the grantor to perform the service required by such contracts. Held, that there was no transfer of any water rights to which others were there entitled under contract with the grantor.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by L. E. Abbott against the 76 Land & Water Company. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

O. L. Abbott and S. J. Hinds, for appellant. L. L. Cory and W. S. Goodfellow & Eells, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, in an action brought to recover $134,145, with interest.

The second amended complaint stated four alleged causes of action, all of which have been assigned to this plaintiff by the original owners. The first is a sample of all. One O. L. Abbott was, on October 1, 1887, the equitable owner of 320 acres of land, and of "320 inches of water, miner's measurement, incident thereto, constant and permanent flow from the canal of defendant." Defendant held the legal title as trustee for said Abbott, with the duty resting on it to convey the same to said Abbott on receipt of payment for said property. On said date Abbott offered to pay such price, and demanded a conveyance. Defendant denied said right on the part of Abbott until March 4, 1892, when it accepted payment, and executed to Abbott a grant deed of said land and water. This deed contained an express covenant that the land and its appurtenant water were free and clear of all incumbrance by the grantor, and also a statement that the deed was executed in compliance with a decree of the superior court of Fresno county, given February 21, 1890. On or about July 1, 1890, defendant has sold to the Alta Irrigation District 2,680 inches of water, including said 320 inches of water, for $410,000. Abbott has demanded a delivery of said water, but defendant has not delivered or been able to deliver the same to him. On October 1, 1887, the land, with said water incident thereto, was worth $16,000, and Abbott was to pay only $4,800 therefor. Defendant withheld the legal title for the purpose of gaining the difference of $11,200. While defendant withheld the legal title, the property became worth $24,000. If the legal title had not been so withheld, Abbott would have sold said land for its highest market value, namely, $24,000. While it was so withheld, the land depreciated in value until at the time of the conveyance it was worth only $9,600, by reason of all which Abbott was damaged in the sum of $14,400. Defendant received from the Alta Irrigation District for Abbott's 320 inches of water $49,953, which it withholds from him, to his damage in that amount. No damage, other than that heretofore specified, is alleged. It is to be observed that no claim was made that there was any damage arising from withholding the use and possession of the land and the appurtenant water right. The allegations of the complaint are consistent with the theory that Abbott was in possession of the land at the commencement of the action and at all times thereafter, and the court expressly found that at the commencement of the action Abbott was in actual possession of such land and the appurtenant water right. The second cause of action was one on behalf of S. B. Abbott, the third on behalf of Tom Tyner, and the fourth on behalf of John H. Shipe; all being substantially the same as that on behalf of O. L. Abbott.

The allegations of facts showing damage by reason of the retention of the legal title to the land were denied by the answer, as also were the allegations as to a sale to the Alta Irrigation District of the water incident to such land, and the allegations as to any demand for the water and inability and refusal on the part of defendant to furnish the same. That defendant withheld said title for the purpose of gaining the difference of $11,200 was also denied.

It was further alleged, as a special defense to each cause of action, that long prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiff's assignor commenced and prosecuted to final judgment on the merits an action against defendant, in which action all matters relating to the alleged depreciation and other matters set forth in the complaint in this action could and should have been litigated.

In relation to the claim of plaintiff's assignor as to the land, the trial court found as to each cause of action as follows: Such assignor entered into possession of the land in the year 1885, under a written lease given by defendant, for the term of one year from October 1, 1885. By this lease it was provided that the lessee should have the privilege of purchasing the demised premises at any time before October 1, 1886, at a specified price. On or about October 1, 1886, the claimant accepted a new lease for one year, commencing on said date, but such lease contained no provision authorizing the lessee to purchase the property. In September, 1887, plaintiff's assignor claimed the right under his lease to purchase the land at the price specified in the 1885 lease, and defendant denied such right. Plaintiff's assignor having tendered the price so specified and made his demand for a deed, and such demand being refused, an action for the specific performance of the alleged contract of purchase and sale was commenced by plaintiff's assignor against the defendant in the year 1889. The facts found negative completely the idea of any bad faith on the part of defendant in withholding the legal title. In February, 1890, a judgment was given by the superior court in such action in favor of plaintiff's assignor, adjudging the existence of the alleged right, and directing the execution of a deed upon payment of the specified price before a specified date (October 1, 1890). An appeal was taken by defendant to this court, and in January, 1891, the judgment was affirmed by this court. Abbott v. 76 Land & Water Co., 87 Cal. 323, 25 Pac. 693. No tender of the specified price having been made by plaintiff's assignor after judgment and prior to October 1, 1890, defendant claimed that his right under such decree had lapsed and still refused to execute the deed. Thereupon it was cited by the superior court for contempt, and adjudged guilty thereof. A proceeding in certiorari was then instituted in this court to review the action of the superior court in such contempt matter, and in February, 1892, judgment was given, affirming the order of the superior court (76 Land & Water Co. v. Superior Court, 93 Cal. 139, 28 Pac. 813), and on March 4, 1892, as already stated, defendant complied with such decree by executing its deed. (The alleged depreciation in value in the land occurred subsequent to the commencement of the action, and, as we understand, subsequent to the rendition of judgment by the superior court in the specific performance action.) At the time of the original breach of its contract to sell by defendant, no damages were sustained by plaintiff's assignor, and he then elected to avail himself of the remedy by specific performance, and not to avail himself of an action at law to recover damages for such breach. It was further found that such delay as occurred between the time of such breach and the execution of the deed was caused by this litigation, and the necessary delay of the courts in adjudicating the rights of the parties.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In relation to the claim of plaintiff's assignor as to the water, the court found as follows: The water right was appurtenant to the land, and had no separate existence therefrom. Plaintiff's assignor was in the actual possession of the land, with the appurtenant water right at the time of the commencement of the action. In the sale and conveyance by defendant to the Alta Irrigation District, there was an exception or reservation of all water belonging to plaintiff's assignor. At all times, plaintiff's assignor was able to take and receive all water required by him in connection with said land, and defendant has never been unable to deliver the same to him.

As to both land and water, the court found that no damage was sustained. Also that, if any damage was sustained, the same was caused by the delay of litigation, and was also in its nature remote and speculative damage, not otherwise recoverable at law.

It was further found that the land with its appurtenant water right became the property of the Sacremento Bank, a corporation, by sale under a trust deed given to secure a loan.

[1] So far as the land was concerned, it cannot be disputed that the findings above referred to are fully sustained by the evidence. In view of the facts thus shown, we know of no rule of law that authorizes a recovery in this action of the damage alleged in regard thereto. Certainly no authority has been cited by plaintiff that would sustain such a recovery. The sole cause of the damages alleged was defendant's breach of its contract to sell the land to plaintiff's assignor. The breach occurred in the year 1887, and was, as said by counsel for defendant, "a total breach and repudiation of the contract." The defendant claimed in good faith, and with apparently much ground for its claim, that the contract relied on by plaintiff's assignor did not entitle him to purchase the land. Be this as it may, the contract, so far as it related to the matter of the sale of the land, was single and entire. The total abandonment or breach thereof by defendant gave plaintiff's assignor but a single cause of action, and this single cause of action could not be so split as to afford warrant for two or more actions. It is true that the vendee had an election of remedies. He might have brought an action to recover such damages as were caused him by the breach; or he might, as he did, bring his action for specific enforcement of the contract, and in such action obtain, not only the specific enforcement of his contract, but also such damages as he was lawfully entitled to; for it is thoroughly settled that a court of equity, taking jurisdiction for the purpose of specifically enforcing a contract, takes full jurisdiction of all the rights of the parties, whether legal or equitable, and may award such legal damages as the vendee may have suffered by reason of the delay in performance. See 2 Warvelle on Vendors, § 958; 36 Cyc. 753.

[2] But, under elementary principles, he was bound to obtain all his relief on account of the breach in one action, and could not recover part in one and part in another. If he had brought his action at law for damages, thereby treating the contract as at an end, a judgment therein awarding him damages would have been conclusive on him as to the amount of damages sustained by reason of the breach, and a bar to any action for further damage on account thereof. Resorting as he did to an action in equity to compel specific performance of the contract, instead of an action at law for damages, the decree in his favor of the court having the power to give him all relief that he was entitled to on account of the breach is likewise conclusive, and a bar to any subsequent action for relief based on the same contract. This is the necessary result of the application of the well-settled principle that an entire claim, arising either upon a contract or from a wrong, cannot be divided and made the subject of several suits. [3] In such a case, it is no warrant for a second action that the party may not be able to actually prove in the first action all the items of the demand, or that all the damage may not then have been actually suffered. He is bound to prove in the first action, not only such damage as has been actually suffered, but also such prospective damage by reason of the breach as he may be legally entitled to; for the judgment he recovers in such action will be a conclusive adjudication as to the total damage on account of the breach. See generally, on this subject, 1 Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) §§ 106, 108, 112, 113, 120.

[4] Appellant's claim for a contrary rule in this case must necessarily be that defendant's breach was what is known in the law as a continuous breach, continuing from the first repudiation of the contract to the day of the execution of the deed, and giving rise to new causes of action as long as it continues. Of course, in such a case, a judgment for damages accruing prior to the commencement of the action is not a bar to an action for damages accruing subsequently, for the claim for such damages is a new cause of action. This is recognized by section 1047, Code of Civil Procedure, but the rule there stated has no application to actions for additional damages on account of some particular breach involved in a former action. See note to section 106 of Sutherland on Damages.

[5] But a continuous breach necessarily implies a continuous duty, such as the duty imposed by a stipulation to keep certain premises in repair during a specified term. There can be no such thing in the case of the absolute repudiation by the vendor of a contract for the sale of real estate. In the latter case there is a single breach, complete at the time of such repudiation, and a single and entire cause of action at once accrues. And it is especially true in such a case that a decree of specific performance of the contract of sale is a bar to any further relief based on the claim of the breach; for, as we have said, an action for specific performance necessarily involves, not only the question of such performance, but also all claims for compensation and damage on account of the delay in performance.

In the case of Warner v. Bacon, 8 Gray (Mass.) 397, 69 Am. Dec. 253, which is practically the only case relied on by appellant, the first action was not one for specific performance, but an action at law for damages for the withholding of a deed to which the plaintiff was entitled under a contract of exchange. The plaintiff was allowed to maintain a second action for damages accruing after the commencement of the first action for a continued withholding of such deed from that time to the date when the deed was executed. The court did not appear to deny that, where a contract is entirely broken and repudiated, there is but a single breach and a single cause of action, but, taking the case as one in which it appeared that the agreement had "hitherto been treated by both parties as an open and continuing agreement," held that the facts showed "only a temporary withholding of the plaintiff's rights," for which damages could be recovered in any action only to the time of the action commenced, and that as to damages subsequently accruing, by reason of a continuance of the withholding, a new cause of action existed. Whether this decision was correct or not is unimportant here, in view of the fact that an action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands involves the adjustment of all matters in dispute relating to such contract, including claims for compensation and damages for delay in the performance adjudged up to the very date of such performance. But the decision cannot be taken as warranting a conclusion that, upon such facts as appear in this case, there was anything, other than a single and entire breach, complete at the time of the commencement of the action for specific performance, on account of which only one action could be maintained.

In Fish v. Folley, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 54, it was held, in accord with the rule we have discussed, that, where the defendant had covenanted that plaintiff should have a continual supply of water for his mill from a dam, and subsequently totally failed to perform for nine years, and plaintiff brought an action for the breach and recovered damages sustained by him to that time, the judgment was a bar to a second action arising from subsequent failure to perform, on the theory that, although the covenant was a continuing one in one sense, it was an entire contract, and a total breach put an end to it, and gave plaintiff the right to sue for an equivalent in damages.

In accord with the views we have stated, it has been held that the continued withholding of stocks or bonds after the bringing of action to enforce their delivery, pending the litigation and up to the time of the enforcement of the decree, is not a new wrong, redressible by a new action, but is simply a continuation of the original wrong, for which the only redress given by the law must be had in the original action, and that consequently a second action would not lie for the damage due to depreciation in the value of the stocks or bonds occurring between the time of the commencement of the first action and the determination of such action on appeal. See Bracken v. Atlantic Trust Co., 167 N. Y. 510, 60 N. E. 772, 82 Am. St. Rep. 731; Commerce Exchange Natl. Bank v. Blye, 123 N. Y. 132, 25 N. E. 208. In the case last cited the court said: "The complaint discloses a single tort, which has formed the subject of an action and been redressed by a judgment therein. It alleges no new or separate demand, but simply a continuance of the refusal to obey it, after judgment and pending the appeals therefrom. If the defendant's continued possession during that interval was a wrong at all, it was not new or separate, but a continuance of that sued upon, and dependent upon the demand proved in that action. At the most, the complaint shows an extension of the damages beyond the date of the trial judgment, and growing out of the delay, inseparable from the defendant's right of appeal, and so we are required to say, if we affirm this judgment, either that the damages flowing from a single wrong may be divided into two parts, and each part form the subject of a separate action, or that the exercise by the defendant of the right of appeal upon the precise terms and conditions dictated by the law constitutes a new and illegal detention of the property in controversy. The first proposition is, of course, inadmissible, and the judgment must stand, if at all, upon the second; and that necessarily involves a conclusion that the appeals taken, by reason of the delay which they occasioned, constituted a new detention and a new wrong, for which a separate action could be maintained. Neither reason nor authority justify that conclusion."

That a decree of specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of real estate is a bar to any subsequent action by the vendee for damages on account of the breach of such contract is held in Head v. Meloney, 111 Pa. St. 99, 2 Atl. 195, and Thompson v. Myrick, 24 Minn. 4. In the Pennsylvania case it is said, among other things, that, as is plain, the suit for the specific performance was "an action upon the contract in its entirety"; and it was substantially held that the decree in such a case must be taken as a complete and final adjudication of the rights of the parties growing out of said contract.

From what we have said, it is manifest, we think, as was found by the trial court, that, so far as the land is concerned, all the rights and remedies of plaintiff's assignors here sought to be enforced were merged in and exhausted by the specific performance action.

[6] In regard to the water, plaintiff's only claim was for the proceeds of the alleged sale by defendant to the Alta Irrigation District, during the pendency of the specific performance action, of the water belonging to his assignors. In regard to the water, in addition to the facts already specified, the trial court found that in the sale and conveyance to the Alta Irrigation District there was not included any of the waters or water rights claimed by any of such assignors, and that defendant did not sell to such district any water or water rights to which plaintiff's assignors were entitled, or receive from such district any money for any water subject to said contract. It further found that at the time of the commencement of each of the specific performance actions, except that of S. B. Abbott (involving 80 acres and 80 inches of water), a notice of lis pendens was duly filed. This finding as to the filing of lis pendens is not attacked. It is manifest, as said by respondent, that, in view of this finding, no sale made pending the action could prejudice or affect the rights of any of plaintiff's assignors, except S. B. Abbott, to obtain the land and water.

[7] But we think that the court was correct in its conclusion that the sale to the district was expressly made subject to the contracts of plaintiff's assignors, and that all their rights under their contracts were expressly reserved and excepted from the effect of the conveyance. The conveyance was for the express consideration of $410,000, represented by bonds of the district, and conveyed the system of water ditches owned by it, "and such right to use the water of Kings river in said ditches as said party of the first part now possesses." It provided further: "There is also saved and reserved from the operation and effect of this conveyance so much of the water now owned by the party of the first part, or to which it is entitled, as shall be sufficient to enable the party of the first part thereto to carry out and fulfill any and all contracts for the supply of water which it has hitherto made with any person or persons, corporation or corporations, * * * and there is also saved and reserved from the operation and effect of this conveyance the right to take from said canals and ditches so much of the water flowing therein as is hereby reserved as shall be necessary to carry out the said contracts and all of them, until all of said contracts be released or in some manner extinguished." The grantee also covenanted that it would keep the canals and ditches conveyed to it in such repair as would enable them to perform the service required by said contracts. Manifestly the intent of these provisions was to except from the effect of the conveyance so much of the water and water rights as was necessary to enable the grantor to comply with any and all valid contracts theretofore made by it involving the furnishing of water, and the imposition upon the grantee of the burden of maintaining the ditches in such condition that the rights of the parties under such contracts would not be impaired. If this be so, there was no transfer of any of the water or water rights belonging to any of plaintiff's assignors, and none of the consideration received by the defendant from the Alta Irrigation District can be considered proceeds of the sale of property belonging to any of such assignors. The findings of the court on this branch of the case are amply sustained by the evidence. No other damage in regard to the water or water rights was alleged; plaintiff seeking simply the proceeds of the alleged sale of the water of his assignors.

It is claimed that the court failed to find on certain issues, but an examination of the objections in this behalf shows that where there was any such failure the issue was immaterial, in view of our conclusions upon the matters discussed in this opinion. We find no other matter requiring discussion.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

LAURICELLA et ux. v. LAURICELLA.

(S. F. 5,291.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1911. Rehearing Denied Nov. 1, 1911.)

1. Trusts (§ 92½*)—Constructive Trust—Parol Agreement—Statutes.

Civ. Code, § 2217, defines an involuntary trust as one created by operation of law, and section 2224 declares that one who gains a thing by fraud, violation of a trust, or other wrongful act is an involuntary trustee for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it. Section 847 provides that uses and trusts in relation to real property are only those specified in that title, which includes sections 852 and 857. Section 852 limits trusts to those created or declared by writing, signed by the trustee, by conveyance to the trustee, or by operation of law. Section 857 is entitled "For what purposes express trusts may be created," and specifies four different classes distinguished by the different purposes to be accomplished. Held, that sections 847, 857, relate to express trusts only, and do not preclude the establishment and enforcement of a constructive trust for a grantee's refusal to perform a parol agreement to convey part of the property conveyed to her to plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 141; Dec. Dig. § 92½.*]

2. Trusts (§ 96*)—Constructive Trust—Public Policy.

The enforcement of a constructive trust is not against public policy, where the effect is to indirectly carry out a parol trust to convey land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 148; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

3. Trusts (§ 92*)—Certainty—Statutes—Application.

Civ. Code, § 2221, providing that, subject to the provisions of section 852, a voluntary trust is created, as to the trustor and beneficiary, by any words or acts of the trustor indicating with reasonable certainty an intention to create a trust, and the subject, purpose, and beneficiary, has no application to a constructive trust, but relates to express trusts only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

4. Trusts (§ 103*)—Wife's Agreement to Hold Property—Estoppel.

Civ. Code, § 172, provides that a husband cannot make a gift of community property or convey the same, without a valuable consideration, except with the wife's consent, and section 1386, subd. 2, and section 1402, declare that on the death of a husband, without issue, community property vests three-fourths in surviving widow, and one-fourth in the husband's surviving father and mother. Held that, where a husband conveyed community property to his wife on her parol agreement to convey one-half to his parents on his death, her acceptance of the deed carried with it an acceptance of the trust, and she, having claimed the entire property under the deed, was estopped to deny its validity as to the one-fourth of the property because it was community.

5. Estoppel (§ 113*)—Pleading—Necessity.

Where a husband conveyed community property to his wife on her parol agreement to convey at his death one-half to his parents, and in their suit to enforce such agreement as a constructive trust the allegation in her answer that the property was acquired after the marriage, and was therefore community property, authorized plaintiffs to rely on defendant's estoppel to claim that the deed was valid as a conveyance to her, and invalid as to the condition on which it was executed, without pleading it specially.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

6. Appeal and Error (§ 961*)—Discretion of Court—Review—Exclusion of Witness.

Refusal of the trial court to compel the exclusion of plaintiff's son while plaintiff was giving his deposition before a notary, even if permitted by Code Civ. Proc. § 2043, in the court's discretion, will not be held ground for reversing a judgment for plaintiff, in the absence of a showing of an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3839, 3840; Dec. Dig. § 961.*]

7. Evidence (§ 273*)—Statements as to Title.

In a suit to enforce a constructive trust as to certain land conveyed by a husband to his wife on her oral promise to convey one-half to plaintiffs on the husband's death, statements made by the husband to defendant, in the presence of witnesses, a few weeks after the execution of the deed, reciting the substance of the agreement and her repetition of the promise, were competent against her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1108–1120; Dec. Dig. § 273;* Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 132.]

8. Witnesses (§ 414*)—Corroboration—Admissions—Defendant.

In a suit to enforce a constructive trust against a widow concerning property conveyed to her by her husband, her admissions, made after her husband's death, concerning the terms of the trust agreement, were competent in corroboration of the other witnesses as to what took place between her and her husband when the conveyance was made to her, and immediately before it.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Suit by Guiseppe Lauricella and wife against Marina Lauricella, to establish and enforce a constructive trust in land. From a judgment for plaintiffs and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. C. Sargent (Jos. F. Cavagnaro, of counsel), for appellant. James C. Sims and J. A. Spinetti, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action to establish and enforce an alleged constructive trust in land. Judgment was given for plaintiffs. Defendant moved for a new trial, and the motion was denied. Defendant has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

The facts, as stated in the findings, are as follows: Domenico Lauricella, on July 11, 1906, was the owner of the two parcels of land in question. The plaintiffs were, respectively, his father and mother. The defendant was his wife. He had no children. On the day mentioned, he conveyed said lands, by deed absolute on its face, to his wife, in reliance upon an oral agreement between them that she would hold the same in trust for him during his lifetime, and that upon his death she would hold one half thereof as her own property, and would convey the other half to his father and mother, in equal shares. This conveyance was made in reliance upon her devotion and fidelity to him, as his wife, and in the belief that she would faithfully execute the trust stated, as she agreed to do, and but for her said promise the conveyance would not have been made. There was no other consideration for the conveyance. Domenico died intestate on September 10, 1906, leaving his said father, mother, and wife surviving. Thereupon the father and mother demanded of the wife, Marina, a conveyance of one-half of said lands, which was refused, whereupon they began this action.

[1] The defendant earnestly contends that the evidence does not sustain the findings. It is unnecessary to discuss this objection at length. A perusal of the evidence has satisfied us that the evidence is sufficient.

[2] The main contention in support of the appeal is that the facts found do not show a valid trust under the laws of this state. The argument in this behalf is that, under the provisions of sections 847 and 857 of the Civil Code, no express trust in real estate can be created, having for its object the conveyance of such real estate by the trustee to a third person; that the trust here attempted to be enforced is a trust for the specific and sole purpose of having Marina Lauricella, as trustee, convey one-half of the real estate to the plaintiffs; that this is clearly an express trust to convey, not permitted by said sections of the Code, and, being contrary to the declared policy of the law, must be held void; and that for the same reason it is not enforceable even as a constructive trust, or a trust created by operation of law.

It was held by this court, in Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70, that an express trust, created by will or other writing, vesting the title to land in trustees, upon the trust that it shall be by them conveyed to third persons named in the instrument, is void under the aforesaid sections of the Code. This decision has been repeatedly followed, and must now be considered as the settled law of the state. Estate of Sanford, 136 Cal. 98, 68 Pac. 494; Estate of Pichoir, 139 Cal. 685, 73 Pac. 606; McCurdy v. Otto, 140 Cal. 51, 73 Pac. 748; Hofsas v. Cummings, 141 Cal. 527, 75 Pac. 110; Estate of Dixon, 143 Cal. 513, 77 Pac. 412. If the trust here asserted came within the principle of these decisions, or was one which fell within the scope of sections 847 and 857, unquestionably we should be compelled to say that it is void.

Defendant concedes that under the previous decisions of this court in Nordholt v. Nordholt, 87 Cal. 552, 26 Pac. 599, 22 Am. St. Rep. 268, Hayne v. Hermann, 97 Cal. 260, 32 Pac. 171, Simons v. Bedell, 122 Cal. 341, 55 Pac. 3, 68 Am. St. Rep. 35, and Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 587, 108 Pac. 506, the facts found would be sufficient to establish a trust by operation of law, which could be enforced by the father and mother of Domenico, as beneficiaries thereof. She claims, however, that those cases, except Cooney v. Glynn, were decided before the decision in Estate of Fair, supra, had established the proposition that an express trust to convey land was void, that in none of them was the exact point here presented discussed or considered, and that the effect of the decision in the Fair Case is to overthrow the previously established rule, so far as it allowed the enforcement of constructive trusts founded upon a parol agreement to convey to a third person as beneficiary of the donor. This theory, if allowed to prevail, would go much farther, and would destroy a large class of constructive trusts heretofore deemed to be authorized by the principles of equity jurisprudence. In a large number of cases of this class, the grantor is himself the beneficiary, and the trust arises from the refusal of the grantee to perform a parol promise, given and received in the confidence induced by confidential relations, to reconvey to the grantor. Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, Id., 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186, Adams v. Lambard, 80 Cal. 426, 22 Pac. 180, Alaniz v. Casenave, 91 Cal. 43, 27 Pac. 521, Hays v. Gloster, 88 Cal. 560, 26 Pac. 367, Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 Pac. 1108, and Jones v. Jones, 140 Cal. 587, 74 Pac. 143, are instances in which constructive trusts of this character have been recognized and enforced. If the contention of the defendant were sound, the result would be that all these cases as well as those first above cited, must be deemed erroneous. A great number of similar cases could be cited from other jurisdictions. Many of them will be found in the notes in 1 Perry on Trusts, § 181, and 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1053, 1054, and 1055. Perry states the doctrine thus: "Courts of equity will not only interfere in cases of fraud to set aside acts done, but they will also, if acts have by fraud been prevented from being done, interfere, and treat the case exactly as if the acts had been done; and this they will do by converting the party who has committed the fraud, and profited by it, into a trustee for the party in whose favor the act would otherwise have been done." That the conduct of the wife in this case, in accepting the deed upon her promise to convey to the plaintiffs, and thereafter refusing to fulfill that promise, constitutes at least constructive fraud sufficient to create the trust is fully shown by the discussion of that subject in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 529, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, and in the second appeal of the same case in 90 Cal. 329, 336, 27 Pac. 186.

When we consider the several provisions of the Civil Code on the subject together, as we must in order to arrive at their true meaning, it appears clear that the provisions of sections 847 and 857, which were declared by the decision in the Fair Case to forbid an express trust to convey land to a third person, have no application to trusts created by operation of law. Section 847 declares that "uses and trusts in relation to real property are those only which are specified in this title." Section 852 provides that no valid trust can be treated, except (1) by a writing executed by the trustee; (2) by the conveyance to the trustee; or (3) "by operation of law." The first two of these modes constitute the means whereby all express trusts in land are created. Section 857 deals only with express trusts. The headline states its subject as follows: "For what purposes express trusts may be created." The section first declares that "express trusts may be created for any of the following purposes." It then specifies four classes of express trusts distinguished by the different purposes to be accomplished. This section, in connection with section 847, gave rise to the doctrine of the Fair Case that express trusts to convey are not permitted. But, when the three sections are considered together, it is seen that section 857 refers directly to the first and second clauses of section 852, and not to the third clause, and hence that it is intended to apply to and limit the creation of express trusts in writing, and was not to be applied to trusts created by operation of law. The Fair Case and all the decisions following it were instances of endeavors to enforce express trusts attempted to be created by writing. None of them involves a trust created by operation of law, or purports to declare any rule concerning such trusts. The subject of involuntary trusts, defined as a trust created by operation of law (section 2217), usually called constructive trusts, is again dealt with in section 2224 of the Civil Code. Its provisions show clearly that trusts by operation of law are left untouched by sections 847 and 857, and clauses 1 and 2 of section 852. Section 2224 describes the involuntary trust comprehensively as follows: "One who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act, is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it." If the intention had been to prevent involuntary trusts where the violation of an express promise to convey constitutes the foundation—the fraud by which the thing is gained—the last clause should have been written, "for the benefit of the person from whom it was gained." As it stands, it means the person who would have had it, but for the fraud or other wrongful act whereby it was gained. In cases of involuntary trusts, such as that here involved, the fraud consists of the betrayal of confidence by refusing to carry out the parol trust induced by that confidence. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 335, 27 Pac. 186. If the confidence by which the thing was gained had not been betrayed, the person to whom the promise ran, the one who was to receive it ultimately, would be the "person who would otherwise have had it." It necessarily follows that the mere fact that the broken promise, constituting one of the elements whereby an involuntary trust is created, is a promise to convey land, either to the original owner or to a third person, is not a valid objection to the recognition and enforcement of such involuntary trust at the suit of the person who was intended by the donor to be the beneficiary. No conditions, other than those stated in section 2224, are necessary. If those conditions exist, the involuntary trust arises, although the transaction was entirely oral, and consequently void as an express trust under sections 852, 1091, and 1624, and although the means of gaining the thing was the making of an oral or written promise to convey to some other person, or reconvey to the donor.

[3] There is no real force in the argument that the enforcement of an involuntary trust is against public policy, where the effect is to indirectly carry out a trust to convey. The same argument was in early times earnestly made against the recognition of any trust created in parol; it being, as was contended, a violation of the statute of frauds, forbidding the creation of an express trust in land, other than by writing, and the making of agreements to convey or conveyances of land, except by writing. The exception in favor of trusts by operation of law is universally held to exclude from the operation of these statutes of fraud all "trusts which arise from fraud, actual or constructive, or, as they are termed, constructive trusts." Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 527, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189; De Mallagh v. De Mallagh, 77 Cal. 128, 19 Pac. 256; Broder v. Conklin, 77 Cal. 337, 19 Pac. 513; Kimball v. Tripp, 136 Cal. 634, 69 Pac. 428. The principle of these decisions is applicable to the case at bar. Express trusts to convey are forbidden for reasons similar to those which led to the statutory prohibition of express trusts created by parol and the conveyance of land, except by writing; that is, to prevent confusion, uncertainty, frauds, and concealments, as well as perjuries, in relation to the disposition of real property. Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 527, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70. The public policy which led to the inhibition of express trusts to convey is no more stringent or important than that which led to the other statutes mentioned. Neither is tainted with inherent immorality, and neither involves a forbidden use of property. The same exception in favor of involuntary trusts, which are instituted to prevent frauds, should be allowed as in the conveyances of trusts in parol, and for like reasons.

There is a line of cases on which the appellant relies which we think are easily distinguishable from the case at bar. O'Hara's Will, 95 N. Y. 403, 47 Am. Rep. 53, Amherst College v. Ritch, 151 N. Y. 282, 45 N. E. 876, 37 L. R. A. 305, and Edson v. Bartow, 154 N. Y. 215, 48 N. E. 541, are cases of this kind. In these decisions the rule is established that where the agreement of the person against whom the involuntary trust is to be enforced is to convey the property to a charity which the law forbids, or to apply it to uses which the law does not permit, or which are contrary to good morals, a court of equity will not specifically enforce the agreement to do the forbidden thing, nor suffer it to be done, but will declare the conveyance to the trustee void absolutely, and enforce a trust in the property for the benefit of the donor, or his heirs at law. The statute forbidding the creation of express trusts in writing to convey to another the subject of the trust is, as we have stated, based on considerations of convenience in the mere disposition of property, and has no relation to the kind of use it is to be applied to, or to the public policy against certain charities, or to considerations of morality. It is to be classed with the statute of frauds, and, as has been said with respect to the latter, it should not be made the means for the perpetration of a fraud.

[4] The defendant cites Wittfield v. Forster, 124 Cal. 418, 57 Pac. 219, to the effect that, in order to be valid, a declaration of trust must be reasonably certain as to the purposes of the trust, and suggests that this trust is uncertain, because nothing appears in regard to what was to be done with the property in Domenico's lifetime, referring also to section 2221 of the Civil Code. This section and the case cited relate exclusively to the requirements as to express trusts created by writing and otherwise valid under section 857. They have no application to involuntary trusts. The latter are governed by the well-known rule that they must be established by clear and convincing evidence.

[5] The court found that one of the parcels of land was acquired by Domenico during his marriage with the defendant, and that it was their community property. Section 172 of the Civil Code provides that the husband cannot make a gift of the community property, or convey the same without a valuable consideration, unless the wife, in writing, consents thereto. The defendant claims that this prevents the creation of a constructive trust through or by means of a voluntary deed of the community property by the husband to the wife. In this case this puts the wife in the position of claiming a quarter interest in this parcel under the husband's deed, because said deed is void. The husband having died childless, leaving his father and mother surviving, if this deed is void, the law would vest in the wife three-fourths of this parcel, one-half in virtue of her community right, and one-fourth by descent as of separate estate, while the remaining fourth would go to the father and mother. Civ. Code, § 1402; section 1386, subd. 2. She can claim the last-mentioned fourth only under this deed, and, in view of the conclusions hereinbefore stated, only upon the ground that the deed is ineffectual to convey anything. If she accepts the grant at all, she must take it with the burden and upon the trust, by means of which she received it. Her claim of the entire estate under the deed constitutes an effectual estoppel to prevent her from asserting in the same breath that the deed is invalid as to one-fourth. White v. Stevenson, 144 Cal. 112, 77 Pac. 828.

She is estopped by her conduct from claiming the other one-fourth interest as well. Although her husband had not power to make a gift of any part of the community property without her written consent, yet he had the power, without her consent, to make a will giving one-half of it to his father and mother. Civ. Code, § 1402. The facts are that Domenico was in poor health, and was intending to depart for Italy in hope of recovery, and he desired to make some provision for his father and mother, in case he did not return. He could at that time have made a will giving them one-half of this parcel. Instead of making the provision by that method, he chose to rely upon his wife, and transferred it to her upon her promise to carry out his wishes by transferring it to them after his death. To this, with presumed knowledge of his power to do it by will, she agreed. It does not lie in her mouth to say now that if she had then refused to consent he would not have made the same provision by will. And having then, by her consent, prevented the making of the disposition by way of devise, she is clearly estopped, now when death has ended his powers, to say that the arrangement made with her consent shall not be carried out, because it was not within his power then to carry it out in that mode, without her consent in writing.

[6] Her allegation in her answer that it was acquired after the marriage, and therefore community property, authorizes the plaintiffs to rely on the estoppel in regard to that claim, without pleading it specially. Code Civ. Proc. § 462; White v. Stevenson, supra; Fox v. Tay, 89 Cal. 344, 24 Pac. 855, 26 Pac. 897, 23 Am. St. Rep. 474; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 432, 51 Pac. 630.

The evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that the deed was not made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors.

Some objections to procedure are made by defendant's counsel, which we will briefly consider.

[7] When a witness is testifying, the court may, in its discretion, exclude any or all other witnesses, except in certain cases. Code Civ. Proc. § 2043. For the purposes of this case, we may assume that the court may direct the officer who is taking depositions to exclude other persons, while a witness is testifying before him. But, if so, an abuse of discretion must be shown, and substantial prejudice must appear probable, to justify an appellate court in reversing a judgment on the merits, because of a ruling refusing to direct such exclusion. The court below refused to compel the exclusion of the son of the plaintiff Guiseppe Lauricella, while Guiseppe was giving his deposition before a notary, prior to the trial. The record does not show an abuse of discretion in making the ruling.

[8] The statements made by Domenico, the grantor, to the defendant, in the presence of Joseph Lauricella and Grazia Scafida, respectively, a few weeks after the execution of the deed, stating in substance the terms of the original promise on which it was made to her, and her repetition of the promise, were competent as evidence against her. They were evidently referring to what had occurred between them as an inducement for the execution of the deed, and they were not then making a new agreement. See Cooney v. Glynn, supra. The admissions of the defendant, made after the death of her husband, were to the same effect, and were competent as evidence in corroboration of the other witnesses as to what took place between her and her husband when the deed was made, and immediately before it.

These comprise all the points that we deem it necessary to mention. We find no error in the rulings and decision of the court below.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re BAZZURO'S ESTATE.

BAZZURO v. CROCE.

(S. F. 5,837.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1911.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 93*) — VESTED RIGHTS.

The intestate, who died in 1879, held a mortgage which the first administrator foreclosed, buying in the lot at the sale and taking the title in himself as administrator, so as to raise a trust in favor of the heirs. St. 1893, p. 212, amending Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1536, 1545, provided that the real estate of a decedent might be sold, if for the best interest of the heirs; and section 1523 provides for the sale of personalty when for the best interests of the estate. Held, as the property of the heirs in this lot was originally personalty, subject to sale when for the best interest of the estate, and the conversion of the property to realty did not relieve it of that burden, a sale under the act of 1893 did not deprive the heirs of any vested interest in the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 725*) — CONCLUSIVENESS — MATTERS CONCLUDED.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1452, providing that after the expiration of the time for presentation of claims the administrator cannot recover possession of real estate from the heir, unless such property is necessary to pay debts, expenses, or legacies, a judgment in favor of an heir in possession, finding that the administrator should not recover possession for the payment of expenses or debts, is not conclusive against the administrator's right to sell for the payment of expenses; the judgment not being a finding that a sale was unnecessary; and the statute not making the recovery of possession a prerequisite to the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 725.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 349*)—RES JUDICATA—MATTERS CONCLUDED—ORDER FOR SALE OF LAND TO PAY DEBTS.

The question whether a former judgment, refusing to permit an administrator to recover possession of land from an heir, that it might be sold to pay debts and expenses of administration, was conclusive against the right of the administrator to sell to pay expenses, being a matter which could be raised on the application for leave to sell, is concluded by the order for the sale, where no appeal is taken, and cannot be litigated on the hearing of the return of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

4. JUDICIAL SALES (§ 31*)—CONFIRMATION—DISCRETION.

The confirmation of a judicial sale rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, with a view to the best interest of those interested in the proceeds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 59–67; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 983*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—POWER TO REVIEW—ABUSE.

The confirmation of a judicial sale resting in the discretion of the trial court, its action is final on appeal, unless an abuse appears.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3880; Dec. Dig. § 983.*]

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 375*)—ADMINISTRATION SALE OF LAND—CONFIRMATION.

Where there was a cloud upon the real property of a decedent, which might have been removed by suit, and the property, when sold to pay expenses of administration brought less than one-sixth of its real value, the confirmation of the sale, without an attempt to clear the title, was an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1529–1538; Dec. Dig. § 375.*]

7. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 376*)—ADMINISTRATION SALE OF LAND—CONFIRMATION—WHO MAY OBJECT.

An infant interested in the property of a decedent may object to the confirmation of an administration sale of the real property upon the ground of inadequacy of price, even though the infant's claim of title to such property causes the low price.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Francesco Bazzuro, the administrator, in pursuance of a previous order, sold certain real estate, and, from an order confirming the sale, Anna Rose Mary Bazzuro appeals. Reversed.

D. Freidenrich, for appellant. J. J. Mazza and W. E. White, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order confirming a sale of real estate, made by the administrator of the estate of the decedent in pursuance of a previous order of sale.

The appellant is a niece of the decedent, and is entitled to a share of his estate. She opposed the confirmation on the ground that the real estate, a lot in San Francisco, was not subject to sale by the administrator, and that the price for which it was sold was grossly inadequate.

[1] One ground on which the sale was asked and ordered was that it was for the best interests of the heirs of the decedent that such sale should be made, because of the fact that some of them lived in Italy and others in San Francisco. The fact that it was for the advantage and best interests of the heirs that a sale of real property should be had was made a ground of sale, in 1893, by an amendment of sections 1536 and 1545 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1893, p. 212). Francesco Bazzuro died intestate in 1879. In 1893 the title to the real and personal property of which he died seised had already vested in his heirs. At the time it so vested, the probate court had no power in administration proceedings to order a sale of real property owned by the deceased at his death, for this cause: The amendment of 1893 was prospective only in effect, and it has been held that it does not authorize a sale for this cause of real estate, or interests therein, held by the decedent at his death, where such death occurred prior to the enactment of the amendment. Estate of Freud, 131 Cal. 667, 63 Pac. 1080, 82 Am. St. Rep. 407; Estate of Packer, 125 Cal. 396, 58 Pac. 59, 73 Am. St. Rep. 58; Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179. It is argued from these decisions that the sale, so far as it was based on this ground, was a nullity. The basis and reason for these decisions was that the title had vested in the heirs before the law was enacted, and that, because of constitutional limitations to legislative power over vested rights, such title could not be impaired or burdened by subsequent legislation imposing burdens not before existing. At the time of his death, Bazzuro had no interest in this lot. He held a note and mortgage thereon, executed by one Castagnini. This mortgage was foreclosed by the first administrator of his estate (his brother Giuseppe, since dead), who bought the lot at the foreclosure sale and obtained thereon a deed therefor, conveying it to him as such administrator. The record title still remains in that condition. Hence the title to the lot did not vest in the heirs at the death of the decedent, nor at all. It vested in Giuseppe, the administrator. Christy v. Fisher, 58 Cal. 256; Bonds v. Hickman, 32 Cal. 202. Such interest as the heirs have in it vested in them at the time the deed to Giuseppe was made, and it is in the nature of a trust for their benefit, growing out of the fact that the personal property of the estate was used in payment for it. Civ. Code, § 853. The title to this interest originally vested in them at the death of the decedent as personal property. It was then subject to sale as personal assets, under section 1523, Code of Civil Procedure, if such sale was for the best interests of the estate, whether necessary to pay debts or not. The subsequent proceedings of the administrator, whereby it was converted into real estate and title vested in him, did not relieve it of this burden, and the amendment of 1893, imposing the same burden, did not impair such interest as the heirs have in the lot. So far as that kind of property is concerned, the amendment did not impair vested rights.

[2, 3] Upon the hearing of the return of sale, it was shown that in 1907 the present administrator brought suit against the appellant and her mother, Mary Bazzuro, to recover possession of this lot, on the ground that the possession of the lot by the administrator and the sale thereof were necessary to pay the expenses of administration. The court found that the debts had all been paid by the former administrator, and that possession of the lot by the administrator was not necessary for the payment of the expenses of administration, or for distribution. Upon that finding, it concluded and adjudged that said plaintiff should not recover possession, and that he take nothing by the suit. It is claimed that this failure to obtain possession divests the administrator and the court of the power to sell. This claim is based on section 1452, Code of Civil Procedure, providing that after the expiration of the time for presentation of claims, the administrator cannot recover possession of the heir, unless he proves that such property or possession is necessary to pay debts, expenses, or legacies, or for distribution. There are several answers to this claim. First, the judgment does not declare that a sale is unnecessary, but only that possession by the administrator is unnecessary, for the payment of debts and expenses. Second, there is nothing in section 1452, properly construed, that makes such possession a necessary prerequisite to an administrator's sale. It does not purport to limit or affect the power of the court to order a sale. Third, these questions, granting the contention, were properly justiciable upon the hearing and making of the order of sale, and they were then in effect adjudicated. That order was appealable. No appeal therefrom having been taken, it has become final. The questions cannot be reopened and again litigated upon the hearing of the return of sale.

[4] The present administrator has received personal assets of the estate of the value of $262.50, and there are no other assets, except this lot. The expense of administration is estimated at $732.50. The lot is worth $2,000. It was sold at the administrator's sale for $300. The return of sale states that, in view of the fact that the administrator could not execute a deed conveying perfect title to the lot, this sum was not disproportionate to its value. All these facts were established or admitted upon the hearing of the objections to the confirmation of the sale.

[5, 6] The appellant claims that, under these circumstances, it was the imperative duty of the court to refuse confirmation, and direct a postponement of the sale until the title of the estate to the lot should be perfected or defeated in a suit for that purpose. Upon general principles, the court, in confirming a sale of property, should exercise a sound discretion, with a view to the best interests of those who are or may be interested in the proceeds. "According to the principles of a court of chancery, a trust or power to sell real estate should not be exercised while there is a cloud over the title affecting its value, or the land is held adversely." Estate of Ricaud, 57 Cal. 421; 2 Perry on Trusts (5th Ed.) § 602ee. It being a matter of discretion, the action of the trial court must stand on appeal, unless an abuse of that discretion appears. We think such abuse does appear from the facts shown in this case. The property sold for less than one-sixth of its real value, because of defects in the title, which, so far as appears, could have been removed by a suit for that purpose. If the title were not in doubt, the presumption is that it would sell for the actual value. There was a claim of adverse possession, it is true, but the nature of the claim and the trust relations of Giuseppe Bazzuro and his heirs who make the claim were such that doubt is cast upon it. Some effort at least should be made to establish the title, before allowing the property to go at such a sacrifice. The court should have directed suit to that end, and, in the meantime, refused confirmation.

[7] The appellant is a successor to Rosa Bazzuro, mother and sole heir of Francesco Bazzuro. As such she is interested in having the lot sold for its full value, if it is sold at all, since in that event she will receive a share in the surplus over expenses of administration. If the present sale is completed, there will be no surplus, and she will receive nothing. The fact that her claim of title is the cause of the low bid does not estop her from objecting to its confirmation. She is a minor. There is nothing indicating that her claim of title is made in bad faith, even if such bad faith can be imputed to her during minority. She has a legal right to assert that claim. If it is successful, she will secure her interest in the lot. If it is unfounded, she will then have her share of the proceeds of a sale at full value after the title is adjudicated. Justice to all parties claiming interests requires that the title and the right of the administrator to sell be determined before a sale is made. In that event, if the administrator succeeds, the other heirs may obtain something; whereas, if the present sale were confirmed, their rights would be sacrificed, in order to allow the buyer to speculate on his chances of obtaining possession and title by a subsequent action.

The order is reversed.

NOTTHOFF v. LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (L. A. 2.381.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1911.)

1. Master and Servant (§ 221*)—Assumption of Risk.

The rule that a servant who knows of the unsafe condition of the premises on which he is working assumes the risks incident to the employment is subject to the exception that, where a servant notifies the master of a special risk, and objects to continuing the work under existing conditions, and is induced to continue by a promise to remove the danger within a reasonable time, he does not assume the risk during such time.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 260*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—PLEADINGS.

A complaint, in an action for injuries to a servant, which alleges that prior to the accident the servant notified the master of a special risk due to an exposed hole, that the master promised to cover the same and that plaintiff, relying on the promise, continued in the employment, shows that the servant did not assume the risk.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 221*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—EVIDENCE.

A servant, to invoke the benefit of the rule that a servant who continues in the employment after the master has promised to remove a danger complained of does not assume the risk, must show a complaint and increased risk, and that the master promised to remove the danger, and that the promise induced the servant to remain; but he need not show that he stated, in exact words, that he apprehended danger to himself by reason of defects, or that he stated that he would leave the service unless the defects were remedied.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a servant complaining of a dangerous condition complained on his own account, as well as on behalf of men working under him, so that by continuing in the employment on the promise of the master to remove the danger he did not assume the risk, held for the jury.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—QUESTIONS FOR COURT AND JURY.

Whether, in complaining of a dangerous condition, a servant is making it in apprehension of danger to himself is a question of intent, determined from the language and conduct of the parties, construed in the light of the facts, and where they show conclusively that the complaint was made without apprehension of danger to himself the question of assumption of risk is for the court; but otherwise the question is for the jury.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Henry Notthoff against the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Smith, Miller & Phelps, for appellant. Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, Le Roy M. Edwards, Wm. A. Chenery, and N. S. Sterry, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries.

The trial court granted a nonsuit at the close of the evidence of plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appealed.

This appeal was first heard before the District Court of Appeal for the Second appellate district, where the judgment was affirmed, and on application therefor a further hearing in this court was granted.

The principal question presented on the appeal is relative to the correctness of the ruling of the trial court, granting the nonsuit.

Plaintiff was an experienced engineer, 44 years of age, and at the time of the accident, which occurred on July 5, 1907, was and for some time prior thereto had been the chief engineer in charge of the electric station of defendant. Connected with the engine room at this station was a pump room constructed below the level of the ground, the floor of which room inclined to the corner thereof, where a cement pit, known as a sump hole, was located. There were other sump holes in the pump room, but the one to which the evidence in the case was particularly directed was the one near the corner of the pump room. The purpose of this pit was to receive the waste or overflow of hot water which escaped from the water heaters located in this room and used in connection with the boilers. At times the quantity and temperature of the water which escaped from the heaters was such that it filled this sump hole with boiling hot water. A small pump was connected with this pit, which ordinarily afforded a means of emptying it by pumping the water out. On the day of the accident, plaintiff was engaged in the installation of a thermometer in the suction pump which forced the water from the heaters to the boilers. In doing this work, it became necessary to temporarily shut down the heaters, three in number. During the progress of the work and before it was completed, a large quantity of hot water escaped from the heaters, which, owing to the fact that the pump connected with the sump hole was necessarily stopped, filled the hole and covered the floor. Upon the thermometer being installed, two of the heaters were turned on and the suction pump started. The sump hole was located between the south wall and the third heater, and owing to the fact that the floor was covered with hot water it was necessary to walk upon bricks which had been laid upon the edge of the sump hole in order to reach the valve, the opening of which was necessary to start the third heater. Plaintiff directed one of the men under him to turn on the third heater. The man reported to plaintiff that he was unable to do so, owing to the fact that the wrench given him for the purpose was too small; whereupon plaintiff himself took a wrench and turned the valve which started the heater. In returning, plaintiff stepped upon the loose bricks laid along the edge of the sump hole and in some way slipped and fell into the pit, which at the time was filled with hot water, whereby he received the injuries which resulted in the damage which he claims to have sustained. There was other machinery requiring men to go around this sump hole. The corner was dark; there were no artificial lights, and the windows were located in such a position that light would not fall from them in the direction of the sump hole; and at the time of the accident the plaintiff and the other employés were hurrying as much as possible to do the work in which they were engaged, as the time therefor was very limited. The evidence shows that at the time of the accident, and for a long time prior thereto, plaintiff was and had been familiar with the existence and location of this pit. He was present when it was constructed; he was aware of its unprotected condition, and knew that it was uncovered and filled with hot water.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Plaintiff based his right to recover in this action on the ground, as alleged in his complaint, that prior to the accident he notified the defendant of the special risk due to the unprotected condition of the sump hole, "and that the defendant, upon being informed by the plaintiff of the exposed condition of said sump hole, promised plaintiff to cover and repair the same, and that the plaintiff, relying upon and because of said promise, continued said employment."

[1] The general rule is that, where an employé has full knowledge of the unsafe condition of the premises upon which he is working, he is deemed to assume the special risk incident to the employment under such conditions. De Forest v. Jewett, 88 N. Y. 264; Week v. Fremont Mill Co., 3 Wash. St. 629, 29 Pac. 215; Bush v. Wood, 8 Cal. App. 647, 97 Pac. 709; St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller, 126 Fed. 495, 61 C. C. A. 477, 63 L. R. A. 551. Upon this general rule is ingrafted a well-established exception that, where "an employé notifies the master of a special risk, and objects to continuing the work under the existing conditions, and is induced to continue such work by a promise to remove the danger within a reasonable time, then for such time the employé is not presumed to assume such risk." Beach on Contributory Negligence, § 372; Hough v. Texas & Pac. R. R. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612; Anderson v. Seropian, 147 Cal. 201, 81 Pac. 521.

[2] The allegation of the complaint above referred to brought the case of the plaintiff within the exception to the general rule, and the question presented on this appeal is, Was the evidence produced by plaintiff at the close of his case sufficient to sustain it?

In support of this allegation, plaintiff testified as follows: "I informed him [the superintendent] of the exposed condition of this sump hole, and all others, on several occasions. I said some of the men came to me and told me that those holes were dangerous and ought to be covered up; and I went to my boss, the superintendent, Miller, and spoke about it. The Court: I thought you were telling what you said to him? A. I told Mr. Miller some of the men were complaining of the dangerous condition of those holes, and if they demanded them to be covered up, for the safety of those men, I would be in favor of having them covered up at once. The Court: What did you say to Mr. Miller, other than what you have already stated, if anything? A. I believe I said I would be highly in favor if these holes would be made permanently safe, so further complaint would not be received. Q. Do you think that is all you said? A. My time being limited, I believe that was all I said. Mr. Miller said he would take the matter up at once, and have them covered up permanently with material that would not burn, so that they would not have to be disturbed again. This was about a week before the accident happened. I had a conversation prior to that time about the matter—maybe two or three weeks—and told him practically the same thing. Q. That is, when you say 'practically the same,' you told him that some of the men told you they thought the holes ought to be covered up? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that you told them you would speak to Mr. Miller about it; did you tell him that? A. Yes, sir. Those two conversations were the only conversations I ever had with him on that point. Mr. Miller said to me that he would take the matter up at once, and have those holes covered up with material that would be allowed to be left there. Q. Did you say anything at that time about being afraid yourself? A. No, sir; I did not. My business did not bring me in close vicinity of those holes much. Mr. Miller came to me, and told me that the president of the company had been down there on inspection, and discovered all these holes covered up with wooden planks. He told Mr. Miller those planks had to come out at once, or some one would lose his job. Mr. Miller came to me, and told me I would have to take those planks off of those holes; uncover the holes. I asked Mr. Miller to give me authority to leave those planks there, because the men were everlastingly complaining. Q. Were you afraid of falling in? A. Yes, sir. Mr. Miller said he had no authority to, and he could not give permission to leave those planks over the holes. Then I gave orders to three men, being close by me, to go down below and uncover those holes, taking those planks out and carrying them out in the yard. I told him it was very dangerous; that if they would not allow us to keep the holes covered up with wooden planks to give us some material to cover them up with that would not burn. Mr. Miller answered that he would take the matter up at once, and have the holes fixed, so that there would be no further trouble on that point. He said he would take the matter up at once, but he did not have them fixed up until I got hurt. I knew the one I fell into had not been fixed. Q. You had been by there; you passed that sump hole probably every day? A. No, sir; never before in my life. Q. Was that [the occasion of the injury] the first time you had ever passed it? A. Yes, sir." The foregoing presents the evidence upon which the trial court granted the nonsuit, holding, as did the District Court of Appeal, that it conclusively showed that the complaint of plaintiff to the defendant concerning the dangerous condition of the sump holes was not made in his own behalf, but solely on account of the men employed under him, and hence did not bring him within the exception to the general rule, which only applies in favor of an employé who himself complains of the danger, or in favor of those in whose behalf the complaint is made.

In the matter at bar, there is no question but that the evidence showed a promise to obviate the danger arising from the uncovered condition of the sump holes; the sole question being as to whether the evidence was sufficient to show that the complaints respecting their dangerous condition were made by plaintiff on his own behalf, as well as on behalf of the men working under him; or, if the evidence does not show that he made explicit complaint on his own account, were all the facts and circumstances surrounding and accompanying the complaints which were made sufficient to warrant an inference on the part of the jury that he was complaining, not only on behalf of the men, but on his own behalf as well, and was it so understood by defendant?

[4] The trial court in granting the nonsuit, and the District Court of Appeal in affirming the judgment thereon, were of the opinion that the evidence not only did not directly establish the fact that plaintiff was complaining of danger in his own behalf, but that no reasonable inference could be drawn from any of the evidence in the case that he was. In this respect, upon a careful consideration by us of the evidence, we are of the opinion that both the superior court and the District Court of Appeal were in error in their view respecting the effect of it, at least to the extent of holding that it was insufficient to warrant any reasonable inference on the part of a jury that any complaint of the dangerous condition of the sump holes was so intended to be presented by plaintiff on his own account, as well as on behalf of the men.

In Labatt on Master and Servant, it is said: "When complaining of defective instrumentalities or machinery, it is not necessary that the servant shall state in exact words that he apprehends danger to himself by reason of the defects, nor need there be a formal notification that he will leave the service, unless the defects be remedied or repaired. It is sufficient if, from the circumstances of the case, it can be fairly inferred that the servant is complaining on his own account, and that he was induced to continue in the service by reason of the promise." In Rothenberger v. Northwestern Con. Milling Co., 57 Minn. 461, 59 N. W. 531, the court uses this language: "It is true that the plaintiff, when complaining of the gearing into which his hand was afterward drawn, did not notify defendants' head millwright or foreman that, unless coverings were put upon the exposed and dangerous machinery, he should quit defendants' employ; nor did he say in so many words that he apprehended danger to himself; but positive assertions and statements of this character are not absolutely necessary. According to the best-considered cases, the real question to be determined is whether, under the circumstances as they appear in each case, the master had a right to believe, and did believe, that the servant intended to waive his objection to the defect of which he has complained. This is a question of fact, not of law, and consequently for the jury, at least if not entirely free from doubt."

Examining the evidence under these rules, there was, by reason of the exposed condition of the sump holes, a present continuing danger of injury to any of the employés of defendant who had occasion to work in their vicinity, including the plaintiff. It may be conceded that there was greater danger therefrom to be apprehended by the employés working under plaintiff than by plaintiff himself, whose duties, as he testified, did not call him to the vicinity of this sump hole much, though he apprehended therefrom danger to himself. Under these circumstances, he made complaint to the superintendent of defendant of this dangerous condition, which the superintendent fully recognized as existing, and promised to remedy; a dangerous condition which he must be presumed to have known involved peril to all—the plaintiff, as well as the men under him—whose duties called or might call them to work about these sump holes. On the occasions when plaintiff spoke to the superintendent upon the subject, it is true that he said the men were complaining about the danger, and that he did not directly refer to any apprehension of danger on his own account. But the fact that in complaining of the danger he stated that the men were making complaints warranted no conclusive inference that he was complaining solely on account of the men, and not on his own account as well. It was his duty to the company and to the men who were under him, when danger existed, to call attention to it, with a view to its removal; and it would only be natural, at least the jury might so infer, that in making complaint of such a danger common to all whose duties required them to work about the sump holes—himself, as well as the men—that he should refer particularly to the complaints made by the men, as representing the greater number exposed to the danger, and whose safety required its removal, rather than to any danger apprehended by himself. His exposure to danger, while it existed, was not as great as that to which the men were exposed. Their greater danger would be the prominent matter in his mind in making the complaints, and in doing so he would naturally refer to these complaints as explanatory of the reason why he was endeavoring to have the danger removed. So that, taking into consideration the fact that in making his complaint to the superintendent he referred only to complaints of the danger which the men were making, there is nothing in that circumstance which warranted a conclusive inference that the plaintiff intended to convey the impression that he did not desire the danger to be removed on his own account, but solely on behalf of the men; there was nothing in the language used by plaintiff on the different occasions when he made the complaints to the superintendent which necessarily indicated that the sole reason why he made them was because the men were apprehensive of danger, but that as far as he was concerned, he was willing to assume the risk.

Now, as we say, while the mere circumstance that the plaintiff ostensibly complained of the danger in behalf of the men, taken into consideration with the other circumstances attending the making of the complaints to which we have referred, warranted no conclusive inference that he was not complaining also on his own account, and hence would not justify an order granting a nonsuit, it is quite apparent, we think, when all the facts and circumstances in evidence are considered, that the question whether the plaintiff intended also to complain of the danger in his own behalf, and whether defendant so understood it, were questions solely for the determination of the jury. These facts and circumstances, in addition to those already stated, are not many, but they are important.

The testimony of plaintiff is not very clear as to the sequence of events; that is, when the conversations between him and the superintendent occurred, where reference was made of the complaints by the men. It appears that the sump holes had been covered with wooden planks, and were so covered at the time when the president, on an inspection of the premises, peremptorily ordered the covers removed, and the superintendent instructed plaintiff to do so. Notwithstanding this order, plaintiff endeavored to prevail on the superintendent to have them left there, which was refused. In regard to this matter, plaintiff testified: "I told him it was very dangerous; that if they would not allow us to keep the holes covered up with wooden planks to give us some material to cover them up with that would not burn up." It must have been after this conversation that the plaintiff spoke to the superintendent of the continuing danger, and mentioned the complaints of the men, because it could only be after the wooden covers were removed that there would be any occasion for complaint, yet at the very time that the order for the removal of the covers was given, and after an endeavor to persuade the superintendent to allow them to remain, and when no occasion had yet arisen for any complaint by the men, we find the plaintiff declaring to the superintendent that it was "very dangerous" to leave these holes uncovered, and if they would not "allow us" to keep the holes covered with the wooden planks to "give us" some material to cover them up with that would not burn. Whatever may be said about inferences to be deduced from the statement of plaintiff, relative to the men complaining of the dangerous condition of the sump holes, which must obviously have been made after the planks were removed, certainly the statement made by the plaintiff immediately above referred to, and at the time when the planks were removed, or about to be removed, was sufficient to require the determination of whether the use of the expression "us" embraced a complaint respecting the dangerous position in behalf of plaintiff, as well as that of the men under him.

[5, 6] Other suggestions in this same line might be made under the evidence, but it is unnecessary to do so, as what we have said sufficiently indicates that the condition of the evidence in the case was not such that the court, as matter of law, could declare that no other conclusion or inference could be drawn from it than that the plaintiff had not complained of the danger on his own account, but solely on account of the men under him, and that, as far as he was concerned, he assumed the risk of the increased danger in the employment. On the contrary, the condition of the evidence was such that, whether his complaint was solely on behalf of the men, or included as well himself, was a question of fact for the jury. Whether in complaining of a dangerous condition the employé is making it in an apprehension of danger to himself or not is always a question of intention, and, as in cases of this character the rule is well settled that in making such complaint no formal notification or explicit statement of the apprehension of danger to the employé himself is necessary, the intention with which he complains is to be determined from the language and conduct of the parties to the complaint, construed in the light of the circumstances under which the complaint is made. If these show conclusively that the complaint was made by the employé without apprehension of danger to himself, a question of law for the court is presented. If, upon the other hand, under the evidence, different conclusions on the subject or different inferences might be drawn, a question of fact is presented to be submitted to the jury. In this case, as there was room for different inferences to be drawn under the evidence, it was error for the trial court to take the case from the jury and grant a nonsuit.

[7] Complaint is made by appellant of many rulings of the court as to the admission of evidence. These rulings were correct, save that the court should have allowed the appellant to show, as he endeavored to do, that he continued in the employment of defendant, relying on the promises of the superintendent to remove the danger from the exposed sump holes by having them covered up. This was competent evidence; in fact, it was necessary, in addition to proof of complaint of their condition by plaintiff and promise by defendant to remove the danger, for him to also prove reliance on the promise to remove it, and that he continued in the employment in reliance on it. It is only proper to say in this connection that the rulings of the trial court in rejecting proof of these matters were based on the view that the evidence then before the court did not show any complaint made by plaintiff on his own behalf; and hence, in the then aspect of the case, this evidence was immaterial.

[8] On behalf of respondent, it is urged that, even if there was sufficient evidence in the case from which a jury might be warranted in finding that the plaintiff was complaining of the dangerous condition of the sump holes on his own account, and hence the nonsuit was not warranted on the assumption by the court that there was no proof of this fact, still the evidence conclusively showed that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in going along the edge of the sump hole to adjust the valve on the heater near it. The claim is that there were two safer and more convenient ways to approach the valve; one by going under the heater; the other by going around the northern end of the heater, and doing so. It may be conceded that under ordinary conditions this would be true; but the evidence in this case shows that going around the sump hole was one of the ways and the customary way taken by the men to reach the valve, and at the time of the accident was the only convenient and practical way which could be taken, because the floor around and under the heater to which the valve was attached was covered with hot water.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

COATS v. COATS. (S. F. 5,415.)

1. MARRIAGE (§ 63*) — ANNULMENT — RIGHTS TO PROPERTY ACQUIRED DURING MARRIAGE.

On annulment of a marriage for physical incapacity of the woman, she, having entered into the marriage in good faith, believing she was physically capable, and continued in that belief, is entitled to such a division of the property accumulated by the efforts of both parties during the marriage as she would have been entitled to in community property, had the marriage not been subject to annulment, and been dissolved by divorce or death of the husband, so that it is immaterial that the bulk of it was acquired when her services in its accumulation were of no monetary value.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 736*)—RES JUDICATA.

No question of property rights having been presented by the pleadings in a suit to annul a marriage, the judgment of annulment therein, making or attempting to make no disposition of property, is not a bar to an action for determination of the rights to and division of the property accumulated by the parties during the marriage.

The amount of the property, accumulated by the efforts of the parties during continuance of their marriage, which is to be allotted to the woman on annulment of the marriage for her physical incapacity is not necessarily half of it, but is to be determined by the exercise of the sound discretion of the trial court.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Ida H. Coats against Lee B. Coats. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles H. Garoutte, Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and Walter H. Linforth, for appellant. Cushing, Grant & Cushing, F. E. Johnston, H. L. Johnston, and L. E. Johnston, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff and the defendant intermarried in November, 1887. In January, 1906, the defendant, Lee B. Coats, obtained a judgment annulling the marriage, on the ground of the physical incapacity of the plaintiff, Ida H. Coats. After such judgment had become final, this action was commenced to obtain a division of the property which had been accumulated by the parties during the existence of the marriage. The court below gave the plaintiff judgment for $10,000. From this judgment, the defendant appeals. The appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone.

The findings are as follows: The plaintiff and the defendant intermarried in the county of Tulare, on or about the 26th day of November, 1887, and lived together thereafter continuously until on or about the 9th day of January, 1906. On or about said 9th day of January, 1906, the defendant herein, Lee B. Coats, commenced an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county to annul his marriage with the plaintiff herein upon the sole ground that said Ida H. Coats was at the time of their marriage physically incapable of entering into the marriage state. that such incapacity had continued until the time of the filing of the complaint in said annulment suit, and that the same was incurable. On the 16th day of January, 1906, the said court duly gave and made its judgment and decree, annulling the marriage upon said ground of incapacity. The plaintiff entered into said marriage relation in the full belief, in good faith, that she was physically capable of marrying, and she continued in good faith in said belief for more than 18 years thereafter, and up to the date of the filing of the complaint in said action for annulment. During the existence of said marriage relation between plaintiff and defendant, there was accumulated a large amount of property. The efforts of both plaintiff and defendant were devoted constantly and at all times during said marriage to the best interests of each other in the accumulation of said property. At the time of the marriage, the defendant was engaged in farming, in partnership with his brother, in Tulare county, Cal., and the said partnership at that time owned personal property in which the defendant had an interest worth not to exceed $3,000. Prior to the marriage, the defendant owned an undivided interest in a 160-acre tract of land in Tulare county. With the exception of his interest in the partnership and in this tract, the defendant owned no property at the time of the marriage with the plaintiff. For ten years after the marriage, the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged in farming the land referred to, and other lands, which were rented by defendant jointly with his brother, or individually. During this period, the defendant conducted the farming operations, and the plaintiff did the housekeeping, cooked for the defendant's employés, and performed all the other duties of a housewife. She also assisted in conducting the farm. In 1897 the defendant entered into partnership with one Bricker, in the business of buying and selling horses and mules. Until 1901 the plaintiff remained upon the farm and continued to perform the duties hereinbefore detailed. In 1901 the plaintiff, at the defendant's request, went to Los Angeles, and thereafter lived with defendant at hotels or in apartments in San Francisco and in Los Angeles, as directed by defendant, until on or about the 16th day of January, 1906. During this time she did all that was required of her by defendant in the way of services and in the accumulation of property; but after the year 1900 the services rendered by her in the accumulation of property were, from a monetary standpoint, of no pecuniary value. The services so rendered by plaintiff were rendered by her solely because of the relations existing between her and the defendant as found by the court, and not otherwise.

After the marriage of the parties, a large amount of property was accumulated, and was lost in several ventures through no fault of plaintiff or defendant. In the year 1901, the defendant was practically without any property, other than his interest in the land first above mentioned and his interest in the partnership of Bricker & Coats. This partnership interest was of the value of about $2,500, and was accumulated after the said marriage. With these exceptions, all of the property owned by him at the time of the annulment of the marriage was acquired subsequent to the year 1900. At the time of the annulment of the marriage, to wit, on the 16th day of January, 1906, the defendant and Bricker owned personal property to the value of $139,905.31. The interest of the defendant, Coats, therein was an undivided one-half, amounting in value to $69,952.65. Said property was so owned free and clear of incumbrance, and neither the partnership nor Coats was then indebted. Subsequent to the decree of annulment, Coats drew from the partnership moneys amounting to over $88,000. The defendant's interest in the remaining property of the partnership is of the value of $37,337.50. All of the property which the defendant now has, and all of the money drawn by him from the partnership since January 16, 1906, was acquired or is the proceeds and accumulations of property which was acquired during the married life of plaintiff and defendant. There is a further finding that no disposition of said property, or any property, was made or attempted to be made in or by the decree of annulment, and that no question concerning the same, or any property, was presented by the pleadings for determination in said annulment suit, or considered therein. The plaintiff, it is found, has not received any part or portion of the said property. She has no property of her own, and is without means.

The conclusion of law drawn from these facts is that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment against the defendant in the sum of $10,000, and for her costs.

[1] Passing, for the moment, the consideration of certain subsidiary problems which arise on the particular facts found, this appeal presents for determination, primarily, the question whether a woman, who has in good faith entered into a marriage which may be avoided at the instance of the other party, is entitled, upon or after annulment, to any participation in the property which has been accumulated by the efforts of both parties during the existence of the supposed marriage, and while she in good faith believed that such marriage was valid. The mere statement of the question would seem to be sufficient to require an answer in the affirmative. To say that the woman in such case, even though she may be penniless and unable to earn a living, is to receive nothing, while the man with whom she lived and labored in the belief that she was his wife, shall take and hold whatever he and she have acquired, would be contrary to the most elementary conceptions of fairness and justice. This marriage was not void in the extreme sense. Estate of Gregorson, 116 Pac. 60. The defendant had the right to attack it, and to have it annulled, but, in the absence of such attack, it was good as against everybody. Third parties could not question its validity in any way, and even the husband himself was bound by it, until and unless he undertook to set it aside by means of an action for annulment.

The argument of appellant in this connection is that, while a voidable marriage is valid, unless annulled, yet, where there has been a decree of annulment, the decree determines that no marriage ever existed, and renders it void ab initio. Accordingly, upon the making of the decree, the children become illegitimate (except for statutory provisions, like section 84 of our Civil Code), and property rights of either party, in so far as they depend upon marriage, are at an end. There is ample authority supporting the proposition that the effect of a decree of nullity is to declare that the marriage was void from the beginning. 2 Nelson, Div. & Sep. § 566; 1 Bish. Mar., Div. & Sep. §§ 259, 277, 1596; 26 Cyc. 919, 920; 19 A. & E. Enc. L. 1220; Matter of Eichhoff, 101 Cal. 600, 36 Pac. 11; Chase v. Chase, 55 Me. 21. So, too, it is generally held that when a marriage is annulled property rights dependent upon the existence of the marriage, such as dower and curtesy, are terminated and annulled. 19 A. & E. Enc. L. 1221; Chase v. Chase, supra; Price v. Price, 124 N. Y. 589, 27 N. E. 383, 12 L. R. A. 359. But these decisions, and others cited by the appellant, deal with the rights of one of the parties in property owned by the other. An interest in such property, dependent solely upon marriage, cannot exist after an adjudication that there has been no marriage. If, as is suggested by the appellant, the annulment is to be treated as analogous to a rescission, it should properly enough be accompanied by a restoration to the parties of what they respectively had before marriage, and what they would have had in the absence of a marriage.

Here, however, the question is a different one. The controversy is, not over the property owned by the defendant prior to marriage, or acquired by him alone thereafter, but has to do with the acquisitions of the two parties after marriage, and before annulment. If both have contributed to such acquisitions, each has an interest which did not exist at the time of the marriage. The status quo could not be restored upon annulment, without making some provision for the equitable division of this property. In the absence of fraud or other ground affecting the right to claim relief, there can be no good reason for saying that either party should, by reason of the annulment, be vested with title to all of the property acquired during the existence of the supposed marriage.

"A void marriage ordinarily confers no rights upon either of the parties in respect to the property of the other, such as would be conferred if the marriage were valid. As to property accumulated during the existence of the relation, however, quite a different question is presented." Note to Deeds v. Strode, 96 Am. St. Rep. 272. Thus, in Fuller v. Fuller, 33 Kan. 582, 7 Pac. 241, the court said that, "in all judicial separations of persons who have lived together as husband and wife, a fair and equitable division of their property should be had." It is true that this expression was not necessary to the decision, but the principle declared was afterwards applied by the same court in Werner v. Werner, 59 Kan. 399, 53 Pac. 127, 41 L. R. A. 349, 68 Am. St. Rep. 372. In that case the trial court, in annulling a marriage on the ground that the wife had a former husband living, had awarded to her one-half of the property accumulated through the joint efforts of the parties while they were living together as husband and wife. The judgment was affirmed on appeal. A similar ruling was made in Buckley v. Buckley, 50 Wash. 213, 96 Pac. 1079, 126 Am. St. Rep. 900, where, upon annulment of a marriage, the wife was awarded a one-fourth interest in the real property of the husband. In Texas, too, the courts have, in several cases, reached similar results. Carroll v. Carroll, 20 Tex. 732; Morgan v. Morgan, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 315, 21 S. W. 154; Lawson v. Lawson, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 43, 69 S. W. 246; Barkley v. Dumke, 99 Tex. 150, 87 S. W. 1147; F. W. & R. G. R. Co. v. Robertson (Tex. Civ. App.) 121 S. W. 202.

The decision of this court in Jackson v. Jackson, 94 Cal. 446, 462, 463, 29 Pac. 957, while not perhaps a direct authority on the point under discussion, has persuasive weight in support of the views already expressed. There the court, in annulling a marriage voidable under section 61 of the Civil Code, allotted to the husband one-half of property which he had theretofore deeded to the wife under conditions entitling him to disaffirm the transfer for fraud. The property in question was apparently acquired after marriage, and is referred to in the opinion of the court as community property. The appeal was by the wife, and she did not, so far as is shown, question the propriety of making a division, in some way, of such property. But in the concurring opinion of Justice Harrison, in which Justice Paterson concurred, this language is used: "It may be conceded that the parties to this action entered into the contract of marriage under such circumstances that it was valid to all intents and purposes until annulled by decree of the court; but the fact that the defendant had at that date a former wife living, from whom he had not been divorced, gave to the plaintiff the right to have the marriage annulled upon the discovery of such fact. Civ. Code, § 82, subd. 2. Upon its dissolution, there would arise the same equitable grounds for an equal division of the property that had been acquired by the parties during the existence of the relation of husband and wife as would exist upon the dissolution of any valid contract of marriage for a cause other than adultery or extreme cruelty."

We think the sentence last quoted, although not binding as a declaration of a majority of the justices, lays down the just rule to be applied in cases of this character. Even though it may be true that, strictly speaking, there is no "community property" where there has not been a valid marriage (Chapman v. Chapman, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 392, 32 S. W. 564; see 68 Am. St. Rep. p. 376, note), the courts may well, in dividing gains made by the joint efforts of a man and a woman living together under a voidable marriage which is subsequently annulled, apply, by analogy, the rules which would obtain with regard to community property, where a valid marriage is terminated by death of the husband or by divorce. The apportionment of such property between the parties is not provided by any statute. It must therefore be made on equitable principles. In the absence of special circumstances, such as might arise through intervening claims of third persons, we can conceive of no more equitable basis of apportionment than an equal division. Until the making of the annulment decree, the marriage was valid, and the property in question was impressed with the community character. Upon annulment, such property, even though it be no longer community property, should be divided as community property would have been upon a dissolution of the marriage by divorce or the death of the husband.

If these views be sound, it is entirely immaterial that the bulk of the property was acquired between the years 1900 and 1906, and that the plaintiff's services in its accumulation were "of no monetary value." She is not suing to recover for services rendered under a contract for labor, nor to establish the value of her interest in a business partnership. What she did, she did as a wife, and her share of the joint accumulations must be measured by what a wife would receive out of community property on the termination of the marriage. "The law will not inquire * * * whether the acquisition was by the joint efforts of the husband and wife, or attempt to adjust their respective rights in proportion to the amount each contributed thereto. The law will not concern itself with such an inquiry, but will leave the parties to share in the property in the same proportion as though the marriage contract was what the wife had every reason to believe it to be, i. e., a valid marriage." F. W. & R. G. R. Co. v. Robertson, supra. If then, the facts would have justified an allotment to the wife of one-half of the property acquired by the parties, there can be no complaint of the allowance of $10,000, which was much less than one-half.

[2] On the question of plaintiff's good faith, the appellant urges that she could not have been in ignorance of the fact of her physical incapacity for 18 years. But any inquiry in this respect is foreclosed by the court's finding, which is not open to attack on this appeal.

[3] Finally, it is argued that the plaintiff's property rights, if she had any, might have been adjudicated in the annulment suit, and that she is estopped by the judgment in that suit from litigating the claim here presented. A judgment is conclusive only upon the issues presented by the pleadings (Freeman, Judgments, § 249), and actually adjudicated. Bank of Visalia v. Smith, 146 Cal. 398, 81 Pac. 542. Thus it has been held in this court that, if in an action for divorce the question of the disposition of community property is not presented by the pleadings or determined by the decree, the parties are not precluded from subsequently asserting their rights with respect to such property. De Godey v. De Godey, 39 Cal. 157; Biggi v. Biggi, 98 Cal. 36, 32 Pac. 803, 25 Am. St. Rep. 141; Kirschner v. Dietrich, 110 Cal. 502, 42 Pac. 1064. For like reasons, the judgment annulling the marriage cannot estop plaintiff from now litigating her property claims. The court below found that the question of property rights was not presented by the pleadings in the annulment suit, and that no disposition of property was made or attempted to be made by the judgment in that suit. This finding is conclusive on the present appeal.

[4] In this connection, the appellant relies on averments of his answer showing that, in answering the complaint in the former action, the plaintiff (defendant in that action) waived alimony. If it were conceded that this would affect the subject of the present action, the alleged waiver cannot be considered. There is no finding with respect to it. The judgment being supported by the findings made, it must be presumed, in the absence of a contrary showing in the record, that there was no evidence which would have sustained a finding in defendant's favor on this issue. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504; Roberts v. Hall, 147 Cal. 434, 82 Pac. 66.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [5] The petition for rehearing is denied. To prevent misunderstanding, there should, however, be some modification of the opinion filed. We do not hold that a woman occupying the position of the plaintiff here is, under any and all conditions, and as a matter of strict legal right, entitled to one-half of the property acquired during the existence of the supposed marriage. The amount to be allotted to her is to be determined by the exercise of the sound discretion of the trial court. Under the circumstances here shown, it cannot be said that the court below abused its discretion in awarding $10,000 to the plaintiff.

DUNPHY v. DUNPHY. (S. F. 5,702.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1911.)

1. Marriage (§ 7*)—Validity.

A marriage between parties, one of whom is of unsound mind, is a valid marriage until annulled, as authorized by Civ. Code, §§ 82, 83.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. Marriage (§ 62*)—Suit to Annul—Suit Money to Wife.

The court, in a suit by a husband to annul the marriage on the ground that he was of unsound mind at the time of the marriage, has authority to allow suit money to the wife to enable her to prosecute in good faith her motion for new trial after decree annulling the marriage, and an appeal from the adverse decision, though Civ. Code, § 137, providing for cost money in an action for divorce, does not include actions for annulment.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by James C. Dunphy, by Jennie C. Dunphy, his guardian ad litem, against Lydia M. Dunphy. From an order directing plaintiff to pay money to defendant to enable her to prosecute a motion for new trial and an appeal, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Meredith and Perry Evans, for appellant. Timothy J. Lyons and Bishop, Hoefler, Cook & Harwood (Raymond Benjamin, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order directing plaintiff to pay defendant $2,000, to enable her to prosecute her motion for new trial and appeal, in an action brought against her to annul the marriage solemnized between herself and plaintiff on June 22, 1909.

The complaint in that action alleged that on said day the plaintiff and defendant were married, and this allegation was admitted by the answer and found by the trial court to be true. It further alleged, as the ground of the annulment sought, that at the time of such marriage the plaintiff was, and ever since has been, "of unsound mind," and that the plaintiff has never freely cohabited with the defendant as her husband. These allegations were denied by the answer. The trial court found that the plaintiff was "of unsound mind" at the time of the marriage and until after July 21, 1909, and that the plaintiff has never since said marriage freely cohabited with the defendant as her husband, and gave judgment annulling the marriage. Defendant duly inaugurated her proceedings on motion for a new trial and for a review of the action of the trial court by this court. It was not disputed that she is prosecuting such proceedings in good faith and with reasonable grounds therefor, that she is without the means of paying the costs thereof, and that the amount allowed by the trial court is reasonably necessary to enable her to pay such expense. An appeal from the judgment of the superior court was taken on July 20, 1909, and such appeal is still pending. The sole contention of appellant is that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order, and that the evidence was insufficient to justify the same, "in that there is no evidence to show, and the evidence fails to show, that defendant and cross-complainant is or ever was the wife of plaintiff and cross-defendant."

Appellant's point is that, to justify an order requiring the payment of money to enable the defendant to prosecute her motion for a new trial and appeal, the marital relation must be admitted, or shown by a preponderance of evidence. In support of this claim Hite v. Hite, 124 Cal. 389, 57 Pac. 227, 45 L. R. A. 793, 71 Am. St. Rep. 82, is relied upon. That case was an action for divorce by the woman on the ground of adultery, and by the defendant's answer the allegation of the complaint that the parties were married was squarely denied. In this state of the pleadings, upon an appeal from an order allowing the plaintiff alimony, counsel fees, and expense of suit, it was held that to justify alimony marriage must be admitted, or proven to the satisfaction of the judge to whom the application is made. That decision has never been overruled or questioned. But the answer to appellant's claim and the distinguishing feature between this case and Hite v. Hite, supra, is that here the marriage is alleged by the plaintiff, and stands admitted by the pleadings. Admitting the fact of marriage, plaintiff sought to have the marriage annulled on the ground that he was of unsound mind at the time of the marriage. Civ. Code, § 82, subd. 3.

[1] It was held by this court, in the recent case of In re Gregorson's Estate, 116 Pac. 60, that the effect of our statutes is that such a marriage is not void ab initio, and is free from attack, except in proceedings for annulment, brought by the party injured, or on behalf of the party of unsound mind, during the lives of both parties (sections 82 and 83, Civ. Code), and that consequently the validity of the marriage cannot be questioned after the death of the wife, in proceedings for the appointment of an administrator of her estate. It was recognized that, in the absence of any statute providing otherwise, the great weight of authority is to the contrary, but it was shown by an exhaustive consideration of our statutes that the Legislature has made such a marriage valid and free from attack, except in the annulment proceeding already referred to. In the absence of a decree of annulment, it is valid, not only against the world, but also as between the parties. Coats v. Coats, 118 Pac. 441. A merely voidable marriage "must be treated as valid for all civil purposes until annulled by judicial decree." State v. Lowell, 78 Minn. 166, 80 N. W. 877, 46 L. R. A. 440, 79 Am. St. Rep. 358; Willits v. Willits, 76 Neb. 228, 107 N. W. 379, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 767. It would appear to necessarily follow that, so far as the annulment proceedings are concerned, it must continue to be accepted as a valid marriage until the decree of annulment therein has become final.

The power to allow alimony in cases of annulment of marriage was fully recognized by Chief Justice Beatty in his concurring opinion in Hite v. Hite, supra, where, after saying that it is only a wife who can claim alimony, and when the fact of marriage is in issue and unproved there is no one in that position, said: "If a husband sues for divorce, alleging a marriage, of course there can be no question of the right to alimony, if he is able to pay and the wife is in need. If he sues to annul a marriage upon the ground that it was void, ab initio, by reason of fraud, precontract, insanity, et cetera, then the granting of alimony pendente lite would be proper, because a formal marriage is alleged, and will remain a lawful and established marriage, in the absence of affirmative proof by him of the existence of some fact or facts which will invalidate it. In such a case, I concede the propriety and justice of allowing the wife (for, until the fraud or other invalidating circumstances are established, she is the wife) money to make her defense."

It was definitely decided by this court, in the later case of Allen v. Superior Court, 133 Cal. 504, 65 Pac. 977, that the superior court may require the husband prosecuting an action against the wife for annulment of the marriage on the ground of fraud to pay the wife such money as is actually necessary to enable her to make her defense. The court said: "As to suit money the right of the wife cannot be denied. Until her alleged fraud is established, she remains the lawful wife of the petitioner, and has the same right to defend the action to annul the marriage that he has to prosecute it, and, until she is provided with the means actually necessary to make her defense, she ought not to be forced into a trial. This conclusion is sustained by all the opinions, concurring and dissenting, in the case of Hite v. Hite, 124 Cal. 389 [57 Pac. 227, 45 L. R. A. 793, 71 Am. St. Rep. 82]." This is in accord with the great weight of authority. In some of the decisions, the conclusion of the court requiring the husband to make such payments is based on statutes held to confer the power; but, where it is held that the only statute on the subject is one limited to proceedings for divorce for some cause occurring after the marriage, it is further generally held, to use the language of the New York Court of Appeals, in Higgins v. Sharp, 164 N. Y. 4, 8, 58 N. E. 9, 10, as follows: "The general jurisdiction conferred by the statute to entertain such actions carries with it, by implication, every incidental power necessary for its proper exercise. When a statute gives the court jurisdiction over a class of actions, it is not necessary that all the powers of the court, or all the details of the procedure and practice, should be specially enumerated. For the purpose of administering justice in such cases, the court may * * * exercise such incidental powers as are usual or necessary in such cases. The power to allow alimony and counsel fees to the wife, in order to enable her to live pending the action, and to present her defense, if she has one, must be regarded as incidental and necessary in all matrimonial actions. Without such power, the rights of the woman, in many cases, could not be adequately protected. It seems to us, therefore, that actions to annul a marriage are governed, with respect to alimony and counsel fees, by the same principles as all other actions for divorce. When the court was vested with jurisdiction in such cases, the incidental power to guard and protect the rights of the wife, which had always been regarded as a part of the jurisdiction, necessarily followed and attached upon the plainest principles of reason and justice." See, also, Hunt v. Hunt, 23 Okl. 490, 100 Pac. 541, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1202, Willits v. Willits, 76 Neb. 228, 107 N. W. 379, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 767; Vroom v. Marsh, 29 N. J. Eq. 15; Webb v. Brooke, 144 Mich. 674, 108 N. W. 358; Arey v. Arey, 22 Wash. 261, 60 Pac. 724; Eliot v. Eliot, 77 Wis. 634, 46 N. W. 806, 10 L. R. A. 568; Schroter v. Schroter, 57 Misc. Rep. 199, 107 N. Y. Supp. 1065, 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 104, and note 3. The later New York case of Jones v. Brinsmade, 183 N. Y. 258, 76 N. E. 22, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 192, 111 Am. St. Rep. 746, in no way affects the rule declared in the earlier cases

So that, even if section 137 of the Civil Code, providing for alimony and cost money in an "action for divorce," does not by its terms include actions for annulment, the weight of authority is in favor of the existence of the power as to cost money, notwithstanding the absence of express statutory authority, and by reason of the general jurisdiction expressly conferred to entertain such actions; and Allen v. Superior Court, 133 Cal. 504, 65 Pac. 977, must be taken as deciding that such power exists in this state In view of what we have said, it must also be held that such power exists as long as the annulment action is pending. But there is much force in the claim that the term "action for divorce," in section 137, Civil Code, includes such actions for annulment as are provided for in sections 81 and 82 of the Civil Code. Section 137 is a part of article 4 of chapter 2, tit. 1, pt. 3, of the Civil Code, an article entitled "General Provisions." Chapter 2 is entitled "Divorce," and contains four articles; article 1 being entitled "Nullity," and embracing the provisions stating the causes for annulment and providing for the proceedings to obtain such relief; article 2 being entitled "Dissolution of Marriage," and providing for ordinary divorce proceedings; article 3 being entitled "Causes for Denying Divorce"; and article 4, as already stated, being entitled "General Provisions." It is apparent that the term "Divorce," constituting the title of chapter 2, was used as including annulment proceedings, as well as divorce proceedings, for causes occurring after marriage; and it may well be argued that such provisions in the subdivision entitled "General Provisions" as are appropriate in actions for annulment are applicable thereto. However, it is not necessary to definitely decide this question here, in view of what we have already said.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re BLAKE. (Civ. 992.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 159*)—REVIEW OF PROCEEDINGS—APPEAL—FILING UNDERTAKING—NOTICE TO RESPONDENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, providing that the undertaking on appeal from a justice must be filed within five days after notice of appeal, and notice of the filing of the undertaking must be given to the respondent, and the adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the filing of the undertaking, as no time is fixed for notice to the respondent of the filing of the undertaking, such notice is not essential to the perfecting of the appeal, and its omission is a mere irregularity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 57*)—SUBJECT OF RELIEF—ACTS OF COURTS.

Where a superior court erroneously dismisses an appeal on the theory that it has no jurisdiction, mandamus will lie to compel it to proceed to hear and decide the cause.

Application by F. T. Blake for writ of mandate to the superior court of Santa Clara County. Peremptory writ granted.

Will M. Beggs and R. C. McComish, for petitioner. J. C. Black, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus against the superior court of Santa Clara county. On January 31, 1911, the petitioner commenced an action in the justice's court of San Jose township against Eugenia M. Salisbury, and after appearance by defendant the case was regularly tried, and judgment was entered for defendant. Subsequently, and within 30 days from the date of the judgment, to wit, on March 14th, petitioner herein served and filed a notice of appeal, and executed and filed an undertaking on appeal in proper form and amount; but he did not serve upon Eugenia M. Salisbury or her counsel any notice of the filing of said undertaking. Later the papers in the cause were transmitted to the superior court of Santa Clara county; and in the month of May said court granted a motion theretofore made to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that no notice of the filing of the undertaking was given as aforesaid, basing its ruling on section 978a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The correctness of that ruling is the main question we are called upon to decide in this proceeding.

[1] Respondent contends that under the terms of said section notice of the filing of the undertaking is an integral part of the procedure upon an appeal to the superior court, and that, as no such notice was given in this case, the appeal was ineffectual for any purpose, and was properly dismissed. We cannot agree with this contention. Said section 978a reads as follows: "The undertaking on appeal must be filed within five days after the filing of the notice of appeal and notice of the filing of the undertaking must be given to the respondent. The adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the filing of the undertaking, and unless they or other sureties justify before the justice or judge within five days thereafter, upon notice to the adverse party, to the amounts stated in their affidavits, the appeal must be regarded as if no such undertaking had been given."

Probably the Legislature intended by the enactment of this section to remedy an abuse to which the law had become subject, by providing that an exception to the sureties might be taken within five days after the filing of the undertaking and notice thereof, and by making the giving of this notice one of the steps necessary to vest the superior court with jurisdiction of the appeal; but, if so, it must be held that the Legislature failed of its purpose. According to the plain language of the section the sureties must be excepted to within five days after the filing of the undertaking; and as no time is fixed within which the notice of such filing must be given, and as no penalty is attached to the failure to give the same, it must be regarded as an act not essential to the perfecting of the appeal, and the omission to give it as a mere irregularity. In support of this conclusion we need do no more than refer to the cases of W. P. Jeffries Co. v. Sup. Ct., 13 Cal. App. 193, 109 Pac. 147; and Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Sup. Ct., 114 Pac. 978. In the Jeffries Case the facts were precisely similar to those in the one under consideration, and there the court held that the giving of the notice of filing the undertaking was not a jurisdictional prerequisite.

[2] Where a superior court erroneously dismisses an appeal on the theory that it has no jurisdiction, mandamus will lie to compel it to proceed to hear and decide the cause. Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Sup. Ct., supra.

From what has been said it follows that the superior court of Santa Clara county has jurisdiction of the appeal, and the peremptory writ prayed for must therefore issue. It is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by Charles C. Belden against the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Healdsburg and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court (S. F. 5,945) August 15, 1911.

J. T. Coffman, for appellants. James W. Oates, for respondent.

HART, J. This action was brought for the purpose of securing a judgment adjudging that certain money, amounting to the sum of $767, and in the possession of the defendant Olmsted, is the property of one L. C. Lowrey, and compelling said Olmsted to pay said sum to plaintiff as part satisfaction of a judgment obtained by plaintiff against said Lowrey prior to the institution of this action. Plaintiff was awarded judgment, from which and the order denying defendants a new trial these appeals are prosecuted.

The facts are: Said Lowrey became, by an assignment from one of the original lessees, the lessee of certain land situated in Sonoma county. Said lease stipulated for the lease of the land to the lessees for a term of five years, beginning with the date of the execution thereof, viz., the 20th day of February, 1904. The land so leased embraced about 40 acres, and the lessees bound themselves by the covenants of said lease to plant a certain portion thereof in hops. It was further agreed between the parties that the lessees would, for the purpose of carrying on the business of growing hops, "provide all wires, hophouses, and appliances reasonably required for the cultivation, picking, curing and baling of hops to be raised on said premises during the term of this lease, and to erect such hophouses in a good and substantial manner." It was further agreed that, at the expiration of five years from the date of said lease, the first parties to the lease (the lessors) would buy all poles, wires, hophouses, and appliances then upon said premises, and pay therefor the reasonable value thereof at that time; that "if said parties hereto or their assigns shall not agree as to the reasonable value of said property or any part thereof, at that time, then and in that event the reasonable value thereof shall be determined by three arbitrators, at the equal expense of the parties hereto. * * *" On the 29th day of September, 1908, Lowrey, being indebted to the defendant bank in the aggregate sum of $1,075, together with interest, executed an instrument in writing, purporting to sell to said bank "all his right, title, interest, estate and expectancy, of, in and to all that certain personal property, to wit, all hop poles, wires, hophouses and appliances of every nature and kind used or employed in or about the cultivation, picking, curing and baling of hops and now situated on the lands and premises of L. C. Olmsted, * * * the same being the improvements placed on said premises under and in pursuance of the terms of a certain lease, dated the 20th day of February, 1904," etc. Upon the execution of said instrument by Lowrey and its delivery to the bank, the cashier of the latter addressed a letter to Olmsted, notifying him that said bank "was the owner of the Lowrey interest in the property" referred to in said instrument. On the 20th day of July, 1909, in an action against Lowrey and his wife, previously instituted in the superior court of Sonoma county, plaintiff was given judgment for the sum of $1,596.25 and $13.80 costs; said judgment having been duly entered against said Lowrey and his wife. In said action a writ of attachment was issued and executed by attaching all debts owing by said defendant L. C. Olmsted to said defendants R. L. Lowrey and wife, and "all personal property and effects in the hands of L. C. Olmsted, * * * and belonging to said defendants R. L. Lowrey and Mrs. R. L. Lowrey, or either of them, and due return of same made to court." Olmsted answered the complaint in said action, as he has in this, "stating therein that he had the sum of $767 in his hands belonging to said R. L. Lowrey under a contract with said Lowrey, but that he (said Olmsted) had been notified by the defendant Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Healdsburg, that it (said corporation) was the owner of said moneys, and demanded that said Olmsted pay the same to said corporation, and that said Olmsted refused to pay over any of said money under said attachment, or to said Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Healdsburg."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The court found the facts as stated in the foregoing, and further found, in harmony with the cashier's testimony, that the defendant corporation notified Olmsted that it claimed said money, but found that "said claim was and is without merit, and said corporation defendant did not ever, and does not now, own the said money, and has no right whatever to the same."

Lowrey's indebtedness to the defendant bank was evidenced by five promissory notes, dated, respectively, November 5, 1906, December 1, 1906, January 15, 1907, June 13, 1907, and July 15, 1907; said notes calling, in the order in which they were dated, for the sums, respectively, of $400, $100, $250, $200, and $125, and each note bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. All these notes were due at the time the instrument was executed, purporting to transfer to the bank Lowrey's interest in the property, or in the money to be paid for the improvements on the land leased to him.

The decision in this case hinges on the nature of Lowrey's "interest," if any, in the improvements made by him on the leased premises, and the nature and effect of the transaction by which he purported to transfer such "interest" to the defendant corporation.

Counsel for respondent in his brief deals with the first question upon the assumption that Lowrey owned an interest in, or was part owner with Olmsted of, the improvements themselves, and upon this assumption argues that, if the instrument purporting to transfer Lowrey's interest therein was intended as a bill of sale, it was void, as against other creditors of Lowrey, because possession of the property so attempted to be transferred was not taken by or delivered to the bank contemporaneously with the execution of said instrument, or at all. The main contention is, however, that, if anything at all, the instrument is a mortgage, and, if so intended, the argument proceeds it was likewise void, so far as other creditors are concerned, because not executed according to the formalities prescribed by section 2957 of the Civil Code, nor recorded, as required by said section.

Manifestly, if Lowrey sought to transfer to the bank an interest in the improvements themselves—the physical property—or intended, by the instrument he executed and delivered to the bank, to mortgage an interest in said improvements, assuming that he had a mortgageable interest therein, the position of counsel could not be impeached. Lowrey testified that the value of said improvements, whatever it might be determined to be, was, by the assignment, transferred to the bank, to be by it, when collected, applied on his notes. He further testified that it was understood between him and the bank that, if the money found to be due to him from Olmsted for said improvements proved in amount to be in excess of his indebtedness to the bank, the overplus would be turned over to him. Upon this testimony the argument is erected that the transaction between the bank and Lowrey as to said improvements amounted to an ineffectual attempt to burden Lowrey's "interest" therein with the lien of a mortgage. But we think that it is very clear that Lowrey had no interest in said improvements which could be subjected to the lien of a mortgage. Indeed, an examination of the lease will clearly disclose, in our opinion, that, strictly speaking, he had no interest whatsoever in the improvements themselves.

[1] In the ascertainment of the legal nature and scope and effect of the instrument made and delivered by Lowrey to the bank, said instrument must be examined by the light of the covenants of the lease. And where the language of an instrument in writing or the facts of a transaction are of a character to leave in some doubt what the parties thereto intended should be the precise nature or the legal effect thereof, and there is, from the nature of the subject-matter of such instrument or transaction, but one thing that it can be and have the effect of legally attaining any end, and such instrument or transaction is reasonably capable of a construction that will give to it legal vitality and effect, the rule is that, under such circumstances, the parties thereto must be presumed to have intended that the obligation arising therefrom is one that could be legally effectuated or enforced. In other words, such transaction must not be so construed as to lead to an absurdity, or so construed as to render it invalid, if it is reasonably susceptible of a construction that will render it valid, or will result in effectuating the manifest intention of the parties.

[2] By the terms of the lease, as we have seen, Lowrey agreed to provide "all poles, wires, hophouses and appliances reasonably required for the cultivation, picking, curing and baling of hops to be raised on said premises during the term of this lease, and to erect such hophouses in a good and substantial manner," and that Olmsted agreed to buy the same at the expiration of the term of said lease, and pay therefor the reasonable value thereof, at that time, to be appraised by arbitrators to be selected by the parties, in case they themselves were unable to agree upon such value.

We think that there can be no doubt from this language that the parties intended that whatever improvements might be found necessary to be made for the stipulated purpose should, upon being erected, become the property of the lessor, and that therefore the only right acquired by Lowrey would be what might be the reasonable value thereof, measured in money, on the date of the expiration of the term prescribed by the lease. In other words, notwithstanding the language is that Olmsted agrees "to buy all hop-poles, wires, hophouses," etc., the lease cannot reasonably be construed to mean that Lowrey was vested with any kind of actual ownership of the physical property itself, but that, by making the improvements called for thereby, he acquired only a right to be reimbursed to the extent of the reasonable value of such improvements as appraised and determined, either by themselves or by third parties, at the time of the termination of the lease. In short, we construe that portion of the lease relating to the improvements to be nothing more, in principle or in effect, than a contract, by the terms of which one party engages to erect a building for another on the latter's premises, for which the owner of the property agrees to pay the builder the reasonable value thereof upon the completion of the structure. That this is the true interpretation of the meaning of that part of the lease is sustained by the fact that there is contained in the instrument no provision that the improvements, portions of which are capable of becoming fixtures, may be removed from the freehold in the event that a satisfactory price could not be agreed upon or, for that matter, for any reason, and, furthermore, by the provision that, in case the parties themselves could not agree upon a reasonable value of the improvements, arbitrators should be selected to perform that office.

[3] By the instrument executed by him to the defendant corporation, Lowrey transferred all his "interest" in and to the improvements "placed on said premises under and in pursuance of the terms of a certain lease," etc., and, therefore, whatever the nature and extent of such "interest," determinable by the terms of the assignment, as construed by the light of the lease to which it makes reference, such "interest" thereby became the property of said bank. Of course, it will not be contended that Lowrey transferred or pretended to transfer the leasehold. There is no language in the written assignment even remotely indicating such intention. The property conveyed was confined to Lowrey's interest in the improvements. All, then, that he could have intended to transfer was either the improvements themselves, or the reasonable value thereof, as agreed upon by the parties to the lease, or as appraised by arbitrators appointed for that purpose; and, as it is very clear, as we have seen, that he could not transfer the improvements themselves, or any physical part thereof, it follows, necessarily, that what he did transfer, and intended only to transfer, was his right to be paid for the reasonable value of said improvements.

[4] The result of the foregoing views is that Lowrey's "interest" in the improvements erected by him on the demised premises constituted a mere "right arising out of an obligation" which was his property, and which he had the legal right to transfer. Section 1458, Civ. Code. In other words, it was a chose in action, or a right to recover money by a judicial proceeding (section 953, Civ. Code), which may be transferred. Section 954, Civ. Code. It, therefore, follows that by the assignment the bank became the owner of the thing or right, then potentially existing, which had been assigned to it, with full power, of course, to take such steps, when the time was ripe therefor, to reduce it to an actuality. Manifestly, this was all that Lowrey himself could have done with the thing so assigned. It is obvious, from the view we have thus taken of the "interest" acquired by Lowrey in said improvements and assigned by him to the bank, that it follows that it was not only not necessary, but impossible, to put the assignee in the possession of the thing or right assigned. The suggestion of respondent that, to make the sale valid, Lowrey should have delivered possession of the leasehold to the bank with the execution and delivery of the instrument evidencing the sale to the bank proceeds, of course, from the misconceived theory that Lowrey owned an interest in the physical property itself; but we have shown that such theory is not maintainable under the facts as disclosed here. If, however, it is intended by said suggestion to advance the proposition that, in order to have effected a valid assignment of the thing which was so assigned, possession of the leasehold should also have been assigned, the obvious reply is that, in a legal sense, the effect of that act, so far as concerned Lowrey's right (the right transferred) to be paid for the improvements, would not have been to transfer to the bank any greater interest in or better title to said right than it has already acquired. Of course, if Lowrey had so desired, he could have transferred the remainder left of the leasehold, and this, if not restricted by the language of the transfer, would have had the effect of carrying with it all the incidents of the lease as prescribed by the covenants thereof. But, as suggested, this was not at all essential in order to make a valid assignment of any money which would become due him from the lessor, by reason of the covenants of the lease.

Nor, in the determination of the nature of the transaction between Lowrey and the bank, do we attach any importance to the circumstance that the extent of the right thus transferred was not at the time of such transfer determined. Lowrey acquired a vested right, to be enjoyed at a specified time in the future, against Olmsted the moment he completed the erection of the hop poles, the stringing of the wires, and the construction of the hophouses, etc., and whether such right might, at the time it matured or became enforceable, be determined to be worth $1 or $1,000, it nevertheless existed, and, as stated, was vested in Lowrey; and it was such right that he transferred to the bank—nothing less and nothing more. A promissory note is a mere chose in action, which may ordinarily be sold and transferred; but as well may the validity of a sale or transfer of such an instrument be questioned, merely because the security for its payment might become impaired, or even worthless and its makers and indorsers, if any, insolvent, and thus the amount, if anything, that could be recovered on it undeterminable until its maturity. The reply to this illustration may be that the note itself, upon its face, discloses the exact sum to become due; whereas such is not the case here; but the illustration will nevertheless serve as an apt exemplar of the rule which respondent seems to hope to invoke here, and which, if sound, would invalidate not only many and various kinds of assignments of future or contingent interests which have invariably been upheld by courts of equity, such as the assignment of money to become due employés and servants, and the like (not public officers, of course), whose compensation from month to month can be, in many instances, hardly more than approximately estimated or prognosticated, but would render void many assignments of vested interests, to take effect at some future time; for illustration, contracts of the nature of the one here, whose terms have not been fully completed, or are not to be fully performed until some specified time in the future.

[5] There is no question of fraud raised here by the pleadings or otherwise as to the transaction between Lowrey and the bank. It is not disputed that Lowrey was indebted to the bank in a large sum of money. It is true that the notes evidencing said indebtedness had each passed the date of its maturity, yet they were alive and constituted, as they would even have done if barred by the statute of limitations, a valuable consideration for the assignment. The bank, upon the receipt of the assignment and before the attachment in plaintiff's action against Lowrey was issued and served, notified Olmsted that it had become the owner of the right existing against him and in favor of Lowrey, and this circumstance, in the absence of any charge of fraud, is itself significantly corroborative of the testimony of the bank cashier and Lowrey that the assignment involved an absolute transfer of Lowrey's right against Olmsted.

We think, as our views clearly indicate, that the judgment and order are erroneous, and should be reversed.

It is so ordered.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 267*)—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTIONS—"FINAL" JUDGMENT—JUDGMENT OF "NONSUIT."

Where both parties introduced their evidence, and plaintiff's evidence supported a judgment for him, and defendant made no motion for a judgment of dismissal, a judgment, though termed a dismissal, was a "final" decision, and deemed excepted to, within Code Civ. 2. TRIAL (§ 388*)—TRIAL BY COURT—FINDINGS—NECESSITY.

A judgment on the merits, on trial by the court without a jury, must be reversed, where no findings were filed, and where findings were not waived.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*)—JUDGMENT—FINDINGS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the record on appeal shows that the court below, after all the evidence was in, acting on a mistaken view of the law, and in presence of the parties in open court, directed a dismissal of the action, stating that neither party would recover costs, and entered an order which he termed an order of dismissal, that subsequently the court denied a motion to set aside the dismissal, and for findings of fact and judgment on the merits, there can be no presumption on appeal that findings of fact were waived, though the bill of exceptions is silent on the question whether they were waived or not; the only reasonable inference being that there was no waiver.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by John R. Saul against Giacomo Moscone and another. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court (S. F. 5,795) August 25, 1911.

E. B. Coil, for appellant. Breen & Kelly, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of a lot of land described in the complaint. The cause came on for trial before the court, without a jury, upon the issues made by the complaint and the answer thereto. It appears from the bill of exceptions that the plaintiff offered testimony sufficient to support the material allegations of the complaint, showing the execution of the contract, the payment of $10 as part payment for the land, a tender of the balance, and a demand for a deed. The evidence shows that the contract in question was executed in duplicate, being made out on a printed blank. The printed blank provided that the vendee should have ten days in which to examine the title to the property, but in the plaintiff's duplicate of the executed contract the word "ten" was crossed out and the word "sixty" substituted in pencil. Plaintiff testified that the same change had been made in the vendors' (defendants') duplicate; the change in both having been made before execution. The vendors produced their contract, which showed no such change, and denied that they had ever agreed with the vendee that he should have more than ten days in which to examine title. Under this state of the evidence, the plaintiff requested the court to take an adjournment until the following morning, and in this connection the record shows as follows: "Mr. Coil (plaintiff's counsel): * * * If you will continue the matter until 9:30 to-morrow morning, I will have the witnesses here. Mr. Coghlan (defendants' attorney): What do you want them to testify? Mr. Coil: I want them to testify that they saw the original contract; that the word 'sixty' was in the original contract at the time it was signed. The Court: If, on your side, the word 'sixty' was written in there as an after consideration, you lose; if, on the other side, they erased whatever was in the copy, those sixty days, they lose. That is all I have got to decide in this case. Mr. Coil: Well, I contend, if the word 'sixty' was in the original contract at the time the party to be charged signed it, although the copy by inadvertence might have omitted it, that the original contract would be good. The Court: No; if that is the fact, I will resolve it against you, because business men should not do business that way, and, if business men cannot be taught in any other way than by a case in court, let them learn the lesson there. If this original and the copy contained the word 'sixty,' you win; if one did not contain it, and it has not been erased, you lose."

An adjournment was then taken, and the trial resumed on the following morning, when plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that the word "sixty" had been substituted in pencil for the printed word "ten" in both duplicates of the contract, and that this pencil change had been subsequently erased in the copy of the contract retained by the vendors. In this condition of the evidence, and without any motion or request made by the defendants, the court ordered the action dismissed, without costs to either party. No exception was taken to this order, and the order dismissing the action was entered in the minutes of the court November 22, 1906.

The plaintiff thereafter, on December 10, 1906, moved the court to set aside its order dismissing said action, and to render a decision on the merits and file its written findings of fact, which motion, after submission by the parties, was denied, and subsequently a judgment of dismissal, without costs, was duly entered by the clerk of said court. Plaintiff appeals from said judgment, and urges in support of his appeal that the decision is against law, and that it was the duty of the court, upon the submission of the cause, to render a judgment upon the merits and file its written findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Prior to the amendment of section 647, Code of Civil Procedure, in 1909, it was necessary, in order to protect the right of appeal, to reserve an exception to an order on a motion for nonsuit. Martin v. S. P. Co., 150 Cal. 130, 131, 88 Pac. 701; Hanna v. De Garmo, 140 Cal. 172, 73 Pac. 830; Craig v. Hesperia, etc., Co., 107 Cal. 675, 40 Pac. 1057; Warner v. Darrow, 91 Cal. 309, 27 Pac. 737. This case was tried before the enactment of said amendment, and defendant contends that the judgment was a judgment of dismissal authorized by subdivision 5 of section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the defendant, having failed to note an exception to the order, waived his right to object thereto and to have the order reviewed on appeal. Said subdivision of section 581 reads as follows: "An action may be dismissed, or a judgment of non-suit entered, in the following cases: * * * 5. By the court, upon motion of defendant, when upon the trial the plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury."

[1, 2] Here both parties had introduced all their evidence touching the material issues in the case; the evidence introduced by plaintiff was ample to support a judgment in his favor; and, as no motion was made by defendant for a judgment of dismissal upon the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove a sufficient case, or upon any other ground, we think the judgment in this case, irrespective of what it is called, must be regarded as a final decision, and as such, of course, "is deemed excepted to." Section 647, Code Civ. Proc. While a nonsuit may, under the provisions of section 581, be granted on motion after the evidence for both sides is closed (Toulouse v. Pare, 103 Cal. 251, 37 Pac. 146), that section does not purport to warrant a nonsuit, except upon a motion of the defendant "when upon the trial the plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case." Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 257, 260, 104 Pac. 6; Hanover Fire Ins. Co. v. Shrader et al., 11 Tex. Civ. App. 255, 260, 31 S. W. 1100; Burns v. Rodefer, 15 Nev. 59, 63; 14 Cyc. 458. And where, as here, a judgment, although it is termed a "dismissal," is in fact a final decision of the case, and not a mere order of nonsuit or dismissal, made in accordance with the provisions of section 581, it will be treated as a final judgment. Wood, Curtis & Co. v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 152 Cal. 344, 347, 92 Pac. 868. The judgment being on the merits of the case, and no findings having been filed, the judgment must be reversed.

[3] Some suggestion is made that if the judgment should be considered as a final judgment, and regarding it as such, we must presume that findings were waived; and it is contended that the record does not show that they were not waived. In our opinion, the rule does not apply. We have often said, and it is the rule, that where it becomes necessary on an appeal from a judgment on the judgment roll, or where other questions are raised, exclusive of the question as to whether or not the findings support the judgment or the evidence supports the findings, we will, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, presume that findings were waived. But that rule has never been carried to the extent of presuming that findings had been waived, where the only reasonable inference that can be drawn from the record is directly to the contrary. In this case, while the bill of exceptions does not show whether findings were waived or not, the order of the court, summarily dismissing the action, and the views expressed by the court, show that he acted upon an erroneous idea as to the law and as to his right to dismiss the action. It was dismissed in open court while the parties were present, and the court termed it an order dismissing the action, and remarked that neither party would recover costs. Not only this, but the record shows that the plaintiff made a motion for an order vacating the order made by the court dismissing said action, and asking the court to render judgment on the merits and file written findings of fact, which motion, as we have seen, the court denied. We do not think that any fair-minded person can say, in the face of this record, and in view of the order made by the court, refusing to vacate or set aside the order of dismissal, and refusing to make and file findings, that findings were waived.

[4] The respondents urge that the court's order dismissing the action may be upheld, for the reason that the description of the real property as contained in the contract is too uncertain to entitle the plaintiff to a decree of specific performance, and that therefore the complaint did not state a cause of action, which defect may be urged at any time. But in the case of Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 97 Pac. 885, it was held that in such a case the description may be aided by evidence of extrinsic facts. Such evidence was introduced in the present case, and removed any uncertainty as to the lot of land sought to be recovered.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 371*)—EVIDENCE—SIMILAR ACTS AND TRANSACTIONS.

In a prosecution for grand larceny by the withdrawal of a bank deposit without the consent of the owner, evidence of a series of similar transactions, relating to deposits by the same owner in another bank, was admissible to show the motive of defendant.

2. LARCENY (§ 3*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—INTENT.

To constitute the withdrawal by defendant of a bank deposit without the consent of the owner larceny, it is necessary to show an intent on the part of defendant to convert the money to his own use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 3–10; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 45*)—SETTING ASIDE—GROUNDS.

That the testimony adduced at the examination of defendant, held by a magistrate on July 13, 1910, for the larceny of $300 on May 20, 1910, was substantially the same as that presented on July 21, 1910, at a hearing on a complaint for the larceny of $1,500, on March 28, 1910, is not ground for setting aside the information based on the second examination; the two charges not being preferred on the same state of facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 226*)—DISQUALIFICATION OF MAGISTRATE—GROUNDS.

That, in the first of two examinations before a magistrate on the charge of grand larceny, evidence was introduced touching a larceny on the charge of which the second examination was held did not disqualify the magistrate from acting at the hearing of the second charge.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, an instruction that if the sum alleged to have been stolen was taken at various times, and in sums of less than $50 each, defendant could not be convicted of grand larceny was properly refused, where the defendant obtained the possession of the money by a single draft, without the consent of the owner.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

An instruction that the presumption of innocence with which the law clothes one charged with crime is not intended to aid the guilty, but to guard the innocent from unjust punishment, is not an invasion of the province of the jury, as emphasizing the probability in the mind of the court that defendant was guilty.

7. WITNESSES (§ 392*)—CONTRADICTION—INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, a complaint, filed by the complaining witness for embezzlement by defendant of the same sum which he is alleged to have stolen, was not admissible to impeach the testimony of the complaining witness that he did not tell the district attorney that defendant was his agent, nor that he had given to defendant, to keep for him, the sum for the larceny of which defendant was being tried, and that he did not sign a criminal complaint, stating that he had turned over to defendant, to keep for him, the sum referred to in the information, where it is not made to appear that the charge of embezzlement was founded on the same transaction and state of facts on which the charge of grand larceny was based.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

A. H. Burns was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court (Cr. 1,691) August 14, 1911.

L. E. Dadmun, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted upon an information charging him with the crime of grand larceny. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears from the record that about March 1, 1910, the complaining witness, Frank Brayer, a German laborer, having little knowledge of the English language, went to San Diego from Los Angeles, and for $8 per month secured a room in a lodging house conducted by defendant and his wife, with neither of whom prior to such time was he acquainted. At this time Brayer had $135 in cash, and on deposit with the Security Savings Bank of Los Angeles the sum of $1,500, and also had on deposit with the German-American Savings Bank of Los Angeles the sum of $2,040. From the time Brayer entered defendant's lodging house, he indulged in the excessive use of liquor, as a result of which he was in a continuous state of intoxication, which rendered him, during a great part of the time, both physically and mentally helpless. About March 15th, while in this condition of incapacity, he authorized the transfer of $1,000 from the German-American Savings Bank to the Blochman Banking Company, in San Diego, signing a receipt therefor by means of his mark. A few days thereafter defendant forwarded to the German-American Savings Bank another receipt, purporting to be likewise signed by Brayer, for the balance of said deposit. The bank, as a precautionary measure, it seems, sent the money to the Blockman Banking Company, where it was deposited to Brayer's credit. All of this amount, except $15.11, was drawn out of the bank upon various checks, payable to defendant, nearly all of which purported to be signed by the mark of Brayer, witnessed by the signatures of others. It appears, however, that the signatures of these persons so signing as witnesses were by defendant procured upon blank checks before they were filled out, and before Brayer had made his purported mark thereon. On or about March 15th, defendant presented to the Merchants' National Bank of San Diego a draft, payable to S. J. Burns, on the Security Savings Bank of Los Angeles, for the sum of $1,500, which draft purported to be signed by Brayer, and stating that he desired to use it at once, requesting the cashier to ask the Security Savings Bank to notify him by wire if paid. This draft was returned, with a statement that the signature was irregular. Another draft was prepared, which was likewise unpaid, and still a third prepared, which purported to be signed by Frank Brayer and witnessed by three persons, likewise payable to S. J. Burns, whom defendant falsely stated to the bank was his sister-in-law, and also falsely stated to the bank that Brayer was his brother-in-law. This last draft, upon the guaranty of the signature made by the Merchants' National Bank, was paid by the Security Savings Bank, and the proceeds deposited to the credit of said S. J. Burns in the Merchants' National Bank, under an agreement that defendant should control the fund and draw checks thereon, signing the name of S. J. Burns thereto. This $1,500 is the subject of the larceny for which defendant was tried and convicted.

There is a conflict of evidence as to whether Brayer signed this $1,500 draft. The evidence, however, clearly tends to prove that if he did sign it his signature thereto was procured while he was in a state of intoxication, which rendered him incapable of intelligent action, and by means of a scheme and trick devised and planned by defendant for the purpose of feloniously obtaining possession of the money, with the intent to convert it to his own use, and that he did so convert it. Without undertaking to recite the voluminous evidence tending to establish the many circumstances pointing to defendant's guilt, it is sufficient to say that the jury was warranted in its conclusion that no authority was given for the act, by means whereof defendant obtained possession of the $1,500 which Brayer had on deposit with the Security Savings Bank. There is no merit in the contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

[1] For the purpose of showing the motive accompanying the acts of defendant in securing the $1,500, the court, over defendant's objection, permitted the district attorney to introduce evidence touching the withdrawal of the money deposited to Brayer's account in the Blochman Banking Company. This ruling is assigned as error. It appears that on March 16, 1910, $1,000 was deposited in Brayer's name with the Blochman Banking Company, followed on March 31st by a deposit of $1,040.11; that between March 16th and May 20th this entire sum, less $15, was drawn out by defendant by means of 12 checks presented on as many different days, the amounts of which checks varied from $75 to $300 each, all of which were drawn by defendant, payable to himself, and the signatures to all of these checks, but one, purported to be by Brayer's cross or mark. It is significant that on the day this $300 was drawn a like sum was deposited by defendant to the account of S. J. Burns with the Merchants' National Bank. With reference to these checks, Brayer testified that he signed his full name to one check for $25, which, however, does not appear to have been presented, and he admitted that while drunk he affixed his mark to three checks, the amounts of which he could not state, for the reason that defendant held his hand over them, preventing his seeing the same. It thus appears that after the transfer of the $2,040.11 to the Blochman Banking Company defendant also, and by means similar to that employed by him in getting possession of the $1,500, obtained the possession of the entire sum, less the amount of $15.11 above stated, which was drawn out by Brayer. The testimony shows that defendant, from time to time during the period from March 16th to May 20th, gave small sums of money to Brayer, one of which amounted to $25, and that he paid his liquor bills and other bills and bought liquor for him, all of which, according to Brayer's testimony, did not exceed the sum of $2.50 per day.

[2] While it was shown that the withdrawal from the Security Savings Bank of the $1,500 was unauthorized, nevertheless it was necessary, in order to constitute the act larceny, to show an intent on the part of defendant to convert the same to his own use. The evidence touching the transactions had by defendant at the same time with the Blochman Banking Company, whereby he obtained possession of Brayer's money on deposit with that bank and converted it to his own use, was proper as tending to show that a like motive prompted him in securing possession of the deposit of $1,500 from the Security Savings Bank. The system employed to obtain the deposit in the Security Savings Bank was identical with that which defendant was at the same time employing in gaining possession of and appropriating to his own use the money of Brayer deposited with the Blochman Banking Company, and the fair and logical inference to be drawn from his acts is that in each case the motive was the same. In the case of People v. Zimmerman, 11 Cal. App. 117, 104 Pac. 591, this court, in discussing a like question, said: "Where the purpose is to show motive or system, the evidence is admissible, if it have a direct tendency, in view of the surrounding circumstances, to prove motive or intent or other material fact." That it was not error to admit the evidence is fully sustained by numerous cases. People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 Pac. 43; People v. Tomalty, 14 Cal. App. 224, 111 Pac. 513; People v.

Schwartz, 14 Cal. App. 9, 110 Pac. 969; People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 576, 114 Pac. 48, 54.

[3, 4] Two informations charging defendant with grand larceny were filed by the district attorney, one of which, numbered 16,307, based upon the proceedings had before the magistrate on July 13, 1910, upon which charge a commitment was issued, charged him with grand larceny in the felonious stealing of $300 from Frank Brayer on May 20, 1910; the other, numbered 16,308, being the one upon which defendant was tried and convicted, and based upon the hearing and proceedings had before the magistrate on July 21, 1910, upon which commitment was issued, charged him with the larceny of $1,500 from Frank Brayer on March 28, 1910. Defendant made a motion to set aside the information No. 16,308, and upon which defendant was tried, upon the ground that defendant had not been legally committed by the magistrate before the filing of the information. The motion was denied. It appears that the testimony adduced at the examination held by the magistrate on July 13, 1910, for the stealing of the $300, was substantially the same as that presented on July 21, 1910, at the hearing upon the complaint charging defendant with the stealing of the $1,500. At the first hearing, defendant was committed for the larceny of $300 on May 20, 1910, and at the second hearing he was committed for the larceny of $1,500 on March 28, 1910. Appellant's argument in support of his contention that the ruling constituted error is based upon the theory that two criminal charges were preferred upon the same state of facts. This, of course, cannot be done. Such, however, is not the case here. The larceny of the $1,500 obtained from the Security Savings Bank is entirely distinct and separate from the transaction had by defendant with the Blochman Banking Company, by reason whereof he was charged with feloniously obtaining possession of $300 belonging to Brayer. Nor would the fact that because in the one case evidence touching upon the other was introduced disqualify the magistrate from acting at the hearing upon the other charge, any more than it would disqualify a judge who had presided at the trial of the one from sitting upon a hearing of the second. In our opinion, the point is wholly without merit.

[5] The court refused to give certain instructions requested by defendant. One of these was to the effect that if the $1,500 alleged to have been stolen by defendant was taken at various times, and in sums of less than $50 each, defendant could not be convicted of grand larceny. Not only was the subject of this instruction fully covered by other instructions, but since the taking was of the entire deposit of $1,500, possession of all of which was obtained at one and the same time, and the act of conversion was complete, if converted at all, when deposited in the Merchants' National Bank to the account of S. J. Burns, controlled by defendant, there was no theory of the case under which the instruction was proper. The effect of another instruction requested was to take from the jury the consideration for any purpose of all evidence pertaining to transactions had by defendant with the Blochman Banking Company in securing Brayer's money deposited therein. In view of what has heretofore been said upon the admissibility of this evidence, it must necessarily follow that defendant was not entitled to an instruction in the unqualified form requested. The substance of other instructions requested appears to have been embodied in instructions given by the court of its own motion.

[6] At the request of the district attorney, the court instructed the jury to the effect that the presumption of innocence with which the law clothes one charged with the commission of crime, thus casting the burden of establishing his guilt upon the state, is not intended to aid the guilty, but to guard the innocent from unjust punishment. Appellant insists that the giving of this instruction was an invasion of the province of the jury by the court, in that it emphasized the probability existing in the mind of the court that defendant was guilty. We do not so regard it. Moreover, as the instruction was but a correct statement of the reasons underlying the law, error cannot be predicated thereon.

[7, 8] On cross-examination, Brayer testified that he did not tell the district attorney that defendant was his agent, nor that he had given to defendant, to keep for him, the $1,500 for the larceny of which defendant was then being tried; also that he did not sign a criminal complaint before a justice, wherein he stated that he had turned over to defendant, to keep for him, this particular $1,500 referred to in the information. He was then shown a criminal complaint, which had theretofore been filed with a justice of the peace, and admitted signing and swearing to the same. Thereupon defendant offered the complaint in evidence, an objection to the introduction of which was sustained. The purpose of offering the complaint in evidence was to impeach the testimony of Brayer by showing that he had made statements in this complaint inconsistent with his testimony above referred to. Brayer, however, had testified that he had filed no complaint, charging defendant with embezzling the particular $1,500 for which he was then being tried upon an information charging him with grand larceny. Defendant made no attempt to identify the $1,500 specified in the complaint charging him with embezzlement with that for which he was being tried upon a charge of grand larceny. Whether or not the charge of embezzlement was founded upon the same transaction and state of facts as that upon which the charge of grand larceny was based is not made to appear; indeed, the testimony of Brayer tends to prove the contrary. Hence it was not error for the court to refuse to admit the complaint in evidence, particularly as the district attorney had objected to its introduction upon the ground that it referred to a different transaction which had no reference to the taking of the $1,500 referred to in the information, or in any way connected with the offense for which defendant was then being tried. "To impeach a witness upon the ground of inconsistent statements, the impeaching testimony must be plainly inconsistent with that already given." Estate of O'Connor, 118 Cal. 69, 50 Pac. 4; People v. Collum, 122 Cal. 186, 54 Pac. 589.

The record discloses no prejudicial error. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

HELFRICH v. ROMER. (Civ. 791.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 16, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 15, 1911.)

1. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 9*)—PENDENCY OF ACTION — DEFENSE — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on notes, in which defendant pleaded in abatement that another suit on the same notes by the same plaintiff had been hitherto brought in the name of another, and was still pending, evidence held to justify a finding that the plaintiff never caused such action to be brought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 106*)—ABATEMENT—PENDENCY OF ACTION.

An answer to an action on notes, a plea in abatement, alleging the commencement of an action against the present plaintiff, and another for an accounting of an alleged copartnership, for the purposes of which it is alleged the notes in suit were originally given, but which does not allege that plaintiff was a member of the firm, is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 219–227; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 106*)—PENDENCY OF OTHER ACTION.

And, as the defense of lis pendens does not apply to cross-suits, such an answer is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 23*)—GROUNDS—JUDGMENT NOT SUPPORTED BY FINDINGS.

Where, in an action on notes, the court found that an action brought by defendant was pending for an accounting, in which the notes in suit were involved, but gave judgment for plaintiff, nevertheless, even if the pendency of such action were ground for abatement, the case is merely one of a judgment not supported by the findings, which is not a ground for new trial, and can only be corrected on an appeal from the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Cora A. Helfrich against Robert Romer. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court (S. F. 5,951) August 15, 1911.

William P. Hubbard, for appellant. W. H. Barrows, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The action is one upon two promissory notes, one for $1,000 and the other for $92, alleged to have been executed by defendant to G. P. Helfrich, husband of plaintiff, as her agent, and in consideration of money, alleged to be the separate property of plaintiff, loaned to defendant. It is also alleged that said G. P. Helfrich, after the execution of said notes, indorsed and delivered them to plaintiff, and that no part of either has been paid, save $20 as interest.

Defendant in his answer denied that said notes were executed to said G. P. Helfrich, as agent of plaintiff; that the money loaned thereon was the separate property of plaintiff; that said G. P. Helfrich indorsed or delivered said notes to plaintiff, and alleged payment in full of said notes.

Defendant affirmatively alleged that defendant and G. P. Helfrich were copartners, and that said notes were given in consideration of money originally borrowed by said G. P. Helfrich for partnership purposes, and that said G. P. Helfrich has received full payment from said partnership funds of said notes. Defendant further alleged that he had commenced an action against G. P. Helfrich and Cora Helfrich, as defendants, for the purpose of obtaining an accounting of said partnership business, and that said notes be delivered up and canceled. The answer also alleged that plaintiff, in March, 1906, before the comencement of this action, caused to be filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco an action against defendant upon said two promissory notes, and that said action is still pending.

The court made findings of facts in accordance with the allegations of the complaint and against the contentions of the defendant, save that it found that defendant had commenced an action against G. P. Helfrich and plaintiff for an accounting of the affairs of said copartnership (which it found had been formed between said G. P. Helfrich and defendant, after the execution of said two promissory notes) as alleged in defendant's answer, and that said action is still pending.

Appellant attacks the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and devotes a considerable portion of his brief to discussing the evidence that tends to support the theory that the money represented by the notes was borrowed and used for partnership purposes. Upon this point it is sufficient to say that the evidence given by G. P. Helfrich and plaintiff amply supports all the allegations of the complaint, and the findings made by the court upon all issues presented in bar of the action. As the record discloses no plausible reason for contending to the contrary, no good purpose can be served by setting out the evidence given pro and con upon the issues presented by the allegations of the complaint and the matters set up in the answer in bar of the action.

[1] As to the matter pleaded in abatement of the action, to the effect that the plaintiff, in March, 1906, had caused an action to be filed against defendant upon said notes, the evidence shows that prior thereto plaintiff placed the two notes in the hands of her attorney for collection, who brought an action thereon against defendant in the name of one McKinley, all the papers and records of which were destroyed in the conflagration of April, 1906. The evidence tends to show that said notes were never indorsed or delivered to McKinley, and that the suit was brought in his name without any authorization from plaintiff so to do. It is not pretended that any action was ever brought in her name on the notes, and the court was justified from the evidence in finding that she never caused any action to be brought on said notes, as alleged in the answer.

[2, 3] The matter pleaded and found as to the pendency of the action brought by defendant against G. P. Helfrich and plaintiff, for an accounting of the alleged copartnership between defendant and G. P. Helfrich, did not constitute a good plea in abatement. It, at best, as against plaintiff, presented a case of a cross-demand only. The plaintiffs, or the actors in the two suits, are not the same. It is not alleged or claimed that she was a member of the copartnership. The general rule is that, before one suit may be pleaded in abatement of a second suit, it must appear that the plaintiffs are the same in the two suits. The defense of lis pendens does not apply to cross-suits. O'Connor v. Blake, 29 Cal. 313; Ayres v. Bensley, 32 Cal. 630. The exceptional conditions existing in Coubrough v. Adams, 70 Cal. 374, 11 Pac. 634, are absent from this case.

[4] Furthermore the court found the pendency of the action for an accounting as alleged in the answer, but gave judgment for plaintiff nevertheless. If this was error, it does not require nor justify a new trial, but can only be corrected by an appeal from the judgment. It presents a case, if the contention of appellant be correct that it shows a ground for abating this action, of a judgment not supported by the findings. That the judgment is not supported by the findings is not a ground for a new trial. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186; Pierce v. Willis, 103 Cal. 91, 36 Pac. 1080; Petaluma Paving Co. v. Singley, 136 Cal. 616, 69 Pac. 426. No other points are made for a reversal.

The order is affirmed.

1. PLEADING (§ 126*) — ANSWER — NEGATIVE PREGNANT—EFFECT.

In an action against a bailee for the value of a piano, or for the amount for which it was insured, an attempted denial in the answer of the alleged value in the form of a negative pregnant was not a denial of the allegation in the complaint, but was an admission that it was of a value of any sum less than that named in the complaint, and raised no issue on the subject of value.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 171*)—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—THEORY OF TRIAL.

In an action for the value of a piano left with defendant for storage, or the amount of insurance thereon, neglect of the defendant to ask for a nonsuit on the ground of variance between the proof and the pleadings verifies the contention that the cause was tried by the court, with the approval of the parties, on the theory that the liability of a defendant, if any, was for damages from breach of his obligation to keep the property insured for plaintiff's benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1053–1069; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 175*) — PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—THEORY OF TRIAL.

Where the trial court and the parties proceed to trial on the theory that there is a material issue, and the court finds in accordance with the evidence addressed to that issue, and received without objection, the parties will not be allowed for the first time on appeal to say that there was no such issue.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 867*) — REVIEW — QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—"NEW TRIAL."

Under Code Civ. 5. BAILMENT (§ 18*) — COMPENSATION OF BAILEE.

Where plaintiff left a piano with defendant for storage and to keep it insured, defendant would, in the absence of an agreement respecting his compensation, be entitled to a reasonable value of his services in that behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bailment, Cent. Dig. §§ 77–84; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

6. BAILMENT (§ 12*)—MUTUAL RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES—NEGLIGENCE.

Even if an agreement between plaintiff and defendant that defendant should provide storage and insurance for plaintiff's piano constituted merely a gratuitous agency, the defendant was obligated to act in good faith, without negligence, and to obey the instructions of the plaintiff, as principal, to procure insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bailment, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 105*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—FAILURE TO OBJECT.

Where the testimony of plaintiff, in an action for the value of a piano, or for the amount of insurance thereon, as to when and where she delivered the piano to the defendant was given in response to a preliminary question, which was not objected to, its admission was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

8. BAILMENT (§ 31*)—EVIDENCE OF MAKING —ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for the value or amount received from insurance on a piano left with defendant for storage and insurance, conversations between plaintiff and defendant with reference to the piano, its insurance, and the amount thereof were competent and relevant to establish an agreement of defendant to insure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bailment, Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 204*) — PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

Where testimony was not objected to, a motion to strike it out will not be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1258–1280; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

10. BAILMENT (§ 31*)—LIABILITIES OF BAILEE —ACTIONS.

In an action for the value or the amount of insurance received on a piano, where the defendant denied any agreement to store and insure, and plaintiff testified that when she delivered the piano to defendant she directed him to store and insure as he had always done before, her testimony as to her previous dealings with defendant concerning the storage and insurance of the same piano, and a letter from defendant to plaintiff's husband, which contained a statement of charges for insurance on the piano for at least two years immediately preceding its loss, were competent and relevant.

11. TRIAL (§ 165*) — APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 241*) — INVOLUNTARY NONSUIT — STATEMENT OF GROUNDS.

On a motion for a nonsuit, only the stated grounds thereof may be considered by the trial court or on review.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 373; Dec. Dig. § 165;* Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

12. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 706*)—RECORD—AFFIDAVITS FOR NEW TRIAL.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 658, providing that when a motion is made for a new trial for newly discovered evidence it must be made on affidavits, and section 661, providing that the affidavits used on the hearing, with a copy of the order made, shall constitute the record on appeal from the order granting or refusing a new trial, affidavits as to newly discovered evidence, which were filed in support of a motion for new trial, but not offered or read in evidence on the hearing of the motion, and which are not included in the bill of exceptions, cannot be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2944–2947; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

13. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1072*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

In an order granting a new trial, unless the plaintiff within a stated time remit a sum allowed in the judgment as interest, the portion of the order relating to such remittitur is not prejudicial to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4233½; Dec. Dig. § 1072.*]

14. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 867*) — REVIEW — QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

In an order granting a new trial, unless plaintiff should remit from the judgment a portion allowed as interest, any error in the provision for the remittitur cannot be reviewed on an appeal solely from the order denying a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Eugenie H. Schroeder against Byron Mauzy. From an order denying a new trial after judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court (S. F. 5,950) August 15, 1911.

Walter E. Dorn, for appellant. Edward Myers, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant in the sum of $900.21, upon a complaint which, for a cause of action, alleged substantially that the plaintiff, in her separate right, was the owner of a piano, valued at $1,000, which had been delivered into the care and custody of defendant, pursuant to an oral agreement with plaintiff, whereby, for a valuable consideration, to be paid upon demand, defendant was to keep said piano on storage, and have the same insured against loss by fire for the benefit of plaintiff; that the defendant under this agreement did insure said piano for the benefit of plaintiff against loss by fire; that thereafter the piano, while in the custody of defendant and during the life of the insurance, was destroyed by fire; that thereupon defendant received and collected as insurance for the loss of said piano a sum of money, the amount of which was unknown to plaintiff, and has ever since refused to account to the plaintiff for the whole or any part thereof. The prayer of plaintiff's complaint was "for the sum of $1,000, the value of said piano, if the defendant failed to cause same to be covered and insured against loss or damage by fire for plaintiff's use, pursuant to his said agreement; or that defendant account to plaintiff and pay over to her the amount of money recovered and received by him as insurance on said piano."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] The answer of the defendant denied that he had caused the piano to be insured for plaintiff's benefit or at all, and by specific denials put in issue every other material allegation of the plaintiff's complaint, save and except the allegation of the loss and the value of the piano. The defendant's attempted denial of the alleged value of the piano, in the form of a negative pregnant, was not a denial of the allegation in the complaint, but was an admission that the piano, at the time specified in the complaint, was of the value of any sum less than $1,000, and raised no issue upon the subject of value as pleaded by plaintiff. Leffingwell v. Griffing, 31 Cal. 232; Scovill v. Barney, 4 Or. 288.

The findings of the trial court fixed the value of the piano at the sum of $999, and then, following the language of the complaint, were in favor of the plaintiff upon the issues of the ownership of the piano, the delivery of the same to the defendant for storage, and his agreement, for a valuable consideration, to insure the piano against loss by fire for the benefit of plaintiff. From this point on, however, the findings of the trial court are at variance with the allegations of plaintiff's complaint to the extent that the court found affirmatively that, although the defendant had agreed to insure the piano for a specific sum, viz., $750, he had failed and neglected to have it insured in that or any other amount, and that he had refused, upon demand, to pay this sum or any part thereof to plaintiff.

The defendant has appealed from the order denying his motion for a new trial, but did not appeal from the judgment. His motion for a new trial specified, as grounds thereof, (1) that the evidence was insufficient to justify the judgment; (2) that the decision was against law; (3) errors of law occurring at the trial; and (4) newly discovered evidence.

[2] The principal point urged by the defendant in support of his appeal is that "the decision is against law" in this: That the gravamen of the plaintiff's complaint reveals a cause of action for moneys had and received, while the judgment of the court is founded upon findings which indicate a cause of action for damages for breach of contract. The record discloses that the defendant moved the court for a nonsuit on the grounds that the evidence was insufficient "to support a judgment of any kind"; that "the value of the piano at the time of the alleged loss by fire had not been proven"; and that "there was no agreement in writing covering the insurance." The neglect of the defendant to ask for a nonsuit upon the ground of a variance between the proof and the pleadings, in conjunction with a perusal of the entire record, verifies plaintiff's contention, that the cause was tried by the court, with the acquiescence and approval of the parties to the action, upon the theory developed by the proof, and assumed by the court and the parties to be in issue, that the liability of the defendant, if any, was for damages arising out of the breach of his alleged obligation to have and keep the property of the plaintiff insured for her benefit. In other words, it appears from the record that the cause was tried as if the answer of the defendant, by its denial of the agreement to insure, had put in issue the agreement as found by the court.

[3] It has been repeatedly held in this state that where the trial court and the parties to an action proceed to a trial of the cause upon the theory that there is a material issue, and the court, upon evidence addressed to that issue and received without objection, finds in accordance with that evidence, and upon the theory that an appropriate issue was raised by the pleadings, "the parties will not, nor will either of them, be allowed here for the first time to say there was no such issue." Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 Pac. 186; Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 221, 26 Pac. 80; Murdock v. Clarke, 90 Cal. 427, 27 Pac. 275; Klopper v. Levy, 98 Cal. 525, 33 Pac. 444; Rudel v. Los Angeles Co., 118 Cal. 281, 50 Pac. 400; Barbour v. Flick, 126 Cal. 628, 59 Pac. 122; McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 163, 64 Pac. 278; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309; Carroll v. Briggs, 138 Cal. 454, 71 Pac. 501; Roberts v. Sierra R. Co., 14 Cal. App. 180, 111 Pac. 519. Aside from this view of the case, the contention of defendant that the decision is against law cannot be maintained, or even considered upon the record before us.

[4] A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact (Code Civ. Proc. § 656), and a verdict or other decision of fact may be reviewed upon an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 657. But the question of whether or not a judgment is authorized by the pleadings is not involved in a re-examination of an issue of fact, and therefore the question of the sufficiency of the complaint to support the findings and judgment in any given case cannot be raised or reviewed upon an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Martin v. Matfield, 49 Cal. 42; Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186; Crescent Feather Co. v. United Upholsterers' Union, 153 Cal. 434, 95 Pac. 871. This is so irrespective of the issues presented by the pleadings, and notwithstanding the findings may be at variance with the issues pleaded. Riverside Water Co. v. Gage, 108 Cal. 240, 41 Pac. 299. It follows from the foregoing conclusions that the only points available to the defendant, on the record presented by his appeal, are the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and the alleged errors of law occurring at the trial.

[5] In support of the first of the points just enumerated, the defendant strongly urges the specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings as to the making of the agreement sued upon, and the existence of a consideration therefor. In this behalf, it would suffice to say that, in our judgment, the evidence is sufficient to sustain both of the findings in question. But, even if the evidence, as contended by the defendant, does not show clearly and unequivocally a meeting of minds upon the subject of compensation as a consideration for the agreement sued upon, the defendant cannot claim exemption from liability for the breach of his obligation to insure merely because, as is admitted, he never charged or collected any compensation for the service which was to be rendered. The undisputed evidence of the plaintiff shows that her property in this instance was intrusted to the defendant under an express agreement for storage, and it is an admitted fact in the case that on at least two previous occasions the same or similar property had been by the plaintiff intrusted to the defendant for storage, and that he was in the habit of effecting insurance thereon for the benefit of the plaintiff. "Any one who undertakes to transact some business or to manage some affair for another, by authority and on account of the latter, and to render an account of it, is an agent." 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 938. "In the absence of instructions, or a usage of trade, or habit of dealing between the parties, the agent is not bound to insure the property of his principal; but if he has received instructions to insure, or has been in the habit of effecting insurance in the previous dealings between them, he will be liable as an insurer for any loss or damage arising from his failure to insure." 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 1068. If, as in effect is declared by the findings, the defendant, under an express agreement, became the agent of the plaintiff for the purpose of storing and insuring her property, he would, in the absence of an agreement respecting his compensation, have been entitled under the law to charge for the reasonable value of his services in that behalf.

[6] If, on the other hand, as the defendant insists, the evidence is not inconsistent with the conclusion that the agreement between plaintiff and defendant constituted merely a gratuitous agency, nevertheless, under the facts of this case, the defendant was obligated to act in the premises in good faith and without negligence. In other words, having, as the evidence shows, undertaken the agency, the defendant was bound, though it were gratuitously undertaken, to obey instructions and exercise good faith and ordinary diligence in executing that which he had pretended to do, and for a failure to do so he will be held liable to his principal for the resulting loss or damage. Herrick v. Hodges, 13 Cal. 434; Samonset v. Mesnager, 108 Cal. 354, 41 Pac. 337; 1 Clark & Sayles on the Law of Agency, p. 964, § 433. Therefore, whether the defendant undertook the service in controversy with or without an express understanding for compensation is immaterial.

[7-9] The testimony of the plaintiff, upon direct examination, as to when and where she delivered the piano in question to the defendant was given, evidently, in response to a preliminary question, which was not objected to, and therefore we fail to appreciate the defendant's contention that the admission of this testimony was error. The conversations which the plaintiff related as having occurred between her and the defendant with reference to the piano, its insurance, and the amount thereof were competent and relevant to establish the agreement to insure. This testimony was not objected to, and therefore we cannot consider the motion of the defendant to strike it out.

[10] In view of the defendant's denial of the agreement to store and insure, and plaintiff's testimony that when she delivered the piano to the defendant she directed him to store and insure "as he had always done before," the testimony of the plaintiff as to her previous dealings with the defendant concerning the storage and insurance of the same piano, as well as the letter from defendant to plaintiff's husband, which contained a statement of charges for insurance upon the piano for at least two years immediately preceding its loss, were clearly competent and relevant.

[11] The trial court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for a nonsuit. Upon a motion for a nonsuit, only the stated grounds thereof may be considered by the trial court or reviewed by this court (Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 602; Gardiner v. Schmaelzle, 47 Cal. 588; Raimond v. Eldridge, 43 Cal. 506), and the only grounds stated in support of the motion for a nonsuit in the case at bar were, as hereinbefore indicated, that the evidence was insufficient to justify a judgment of any kind; that the value of the piano had not been shown; and that the agreement to store and insure was not in writing. The point that the agreement was not in writing has been abandoned upon this appeal; the evidence fully supports the findings, and therefore justifies the judgment; and the point that there is no evidence as to the value of the piano at the time of its loss by fire is answered by the record, which shows that upon the hearing of the motion for a nonsuit counsel for defendant expressly admitted that the piano, when it was originally purchased from the defendant, was of the value of $1,000, and it is in evidence as a part of the plaintiff's case that the piano at the time of its delivery to the defendant for storage was in perfect condition. Moreover, the answer of the defendant raised no issue as to the value of the piano at the time of its delivery to the defendant and its subsequent destruction by fire.

[12] In the opening brief of counsel for defendant, no mention is made of the sufficiency of the affidavits filed in support of the motion for new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. In his closing brief, however, counsel urges these affidavits upon our attention, but for what purpose we are at a loss to understand. There are printed in the transcript several affidavits, purporting to disclose newly discovered evidence, which apparently were filed in support of defendant's motion for a new trial, but not offered or read in evidence, or referred to in any way, upon the hearing of the motion. When a motion for a new trial is made upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, it must be made upon affidavits (Code Civ. Proc. § 658), and "the * * * affidavits * * * used on the hearing with a copy of the order made shall constitute the record to be used on appeal from the order granting or refusing a new trial." Code Civ. Proc. § 661. It is further provided and required by rule 29 (78 Pac. xii) of the Supreme Court that "in all cases of appeal to this court from the orders of the superior courts the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same into a bill of exceptions, except where another mode of authentication is provided by law." This appeal comes here upon a duly authenticated bill of exceptions, and as the affidavits in question are not referred to or included therein they cannot now be considered. Melde v. Reynolds, 120 Cal. 234, 52 Pac. 491; Cohen v. Alameda, 124 Cal. 508, 57 Pac. 377; Ramsbottom v. Fitzgerald, 128 Cal. 75, 60 Pac. 522; Pereira v. City Sav. Bank, 128 Cal. 47, 60 Pac. 524; San Diego Sav. Bank v. Goodsell, 137 Cal. 424, 70 Pac. 299; People v. Gay, 141 Cal. 42, 74 Pac. 443; People v. Wrin, 143 Cal. 14, 76 Pac. 646; Skinner v. Horn, 144 Cal. 279, 77 Pac. 904.

[13, 14] As conclusions of law from the facts found, the trial court decided that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of $750, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from July 1, 1906, the date upon which it was found that plaintiff made demand upon defendant for the agreed amount of insurance to be placed upon the piano. Judgment was entered accordingly for the sum of $900.21. Subsequently the trial court was of the opinion that this allowance of interest was unwarranted and erroneous, and upon the hearing and submission of the motion for a new trial ordered that the motion be granted, unless the plaintiff, within a stated time, remit in writing the sum of $151.21, which was the amount of the interest herein referred to as having been allowed and entered in the judgment. No other or further order was made by the court in the premises, and the record is silent as to whether or not the plaintiff complied with the terms imposed. It seems to be conceded, however, that the plaintiff did remit from the judgment the amount specified, and it is now claimed by the defendant that the order of the court in this particular was prejudicial error. It is clear that that portion of the order complained of profits, rather than prejudices, the defendant, and whether it be considered a special order made after final judgment, or a modification of the original judgment, which subsequently became a part of the judgment, it was not and could not have been made the basis of a motion for a new trial. It was not an error occurring in the trial, but rather in the judgment, and cannot now be reviewed solely upon an appeal from the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

McDONOUGH et al. v. NOWLIN. (Civ. 815.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 30, 1911.)

1. Bills and Notes (§ 448*)—Payment by Accommodation Maker—Remedy Against Principal Maker.

Where accommodation signers of a note pay it on the failure of the principal maker so to do, their remedy against the principal maker is, not on the note, but on the promise to repay, which the law implies from the facts.

2. Pleading (§ 433*)—Aider by Judgment—Payment by Sureties—Remedy Against Principal Maker.

A complaint which alleges that plaintiffs and defendant executed a joint and several note for the sole debt of defendant, that plaintiffs signed as sureties only as an accommodation to defendant, and without any other consideration, that defendant failed to pay the note, and that plaintiffs were compelled to pay it, and which prays for judgment against defendant for the face of the note, with interest, though ambiguous for failing to disclose whether the action is on the note or on the promise implied by law, supports a judgment for plaintiffs, in the absence of any special demurrer pointing out the objection.

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 539*)—ACTIONS—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the court, in an action by accommodation signers of a note against the principal maker for reimbursement, found that the note was for defendant's sole debt, and that plaintiffs did not receive any benefit from the note, but executed it as an accommodation, and that plaintiffs paid the note on the maker's refusal so to do, a judgment for the plaintiffs was justified; and a finding that they were the owners and holders of the note, and were entitled to judgment against the maker, was unnecessary.

4. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 262*)—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 184*)—SURETY OR ACCOMMODATION INDORSER—PAYMENT.

Where a surety or accommodation indorser pays the note by executing his own note to the holder, who accepts it in payment and in extinguishment of the first note, he may recover the amount of the first note from the principal as money paid for his use, though the second note has not been paid.

5. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 185*)—ENFORCEMENT—COLLATERAL SECURITY.

A mortgage, given by a maker of a note to his sureties thereon to secure an obligation different from the one created by the sureties signing the note as such, does not operate as security for the implied obligation of the maker to pay the sureties on their paying the note of the maker, and the sureties are not precluded from suing on the implied obligation without first seeking relief under the mortgage, especially where they disavowed claiming any rights under it, and the trial court regarded it as having no legal force.

6. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 190*)—PAYMENT BY SURETIES—OBLIGATION OF MAKER.

A surety of a note, who pays it on the failure of the maker to do so, is entitled to recover the principal of the note, with interest to date of payment, plus interest on the sum of the principal, and such interest from date of payment to date of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

Action by John McDonough and others against Ande Nowlin. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Butts and A. M. Ewing, for appellant. J. T. Coffman, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action commenced by plaintiffs as sureties against the defendant, alleged to have been the principal in executing the obligation which was paid by plaintiffs.

The complaint alleges: That plaintiffs and defendant, on June 3, 1908, executed the joint and several promissory note set out in the complaint, which was payable to the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Healdsburg, for the sum of $1,000; that the debt evidenced thereby was "the sole debt of the said defendant, and that the plaintiffs signed the same as sureties only, as an accommodation to him, and without any other consideration whatsoever, and upon the promise of said defendant that he would pay the whole of said debt evidenced by said promissory note"; that defendant paid the interest to December 3, 1909, "but nothing further of interest, and no part of the principal has ever been paid"; that the said promissory note falling due, and defendant failing to pay the same, plaintiffs "were compelled to, and thereupon did," pay said promissory note, principal and interest; "that no part of said sum of $1,000, or of the interest thereon, has ever been repaid to plaintiffs or any of them, and that there is now due, owing, and payable and unpaid from said defendant to the said plaintiffs the aforesaid principal sum of $1,000 and interest thereon from the 3d day of December, 1909, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum." The prayer is for judgment for the sum of $1,000 and interest thereon from December 3, 1909, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, compounded semiannually, and for costs of suit. Without demurring to the complaint, defendant answered by a general denial.

The court found the facts as alleged in the complaint; that defendant "borrowed and received from said bank the said sum of $1,000, all to his own sole use and benefit, and that the said plaintiffs did not, nor did either of them, at any time or at all receive or have any part of the same, or any use or benefit thereof;" that plaintiffs executed said promissory note as an accommodation to defendant, and without other consideration; that defendant paid the interest due on said promissory note up to December 3, 1909, but has paid nothing further; that said bank demanded payment of said note from plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs paid the same in full and interest thereon falling due after December 3, 1909.

Among the conclusions of law is one, which is more a finding of fact than a conclusion of law, that, having paid the said promissory note, plaintiffs "are now the owners and holders of the same," and that the principal thereof, together with interest thereon at the rate therein provided, "is due, owing, and payable from said defendant to the said plaintiffs, and that they are entitled to judgment against said defendant therefor, together with their costs herein."

The evidence was that the note referred to in the complaint was taken up by plaintiffs after its maturity, and their joint and several note given in its stead and in payment, and that defendant has never paid to plaintiffs any part of the money borrowed by him on the note, except interest up to December 3, 1909.

[1, 2] The principal point relied upon by appellant is that the plaintiffs mistook their remedy by bringing the action on the promissory note, which they claim to have paid, instead of counting upon the assumpsit which the law implies where a surety is compelled to advance money for his principal, as was held to be the correct procedure in Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 580, 65 Pac. 1094. And it is further contended that the trial court fell into the same error, as is shown by the finding referred to as part of the conclusions of law. That the rule is as laid down in the case cited is settled law in this state. The complaint is somewhat ambiguous and uncertain in this regard, and, had the defendant raised the point by demurrer, no doubt the complaint would have been amended so as to remove any ambiguity or uncertainty in the pleading. It was said in the case cited: "Under our system of pleading, where all the facts of the transaction are set out, it can make little difference in the generality of cases whether it be said that an accommodation maker or indorser, who has been compelled to meet the obligation of his principal, is entitled to sue upon the note, with a recovery limited to the amount he has expended, with legal interest, or whether it be said that his action is in assumpsit for money laid out on behalf of his principal, and that his recovery is measured by the amount he has so expended, with legal interest." The facts of the transaction are set out in the present case with sufficient fullness to support a judgment under the rule laid down in Yule v. Bishop, supra.

[3] The finding of the court that plaintiffs are the owners and holders of the promissory note, and are entitled to judgment against defendant therefor, was a superfluous and unnecessary finding. The other findings of fact are supported by the evidence, and are sufficient to support the judgment.

[4] The objection that the evidence failed to show payment of the note by plaintiffs, because the giving by them of their note was not such payment as entitled them to recover from defendant, is not well founded. Where a surety or accommodation indorser has paid the note of his principal by executing his own note to the holder, and it is accepted in payment and extinguishment of the first note, he has an action to recover the amount of the first note from the defendant as for money paid for his use, though his own note was not paid at the time of the trial. Stanley v. McElrath, 86 Cal. 449, 25 Pac. 16, 10 L. R. A. 545.

[5] It is further contended that plaintiffs had a chattel mortgage on "one standard Mergenthaler linotype, and one Hoe cylinder printing press," as collateral security to secure them against the payment of the note to the bank, and that it was plaintiffs' first duty to exhaust this security, before an action would lie on the implied obligation here involved. For some inscrutable reason, plaintiffs submitted in evidence a certain agreement in writing of date May 14, 1908 (prior to the execution of the note), which appears to have been a conditional agreement of certain parties to become sureties for defendant in securing a loan of $1,500. Plaintiffs also introduced in evidence an instrument in writing which has the semblance of a chattel mortgage on "one standard Mergenthaler linotype, and one Hoe cylinder printing press," executed by defendant, and bearing date January 30, 1909, several months after the execution of the note set out in the complaint. Plaintiffs contend that this mortgage is of no validity because of defects in its form and in the manner of its execution. They also claim that in any event defendant cannot avail himself of the mortgage, because he did not set it up as a defense. But it is in the case, and at plaintiffs' instance, and cannot be ignored. It purports to be between defendant and plantiffs, all of whom signed the note, and purports to mortgage "to the said mortgagee, all that certain personal property situated and described as follows, to wit: One standard Mergenthaler linotype, and one Hoe cylinder printing press, as security for the payment to said mortgagees of the said mortgage of one thousand ($1,000) dollars lawful money of the United States of America, on ——— day of ——— in the year nineteen hundred and ——— with interest thereon, at the rate of ——— per cent. per ——— according to the terms and conditions of ——— certain promissory note of even date herewith, and in the words and figures following, to wit: ——— 'After date I promise to pay to Jno. McDonough, et al., the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000) lawful money of the United States of America without interest. Signed. Ande Nowlin.' It is also agreed that if the mortgagor shall fail to make any payments as in the said promissory note provided, then the mortgagee may take possession of said property, using all necessary force so to do, and may immediately proceed to sell the same in the manner provided by law, and from the proceeds pay the whole amount in said note specified. In witness whereof, etc. Ande Nowlin." Attached to the instrument is an affidavit of the mortgagor in the usual form, and also a certificate of acknowledgment. No other affidavits appear to the instrument. It appears to have been recorded February 19, 1909, at the request of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Healdsburg.

The evidence was that no such note as is referred to in the mortgage was ever executed, and the mortgage cannot by any stretch of construction be said to refer to the note which was given several months prior to the date of the mortgage. Just how far an equity court would interpose to carry out the intention of the parties, whatever it was, is not easy to conjecture. But it is plain that this mortgage on its face does not show that it was given to secure the note already executed and in the hands of the bank, for it distinctly refers to "a certain promissory note of even date herewith and in the words and figures following, to wit"; whereas the note given to the bank was dated June 3, 1908, and the evidence was that no other note was executed. So far as appears, this mortgage was given to secure an obligation entirely different from the one on which plaintiffs were sureties. How it can be said to operate as security for the implied obligation on which the action is based, we are unable to see. Plaintiffs at the trial disavowed claiming any rights under it, and the trial court regarded it as having no legal force. We do not think that plaintiffs were precluded from pursuing this action, without first having sought relief under this mortgage.

Defendant admits the indebtedness. His fear that he cannot safely pay what he owes without plaintiffs first releasing this mortgage is more fanciful than real. Should plaintiffs attempt to sell his property under this mortgage after he has paid this judgment, he would find little difficulty in preventing it, if it be true that the intention of the parties was that the mortgage should apply to the note given to the bank. Plaintiffs would not be permitted to sell the property in discharge of an obligation already paid by him.

[6] One other point is made, namely, that plaintiffs recovered compound interest. They were entitled to interest on the amount of the obligation paid by them. Plaintiffs were entitled to recover the principal sum of $1,000 and 7 per cent. interest from December 3, 1909, to date of payment by plaintiffs, May 16, 1909, amounting to $1,031.69, and this sum, plus legal interest from the last-mentioned date to October 3, 1910 (date of judgment) making $1,059.15, the amount of the judgment. The correctness of this computation is not disputed by defendant.

Whatever the court may have said in its conclusions of law, its judgment as rendered was supported by the evidence, and is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

CHRISTENSON LUMBER CO. v. BUCKLEY et al. (Civ. 855.)

1. Trial (§ 163*)—Taking Case from Jury—Nonsuit.

Where defects of pleading or proof cannot be corrected, though specifically pointed out, failure to specify the grounds of a motion for a nonsuit is immaterial; but, where corrections could be made, it is improper to grant a nonsuit, in the absence of stated grounds to support the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

2. Mechanics' Liens (§ 277*)—Enforcement—Variance.

Where a building contract is unrecorded, it is unnecessary, in an action to enforce a mechanic's lien arising therefrom, to aver the exact contract price, so that, where there is no denial of a valid contract by the defendant, the fact that the complaint avers a sum different from that shown by the contract received in evidence is an immaterial variance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 546–554; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

3. Trial (§ 139*)—Questions for Jury—Nonsuit.

Where there is some substantial evidence tending to prove plaintiff's case, a motion for a nonsuit should not be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 338–341; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

4. Evidence (§ 424*)—Contracts.

In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, the testimony of the agent and architect of the owner is relevant and material to show that a written agreement in evidence did not contain all the contract between his principal and the builder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1966–1968; Dec. Dig. § 424.*]

5. Trial (§ 105*)—Reception of Evidence—Rejection on Motion of Court.

Where no objection is interposed to an offer to prove facts which are relevant and material, rejection of such evidence by the court of its own motion is improper.

6. Evidence (§ 424*)—Parol Evidence.

The rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of a contract binds only the parties thereto and their representatives, and does not preclude strangers to the writing from interposing oral testimony thereon in their own interests.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Christenson Lumber Company against C. F. Buckley and J. A. Persson. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chas. M. Bufford, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit.

The admitted facts of the case, as evidenced by the pleadings and the stipulation of counsel for the respective parties, are these: The defendant Buckley, in the month of June, 1908, employed the defendant Persson, a contractor and builder, to repair and alter a dwelling house owned by Buckley, which had been partially destroyed by fire. No formal written contract was executed by Buckley and Persson, but prior to commencing work on the building Persson made, signed, and delivered to the agent of Buckley a memorandum of agreement, wherein Persson "certified" that he would do all the work on the residence of the defendant Buckley, as per accompanying signed specifications, for the sum of $636. The signed specifications referred to in the memorandum of agreement, among other things, required Persson to "frame out roof with new rafters to conform with old lines. Same to be boarded on top and reshingled. * * *" During the progress of the work, Persson purchased from the plaintiff lumber and materials to be used, and which were actually used, in the repair and alteration of said dwelling, and not having been paid the full price therefor, on the 4th day of August, 1908, the plaintiff caused to be left at the residence of the defendant Buckley, with a person in charge thereof, a notice, directed to Buckley, setting forth that plaintiff's account against defendant Persson amounted to $83.79, and requesting Buckley to withhold that amount from defendant Persson. Said notice was sufficient to put defendant Buckley on inquiry as to plaintiff's having furnished lumber and materials to defendant Persson, for use, and which were actually used, in the repair and alteration of said dwelling, and stated as well the kind, grade, and value of the lumber and materials so furnished.

It was alleged in the plaintiff's complaint that at the time of the service of the notice just referred to there was due and unpaid from the defendant Buckley to the defendant Persson, for and on account of the work done under the agreement to alter and repair, a sum of money more than sufficient to pay the plaintiff's demand in full, but that the defendant Buckley ignored said demand, and refused to withhold the amount in the notice specified and claimed to be due the plaintiff.

Incidentally, it should be mentioned that the plaintiff, upon information and belief, alleged in the complaint that the contract price of the work as originally agreed upon by Buckley and Persson was in excess of $1,000; that the contract had never been recorded; and that within the time allowed by law the plaintiff had filed for record its claim of lien, in the ordinary form, for the balance alleged to be due plaintiff for the lumber and materials furnished the defendant Persson, and by him actually used in the repair and alteration of the building.

Upon these pleaded and admitted facts, plaintiff sought to recover a personal judgment against both defendants for the balance claimed to be due it, and to enforce its lien against the property.

No appearance was entered for the defendant Persson, and the record is silent as to whether or not he was ever served with summons in the action. However, the defendant Buckley answered, and, among other things, denied that, at the time plaintiff gave defendant Buckley the notice hereinbefore referred to, there was due and unpaid to the defendant Persson, on the contract in question, any sum of money whatsoever, and alleged that, as subsequently appeared in evidence, the original contract price of the work was less than $1,000.

The case was tried upon the theory, as stipulated by counsel for plaintiff and defendant, that every material allegation of plaintiff's complaint was true, save and except the allegations that the amount of the original contract price was in excess of $1,000, and that at the time of the notice to Buckley there was due to Persson a sum of money more than sufficient to pay the claim of plaintiff.

At the trial the plaintiff called the defendant Buckley as a witness in its behalf, and he testified in effect that at the time he received the notice to intercept any payments that might be due to Persson the work originally specified and contracted for had been completed, and the contract price therefor paid to Persson in full. It was developed, however, during the course of the examination of this witness that when the work on the roof of the building was first completed it was discovered that a shingled roof, as originally specified, was contrary to the fire ordinances of the city and county of San Francisco, and upon demand of representatives of the fire department the shingled roof was removed by Persson and a metal roof substituted. The witness further testified that for the entire work upon the building he paid Persson the sum of $1,377 in the following installments: June 27, 1908, by check, $500; July 17, 1908, by check, $400; on August 11, 1908, by check, $200; and on August 11, 1908, by a promissory note, payable 35 days thereafter, $277. Buckley claimed that the payment of $200 was made on account of the extra work involved in substituting a metal roof for the completed shingle roof, and that this work was not included in or contemplated by the original contract.

The memorandum of agreement hereinbefore referred to was identified by Buckley and admitted in evidence as a part of the plaintiff's case; and then the architect and agent of the defendant Buckley, J. R. Miller, was called as a witness for the plaintiff. By him the plaintiff offered to show that the written memorandum of agreement did not contain all of the negotiations of the parties to the contract, but that, on the contrary, they had further agreed orally that "if the board of public works would not approve the wooden roof a metal roof would be put on." No formal objection was made to this offer of proof by counsel for the defendant, but the court of its own motion refused to admit the evidence, upon the ground that it was an attempt to vary by parol the terms of a written instrument.

Thereupon the plaintiff submitted its case, and the defendant asked for a nonsuit. No grounds for a nonsuit were stated, and the record does not show that the request for a nonsuit was disposed of at the time it was made. To be exact, the court, in response to the request of defendant's counsel for a nonsuit, said, "I think you are entitled to it, but I don't wish to dispose of the matter that way." It would be a fair inference from the quoted language of the court that the request for a nonsuit had been denied; but some 40 days later the trial court, apparently under the impression that it had previously granted a motion for a nonsuit, entered an order which, in part, recited that, "the attention of the court having been called to the fact that the judgment of nonsuit heretofore, on the 19th day of November, 1909, in said cause in favor of defendant C. F. Buckley, had not been entered by the clerk in the minutes of the court, the court orders that said judgment of nonsuit be entered nunc pro tunc as of the 19th day of November, 1909." This was in effect an order granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and, as the judgment must be reversed for other reasons, it will not be necessary for us to decide the point as to whether or not the record supports the court's nunc pro tunc entry of a judgment which, it is claimed, was never given or made in the first instance.

[1] No definite and distinct reason was given by the trial court for nonsuiting the plaintiff; but it is defendant's contention that the plaintiff was properly nonsuited because of a variance in the contract price of the work, as pleaded, and that proved upon the trial. It is further insisted in support of the judgment that the evidence offered upon the plaintiff's case affirmatively and conclusively establishes the fact that the work originally specified and contracted for had been completed and paid for in full before the defendant Buckley was served with notice to withhold any money which might be due to the defendant Persson under the contract. There is no merit in either of these contentions. In the first place, it was error for the court to grant the motion for a nonsuit, in the absence of stated grounds to support the motion. The reason for the rule requiring the grounds of a motion for a nonsuit to be stated is to afford the plaintiff an opportunity to correct any defects of pleading or proof which admit of correction. It is true that this reason does not apply in a case where such defects could not be corrected, even if specifically pointed out, and in such a case the error of not specifying the grounds of the motion is immaterial. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867. But in the case at bar it is plain that, if the defendant had specified as a ground of his motion for a nonsuit that there was a variance between the proof and the pleadings, the matter could have been easily corrected by a motion to amend the pleadings to conform to the proof, which we feel certain the trial court, in the exercise of a wise discretion, would have granted.

[2] But, aside from this, the defendant's answer does not deny that a valid contract was entered into between the parties for the work in question, and the contract offered and received in evidence is not materially different from the contract pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint. The only difference is as to the price to be paid for the work; but, inasmuch as the contract between Buckley and Persson was not recorded, it was not essential to the plaintiff's cause of action to aver the exact amount of the contract. Morrison v. Gamble et al., 14 Utah, 201, 46 Pac. 1104. And, as it is not apparent how the variance between the pleaded and proven contract could have misled or prejudiced the defendant in the preparation of his defense, the variance must be treated as immaterial. Code Civ. Proc. § 469.

[3] The trial court was not bound by the statement of the defendant Buckley that he "had performed all his obligations in full to Persson" prior to receiving the notice to withhold any money that might be due to Persson under the original contract. This at best was but the conclusion of the witness, and was in direct conflict with his further testimony that he "paid the last payment by note," dated August 11, 1908, and seven days after the service upon him of the notice to withhold any moneys due to the defendant Persson. Where there is a conflict in the evidence, a motion for a nonsuit should never be granted, and, "if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove the facts necessary to make out a case, the plaintiff is entitled to a trial upon the merits." Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252.

[4-6] The proffered testimony of the witness Miller was relevant and material. No grounds of objection were stated to the offer of proof, and for this reason alone the action of the court in rejecting the evidence was erroneous. San Luis Water Co. v. Estrada, 117 Cal. 185, 48 Pac. 1075. Apart from this, the rule that parol evidence is never admissible to alter, add to, or vary the terms and conditions of a written instrument does not apply to the facts of this case. The rule applies only to those who are parties to the writing, and binds only them and their representatives. It does not preclude strangers to the writing from introducing oral testimony of the actual facts of the transaction which may have a bearing upon their interests. McMaster v. Insurance Co., 55 N. Y. 222, 14 Am. Rep. 239; Smith v. Moynihan, 44 Cal. 53; Dunn v. Price, 112 Cal. 46, 44 Pac. 354; Bickerdike v. State, 144 Cal. 691, 78 Pac. 270; Code Civ. Proc. 1856.

The judgment is reversed.

NAPA VALLEY PACKING CO. v. SAN FRANCISCO RELIEF & RED CROSS FUNDS. (Civ. 827.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 16, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 15, 1911.)

1. TRIAL (§ 365*)—VERDICT—SPECIAL VERDICT—MATERIAL ISSUE.

Where the complaint alleged that plaintiff sold and delivered certain goods to defendants, other than the defendant corporation, and that the defendant corporation agreed to pay the reasonable value thereof, and assumed all the liabilities and obligations incurred by the other defendants, a special verdict, finding that the plaintiff sold no goods to the original defendants, other than the defendant corporation, precluded a recovery, because it was upon a material issue of plaintiff's case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 365.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 36*)—PROOF.

Where a complaint alleged that plaintiff sold and delivered certain goods to others than the defendant, and that defendant agreed to pay the reasonable value therefor, proof by way of estoppel that defendant by its conduct led plaintiff to believe that the only controversy was as to the amount of payment could not render proof of the sale unnecessary; that being the real basis of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

3. ESTOPPEL (§ 110*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—PLEADING.

To be relied on, an estoppel must be pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 300; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 33*)—PROOF.

Where plaintiff alleged that it sold and delivered goods to a third person, and that defendant promised and agreed to pay the reasonable value thereof, proof that defendant had ratified all the contracts made by that third person would not render it unnecessary that this contract of sale be proven, for the sale is the basis of the cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 85, 86; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 359*)—VERDICTS—"SPECIAL VERDICTS."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 625, providing that in actions for the recovery of money only, or real property, the jury may render a general or special verdict, and that in all other cases the court may direct a special verdict upon any of the issues, and that a special finding of facts inconsistent with the general verdict controls the latter, the term "special verdict" does not mean, as at common law, a finding upon every material issue in the case, but allows findings upon any issue; and, while there may be a conflict in the special findings themselves, any inconsistency with the general verdict serves to nullify it.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6594-6596.]

6. TRIAL (§ 350*)—VERDICTS—SPECIAL VERDICTS—FINDING OF FACT.

Where the complaint alleged that plaintiff had, at the special instance and request of defendants, other than the defendant corporation, sold and delivered certain goods, and that the defendant corporation promised and agreed to pay the reasonable value thereof, the special issue, "Did plaintiff sell and deliver the goods mentioned in the complaint, or any part thereof, to the original defendants, other than the corporation?" did not call for the determination of a question of law, but for a finding of fact, especially in view of the allegations of the complaint of a sale and delivery of the goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 828-833; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 218*)—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURT BELOW—OBJECTIONS—NECESSITY.

In the absence of objections to the form of questions in the special verdict at the time of submission, no objections can be raised on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1315-1324; Dec. Dig. § 218;* Trial, Cent. Dig. § 819.]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 264*)—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURT BELOW—EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

Where no exceptions to the phraseology of questions in the special verdict are reserved, such exceptions cannot be considered on appeal.

9. TRIAL (§ 350*)—VERDICT—SPECIAL VERDICT.

Where the complaint alleged that plaintiff, at the request of third persons, sold and delivered to them certain goods, for which they promised and agreed to pay the reasonable value thereof, and that defendant assumed all the liabilities of such persons, defendant was entitled to submit to the jury for a special finding the issue of whether such persons promised to pay for any of the goods claimed by plaintiff to have been sold and delivered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 828-833; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1175*)—DETERMINATION ON APPEAL.

The general verdict was for plaintiff, though a special verdict inconsistent with it was rendered. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant did not move to have judgment entered in its favor on the special verdict; nor upon motion for new trial was any attack made upon the judgment on that ground, though defendant appealed upon several errors. Held that, as the party in whose favor the general verdict is rendered is entitled to judgment as of course, and if the opposing party wishes to urge his right to judgment upon the special findings he must move for such judgment, such motion must be made before judgment is entered upon the general verdict; and hence judgment could not be rendered for defendant on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1175.*]

Red Cross Funds, a voluntary association, also certain individuals alleged to have been appointed by the mayor of San Francisco as a committee to relieve the distress caused by the earthquake and fire in San Francisco, of April 18, 1906, and the appellant, San Francisco Relief & Red Cross Funds, a corporation. At the trial, on motion of plaintiff, the action was dismissed as to all of the defendants, except the appellant. The action was brought to recover the value of certain canned goods alleged to have been sold and delivered on or about April 25, 1906. The gravamen of the complaint is that the plaintiff "sold and delivered, at the special instance and request of the above-named defendants, other than the defendant corporation, to the said defendants, other than the defendant corporation," the goods; that they were reasonably worth the sum of $6,547.50, "for which said goods, wares, and merchandise the above-named defendants, other than the defendant corporation, promised and agreed to pay the reasonable value thereof; that the said defendant corporation did assume all of the obligations and liabilities incurred by the said defendants, other than the defendant corporation hereinabove named," and that only $1,809 of the amount due has been paid. The appellant denied all these allegations, and also pleaded an accord and satisfaction. The cause was tried before a jury, and a general verdict was rendered against appellant, and the appeal is from the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial.

Among certain special issues submitted to the jury was the following: "Did the plaintiff sell and deliver the goods mentioned in the complaint, or any part thereof, to the original defendants, other than San Francisco Relief & Red Cross Funds?" To this interrogatory, the jury answered, "No." It is therefore insisted by appellant that the judgment should have been entered for defendant. The contention is based upon the assumption that the finding of the jury constitutes a special verdict upon a material matter, and that it is inconsistent with the general verdict. Hence is invoked the rule: "Where a special finding of facts is inconsistent with the general verdict, the former controls the latter, and the court must give judgment accordingly." Section 625, Code Civ. Proc.

As to the nature of a special verdict or finding of fact, no discussion is needed. It is sufficient to refer to section 624 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to the opinion of the Supreme Court in Plyer v. Pacific, etc., Cement Co., 152 Cal. 125, 92 Pac. 56, and of this court in Williams v. San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co., 6 Cal. App. 715, 93 Pac. 122.

[1] That the said question involves a material issue could hardly be made clearer by argument or illustration. It is apparent that the foundation of respondent's claim is the sale and delivery of the goods to the defendants, other than the defendant corporation. Appellant became liable for the debt, if at all, only by reason of a novation; it assumed the obligation that had been incurred by the other defendants in the purchase of the goods. Eliminate the allegation in reference to the sale and delivery of said goods, and it is clear the complaint would fail to state a cause of action against appellant. Likewise, findings upon the other allegations only would be insufficient to support the judgment. The response of the jury to said question involves, consequently, a matter of vital importance to the determination of the cause.

What appears so plain from the mere statement of the proposition may be made even more manifest by a formal presentation of this finding of the jury in connection with the other findings necessarily implied by the general verdict. We would then have, as the foundation for the judgment, the following facts: "The defendant corporation, upon receiving the sums aforesaid, did assume all of the obligations and liabilities incurred by the said defendants, other than the defendant corporation hereinabove named." "The plaintiff above named did not sell and deliver to the said defendants, other than the defendant corporation, the goods mentioned in the complaint, or any part thereof." "All of the merchandise above enumerated was of the reasonable value of $6,547.50, and the defendants have failed, neglected, and refused, and do still fail, neglect, and refuse, to pay the same, or any part thereof, except the sum of $1,809, and there is due, owing, and unpaid to plaintiff the sum of $4,738.50." The layman, even, would see at a glance that an essential element of plaintiff's case is lacking, and that a wrong conclusion has been drawn from the facts found. Plaintiff, of course, must stand upon the complaint, and no allegation therein averred is more certainly material than the one under consideration.

[2, 3] The situation is not affected by the contention of respondent as to estoppel and ratification. The estoppel is claimed by reason of the fact that "appellant never denied its liability for the merchandise, and led plaintiff to believe that there was only a dispute as to the amount it should pay, practically, or that the only controversy as between it and respondent was limited to the reasonableness of its charges." But the question here is one of pleading, and not of evidence. There is no attack upon said finding, upon the ground that it is not supported by the evidence. If we were to grant that the showing made is sufficient to justify plaintiff in believing, from appellant's conduct, that the only real controversy was as to the amount due, it would not affect the materiality of the allegation of the sale and delivery of said goods, although it might have an important bearing as to the proper determination of that issue. Again, estoppel is not pleaded, and it is therefore not properly in the case. Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982.

[4] So the question of ratification is one of evidence, and must be limited, of course, to the cause of action stated and relied upon by plaintiff. It could mean no more than an affirmance of the agency of Dr. Ford, or a confirmation of the contract that he is supposed to have made. It necessarily presupposes the detriment suffered by plaintiff as alleged in the complaint. Conceding the full authority of Ford and the ratification by appellant of every contract he made, it could manifestly be of no avail to respondent, in view of the finding of the jury that the only contract about which we are concerned here was never executed at all.

Respondent, in support of the contention that the court below could not have rendered judgment for appellant on the special verdict alone, declares: "We claim not; for there was no action of any sort pending before the court with respect to the original defendants. The suit against them has been determined, in the first place; and, secondly, it was not at any time pretended that the goods were sold and delivered to them individually. We contended, and do now, that the obligation to pay for the goods was imposed on the finance committee of the Relief & Red Cross Funds, and that it subsequently devolved upon appellant. The entire question, therefore, was an immaterial one." As to what was intended, we, of course, have no better guide than to follow the simple and ordinary signification of the terms employed. According to our understanding of the words used by the pleader, it seems quite plain that plaintiff intended to rely upon a sale and delivery of the goods to the original defendants. Nor does the original obligation seem immaterial, because it has been assumed by another. If A. sells and delivers goods to B., and C. assumes the obligation to pay for them, in a complaint against B. and C., setting forth these facts, although the action might be dismissed as to B., it would still be necessary to prove the sale and delivery to him, if denied, in order to make out a case against C.

[5] Respondent is equally at fault in the contention that "the provisions of section 625, Code of Civil Procedure, with respect to the inconsistency of a special with a general verdict, apply to an entire special verdict. In other words, if a consistent special verdict is inconsistent with a general one, the former controls. But here the special verdict is consistent with the general one; the first finding notwithstanding." Herein, as we conceive it, is shown a misapprehension of the scope of a special finding of facts. The significance of such finding is clearly pointed out in the Plyer Case, supra. Therein it is shown that the term "special verdict," as used in the statute, does not necessarily mean what it did a common law, viz., "a finding upon every material issue in the case. But the term is not used in that sense in the statute, which authorizes the demand for special verdicts on any one or more of the issues or particular questions of fact, not for the purpose of determining what judgment shall be entered, but primarily and principally for the purpose of determining whether the general verdict is or is not against law." It must be clear, therefore, under our practice, that if the finding of any material fact by the jury is irreconcilable with the general verdict, the latter cannot be upheld. Without doubt, there may be a conflict in the special findings themselves; one being consistent and another inconsistent with the general verdict. But, of course, this circumstance would not alleviate nor change the situation. The finding in harmony with the general verdict could not derogate from the effect of an adverse special finding upon a material fact in issue.

[6] Another objection by respondent, probably not so free from doubt, is that the said question proposed to the jury, "Did the plaintiff sell and deliver?" etc., does not call for a finding of fact, but, in effect, the determination of a proposition of law. As to this vital point, we are not afforded much assistance by counsel; the briefs being largely devoted to the discussion of other questions. There is no dispute, of course, that the special verdict or finding must be as to a question of fact, and not of law. In the language of section 624 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we have it: "The special verdict must present the conclusions of fact established by the evidence, and not the evidence to prove them." There may be a special finding, though, upon an issue made by the pleadings, or upon a question of fact included within, but not so comprehensive as, the issue. But in the latter event "a special finding upon any single essential element of the issuable fact inconsistent with the general verdict would be as fatal as a special verdict upon the broader issue." Plyer Case, supra. Here, in accordance with the more restricted meaning of the first term, the question of "sale" and "delivery" might have been resolved into two separate elements, and thus submitted to the jury. But, strictly speaking, the former includes the latter, as there can be no completed sale without delivery. In this view, the "delivery" must be treated as surplusage. If, however, the term "sale" or "sold" be construed as simply embracing an agreement to transfer the property, then, of course, "delivery" becomes an essential element to perfect the title. In either event, it is manifest the finding strikes at the very root of respondent's claim.

Preliminary to the main controversy, there are two considerations that should be noticed. The first of these is that the issue was submitted in the same form as it is presented in the pleading. As we have already seen, plaintiff alleged the sale and delivery of the goods. If this is not an allegation of facts, but of mere conclusions of law, it is at least doubtful whether the complaint states a cause of action. At any rate, when plaintiff has deliberately selected such terms by which to tender a material issue of fact, and the question has been submitted to the jury in the language which plaintiff has employed, an objection by him that, after all, the finding amounts to no more than a conclusion of law does not invite favorable comment, and it appears somewhat unseemly. If the form of the statement is sufficient for the complaint, it should not be held lacking for the purposes of a special finding.

[7, 8] Again, before the case was submitted to the jury the court stated to them: "The defendant has requested certain issues which you must decide in this case, and they are as follows." Thereupon the court read them to the jury. Counsel for plaintiff objected to Nos. 3 and 4 of the proposed interrogatories, and the court declined to submit them; but no objection whatever was made to the one in controversy here. Furthermore, it does not appear that any objection was made at any time to the form of the verdict. The propriety, in a case like this, of requiring such objection with the alternative of being denied the privilege thereafter, must be apparent. Indeed, it has been held that an objection to the form must be made at the time of submission; otherwise it will be presumed that there was assent to the submission of questions as presented. Gerhardt v. Swaty, 57 Wis. 24, 14 N. W. 851. Where no exceptions to the phraseology of questions in a special verdict are reserved, such exceptions cannot be considered on appeal. Dodge v. O'Dell's Estate, 106 Wis. 296, 82 N. W. 135; Algier v. Steamer Maria, 14 Cal. 168; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. 379.

But, recurring to the main inquiry, it should be held, we think, that the question involved ultimate facts, rather than conclusions of law. No doubt, it is sometimes a question of law whether there has been a sale or delivery of property. The case is somewhat like that of ownership. This has been held to be an ultimate fact or a conclusion of law, depending upon circumstances. An allegation that plaintiff is the owner of certain property is unobjectionable, and a special finding by a jury that one of the parties is the 'owner" would be entirely proper. The terms "sale" and "delivery" are familiar expressions. They convey to the average business man or farmer a meaning as definite as to the members of the bar; and it seems difficult to understand how you could more appropriately than was done in this case submit to the jury the question whether there was an actual transfer to said defendants, for a consideration, of the goods mentioned in the complaint. Would it be any more satisfactory if the jury had been asked whether there was "a contract by which, for a pecuniary consideration, called a price," plaintiff transferred said goods to said defendants? The conception of "sale" and "delivery" might have been resolved, probably, into simpler elements embraced in several questions, but no useful purpose seems to require it.

[9] But this branch of the subject may be dismissed with the reflection that if we view said finding as a conclusion of law, and therefore to be eliminated from the case, still the conclusion of the trial court cannot be upheld for the following reason: Defendant also requested the trial judge to direct the jury to find a special verdict upon this issue: "Did the original defendants, other than San Francisco Relief & Red Cross Funds, promise to pay for any of the goods claimed by plaintiff to have been sold and delivered?" Plaintiff objected on the ground that, "having dismissed as against the other defendants, the only issue before this jury is one concerning the defendants before the bar." The court sustained the objection, and refused to submit the question. The ground of the objection, as we have already seen, is not tenable. This is still further emphasized by a consideration of the circumstances of the succeeding question: "Did the San Francisco Relief & Red Cross Funds assume the obligation incurred by the other original defendants?" This latter, covering one of the allegations of the complaint, was submitted without objection, and was answered in the affirmative. But the particular obligation relied upon, as has already appeared, was the promise to pay for the goods, which was specifically averred in the complaint, and thereby made an essential element in the cause of action. We think, therefore, that appellant had a perfect right, under the law as it existed at the time of the trial, to demand that the jury determine categorically this issue. It is to be observed, also, that the question is entirely unobjectionable in form, and covers an additional feature of the case to that included in the issue as to the sale and delivery. It is manifest that said defendants, by their promise, might have incurred an obligation to pay for the goods, although the goods were sold and delivered to some one else. The question, then, is as to the disposition of the appeal.

[10] Appellant did not move to have judgment entered in its favor on the aforesaid special verdict; nor, upon the motion for a new trial, was any attack made upon the judgment on said ground. One of the errors of law, however, specified on the said motion for a new trial was the refusal of the court to submit said issue to the jury. The party in whose favor the general verdict is rendered is entitled to judgment thereon as a matter of course, without motion. If, therefore, the opposing party wishes to urge his right to judgment, he must move for judgment on the special findings, on the ground that they are inconsistent with the general verdict. Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 387; Farley v. Eller, 40 Ind. 319. The motion for judgment on the special findings must be made, of course, before judgment is entered on the general verdict. This was not done, and therefore it would not be proper practice, nor indeed just to respondent, to direct judgment to be entered for appellant; but, as we view the matter, the motion for a new trial should have been granted.

The judgment and order are therefore reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

RIALTO CONST. CO. v. REED. (Civ. 579.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 24, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 21, 1911.)

1. Contracts (§ 284*)—Building Contracts—Decision of Chief Engineer—Conclusiveness.

A stipulation in a contract for railroad construction work that the chief engineer of the railroad company shall decide as to the classification and quantity of materials moved, and that his decision shall be final, is binding on the parties, in the absence of fraud, or such gross mistake as to imply fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

2. Contracts (§ 353*)—Building Contracts—Decision of Chief Engineer—Conclusiveness.

An instruction that the estimates of a chief engineer of a railroad company, authorized by a construction contract to finally decide as to the classification and quantity of materials moved, are not conclusive, but the contractor may recover for the work performed, with a further charge that before the jury can set aside the estimates of the engineer there must be convincing evidence overcoming the presumption that the estimates correctly state the facts, and that mere difference in the classification reached by the engineer and that claimed by the contractor does not justify the setting aside of the estimates, but that the difference must be such as to lead the mind to the conclusion that fraud has been practiced, when construed together, correctly state that the estimates are conclusive, in the absence of fraud, or such mistake as to imply fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1829-1844; Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

3. Trial (§ 295*)—Instructions—Construction.

The instructions must be read as a whole, and if, when so read, the jury was correctly instructed, the judgment will not be reversed because of an apparent conflict between isolated parts thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

4. Estoppel (§ 81*)—Requests—Payments.

The contractor under a railroad construction contract cannot question the payment by his employer of bills for supplies furnished pursuant to the contract, where the contractor, on the presentation of the bills for inspection and approval, directed his employer to consult the contractor's bookkeeper to O. K. the bills, and the bookkeeper did so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 216, 217; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

5. Set-Off and Counterclaim (§ 60*)—Failure to Assert—Effect.

In an action in which defendant filed a counterclaim covering the basis of a prior action by him against plaintiff, an objection to the maintenance of plaintiff's suit, on the ground of the failure to present a counterclaim therefor in the prior action by defendant, raised for the first time after the case had been on trial for about eight days, and just before it was expected to go to the jury, was properly overruled as too technical.

6. Contracts (§ 284*)—Construction Contracts—Construction.

A contract for railroad construction work, which authorized the railroad company to discontinue the entire work, or cancel the contract without liability for damages, provided that in case of cancellation a final estimate of the work done should be prepared and payments made therefor at contract prices, contemplated that on the cancellation of the contract there should be a final estimate of all the work done, on which full settlement should be made; and the objection that a final estimate was not binding because made after final suspension of the work, but before the cancellation of the contract, must be disregarded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

7. Contracts (§ 284*)—Building Contracts—Decision of Chief Engineer.

A contract for railroad construction work, which makes the decision of the chief engineer of the railway company as to the classification and quantity of materials moved final, does not contemplate that the chief engineer shall in person make the estimates, but estimates made by an assistant detailed on the work, checked up in the engineer's office, which formed the basis for the final estimate of the chief engineer, are sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Rialto Construction Company against Charles Wesley Reed. From a judgment granting relief to plaintiff, both parties appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, for appellant Rialto Const. Co. Charles Wesley Reed, in pro. per.

KERRIGAN, J. In this case there are two appeals, both from the judgment; one being taken by plaintiff, and the other by the defendant.

A brief outline of the facts of the case is as follows: On September 20, 1905, C. E. Loss entered into a contract with the Ocean Shore Railway Company to perform all the grading work, tracklaying, and surfacing for the company's double-track railroad from its initial point in San Francisco to Scott creek, in Santa Cruz county, being a distance of about 67 miles. The contract, among other things, contained a classification of the materials to be worked; said materials being classified as earth, loose rock, solid rock, etc. On October 2, 1905, C. E. Loss sublet certain parts of the work, constituting what were known as sections 4 and 5 thereof, to Mahoney Bros. & Malley, copartners, the predecessors and assignors of plaintiff. In January, 1906, Mahoney Bros. & Malley, on the one part, and the defendant, on the other, confirmed in writing a previous oral agreement between them, whereby the defendant was to perform that portion of the work known as section 4. Prior to February 27, 1906, Mahoney Bros. & Malley had transferred to plaintiff all their interest in the contract of October 2, 1905, and on that day plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract, whereby the defendant was to perform the work on section 4. This contract, which took the place of the one between defendant and Mahoney Bros. & Malley, is the one by which the rights of the parties hereto are to be determined.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It provided in part as follows: "The said Rialto Construction Co. agrees to furnish the said Reed, or his order, with the necessary hay and grain for the said stock, and supplies for the men engaged upon the work, at cost price, and also agrees to pay weekly the time checks issued to his employés by the said Reed for work performed upon section 4, in accordance with the contract. * * * It is understood that all money earned by said Reed shall be first applied to the payment of said time checks, and the said supplies and the said hay and grain, and all other bills incurred by said Reed in the prosecution of this work, before any of it shall be used by said Reed for any other purpose. The said Reed is to be paid for the performance of said work as follows: Earth, 18c per cubic yard; loose rock, 28c per cubic yard; solid rock, 50c per cubic yard."

Each of the contracts mentioned provided that the estimate of the engineer of the Ocean Shore Railway Company, both as to classification and quantity of materials moved, as also the construction placed by said engineer upon the contract and specifications, were to be final and conclusive, and binding upon the parties.

Under the contract between the parties hereto of February 27th, defendant performed certain excavating and grading work upon said section 4, and was engaged in the performance of this work at the time of the earthquake occurring in San Francisco and vicinity, in April, 1906, at which time operations were suspended by direction of the railway company, and have not been resumed by the defendant. In the following month the chief engineer prepared a classification and final estimate of the work done by defendant.

Plaintiff alleges that it disbursed under the contract for the account of the defendant the sum of $21,965.10, upon which it has been reimbursed $15,622.78, leaving a balance of $6,342.32, which is the amount sued for by plaintiff.

To the complaint defendant interposed a counterclaim for $9,906.57, based upon an alleged erroneous classification by the chief engineer of the work involved. The case was tried with a jury, which rendered the following verdict: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $6,842.32. We further find for the defendant $4,500 because of erroneous classification." In accordance with the verdict, a judgment was duly entered. From that part thereof awarding plaintiff the sum of $6,842.32, the defendant has appealed; and from the part awarding $4,500 to the defendant, the plaintiff has appealed. The two appeals will be considered together.

[1] The contract sued on provides that the chief engineer of the railway company is empowered to decide, and his decision is made final and conclusive, as to the classification and quantity of materials moved, and plaintiff is correct in stating that this provision of the contract is binding on the parties thereto, in the absence of an averment and proof of fraud, or such gross mistake as to imply fraud. Cook v. Foley, 152 Fed. 41, 81 C. C. A. 237; Martinsburg & Potomac R. R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 5 Sup. Ct. 1035, 29 L. Ed. 255; Chicago, Santa Fé & Cal. R. Co. v. Price, 138 U. S. 185, 11 Sup. Ct. 290, 34 L. Ed. 917; Memphis Trust Co. v. Brown-Ketchum Iron Works, 166 Fed. 398, 93 C. C. A. 162. But, contrary to plaintiff's contention, there is in this case an allegation in the counterclaim appropriate in all respects to raise the question of gross mistake; and we also think, without hesitation, after having carefully read all the testimony in the case, consisting of over 500 pages, that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the implied finding of the jury that the estimate certified by the chief engineer of the railway company was palpably inaccurate. It would be tedious and not worth while to review or even summarize the evidence. The jury believing, as they evidently did, the testimony introduced by the defendant on the subject, it was for them to say whether the erroneous estimate made by the chief engineer was as to such classification a mere error of figures or in judgment, or such a negligent or careless mistake as to indicate bad faith. They adopted the latter view, and under the circumstances of the case we cannot disturb their finding.

[2, 3] The court, at one place in its charge, instructed the jury: "That the engineer's estimates are not conclusive upon the defendant; but defendant is entitled to be paid the prices called for in his contract for the work which he performed under the contract." It may be conceded that this instruction, standing alone, does not correctly state the law applicable to the facts of the case; but immediately following that instruction the court said: "I further charge you that before you can set aside the certificate of the chief engineer of the Ocean Shore Railway Company, which, by the terms of the contract between the parties, was made final as to yardage and classification, you are entitled to have submitted to you clear and convincing evidence to overcome the presumption that the certificate correctly stated the facts in that respect. Mere difference in the classification reached by the Ocean Shore engineer and that claimed by the defendant does not justify you in setting aside such certificate. The difference must be so large, the disregard of the defendant's rights must be so palpable and gross, as to lead the mind but to one conclusion, and that is that fraud has been practiced upon him." It is sufficient answer to plaintiff's contention to say that when these two instructions are read together, as they are required to be, it does not appear that they were misleading or confusing; but, on the contrary, it is clear that they gave the jury "a fair and just notion of the law upon the point discussed. As just indicated, the charge to the jury must be read as a whole, and, if when so read it appears that the jury was correctly instructed, the judgment will not be reversed because there is an apparent conflict between isolated parts thereof. Stephenson v. S. P. Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407. This disposes of plaintiff's contentions. We therefore pass to a consideration of the defendant's appeal.

[4] The plaintiff, depending upon the action of defendant's bookkeeper, who approved all of the bills for supplies furnished to the defendant, introduced no evidence of the cost price, nor of the reasonable value, of such articles. The bookkeeper, however, was not employed by the defendant until March, 1906; and therefore defendant insists that said bookkeeper was without authority to bind him for any goods furnished prior to that date, by his approval of the bills therefor. There is no merit in this position, for, when these bills were presented to the defendant for his inspection and approval, he informed plaintiff that he did not personally know if they were correct, and directed that they should be sent to his bookkeeper "to be O. K.'d." This was done; and the bookkeeper testified that his approval of these bills was based as to some of the articles on his own knowledge, and as to others upon an investigation made by him. The plaintiff in good faith paid these bills for the defendant, and having submitted them to the defendant's bookkeeper for approval, as directed by the defendant, and having received that approval and acted upon it, the defendant cannot now in justice be heard to complain.

[5] At a period prior to the commencement of this action, Charles Wesley Reed brought an action against the Rialto Construction Company et al., to the complaint in which action the construction company filed an answer, but set up no counterclaim. Subsequently the construction company commenced this action, and Reed in due time answered and filed his counterclaim, covering identically the same matters and things which formed the basis of the action commenced by him. After the present case had been on trial for about eight days, and just before it was expected to go to the jury, Charles Wesley Reed made for the first time, by way of an amended answer, as well as a requested instruction to the jury, the objection that the plaintiff, having failed to file a counterclaim in the first case, it could not maintain the present action. It seems that immediately after this objection was made the plaintiff here filed an amended answer in the case of Reed v. Rialto Construction Company, setting up its counterclaim, and requested permission to introduce in this case the record in that action showing such fact; but the court, feeling doubtless that Reed's point was without merit, sustained an objection to the proposed evidence, and refused to instruct the jury to render a verdict in favor of defendant, as requested by him. The case was before a jury; ten days had been consumed in its trial; the issues would have been the same, no matter which case was tried first; and, passing the point that Reed waived the objection now urged by not making it earlier, we think that his contention depends upon an argument too technical to be seriously considered.

[6] A provision of the contract between the Ocean Shore Railway Company and C. E. Loss, which was carried into the contract between the parties to this action, provided "that the company may at any time reduce the contractor's force, or suspend the work or any part thereof for any length of time, or may discontinue the entire work or cancel this contract without liability for damages to the contractor, provided that in case of such cancellation a full and final estimate of the work done shall be prepared and payment made to the contractor in full thereof at contract prices, less all proper deductions," etc. This final estimate, it appears, was made after a suspension of the work, but before the cancellation of the contract. It also appears that the measurements of the work done were made up by an assistant of the chief engineer, who was detailed upon the particular section of the work undertaken by the defendant, his figures being checked up in the engineer's office, and upon the data thus furnished the chief engineer made the final estimate. Defendant contends that the admission in evidence of the so-called final estimate was error, because (1) the estimate was made before a cancellation of the contract; and (2) because the estimate was not made by the chief engineer personally.

(1) It was not contemplated by the contract that the progressive estimates of the work as it proceeded, made for the purpose of paying installments on the contract, should be accurate; but, on the other hand, it was intended by the parties to the contract that when the work was finished or the contract canceled there should then be a final and correct estimate of all the work done, upon which full settlement should be made. After the earthquake, operations were suspended, and shortly thereafter, without resumption of work and in anticipation of the cancellation of the contract, the final estimate was made. Under these circumstances, we wholly fail to see what difference it could possibly make to the defendant whether the estimate was made just before or after such cancellation. This objection is purely technical, and may be disregarded.

[7] (2) The law does not contemplate in a case like this that the chief engineer shall in person make the estimates, for, on account of the extent of the work, such a course would be impracticable. It is sufficient if he exercises, as was done in this case, a general supervision over them. A case in point, from which we here quote at length, is Sweet v. Morrison, 116 N. Y. 19, 22 N. E. 276, 15 Am. St. Rep. 376: "Considering the extent of the railroad, the time provided for its completion, the details and complications in the measurements, and the nature of the duties of the chief engineer as implied from his position, even if it would be possible for him to give the requisite personal attention, it would be unreasonable to expect it. As said by the court in the Herrick Case (Herrick v. Vermont C. Ry. Co., 27 Vt. 673): 'When we come to know that practically the chief engineer never does and never can make these estimates, or even verify those made by others, that the thing is altogether impracticable, we must conclude that the parties had reference to something which was usual, or at least possible, in such cases.' It was accordingly held that an estimate by the assistant engineer was sufficient in that case. * * * The position of chief engineer made him conversant with the general facts, and gave him a thorough knowledge of the engineers under his control. He was in a position to exercise his judgment upon the reliability of their reports, and could direct others to revise their measurements, if he deemed it necessary. The same means that he employed to protect the railroad in its payments to the defendants were apparently regarded as sufficient to protect the parties as between each other." See, also, the following authorities to the same effect: Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373, 388; Edwards v. Hartshorn, 72 Kan. 19, 82 Pac. 520, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1050; Nelson Bennett Co. v. Twin Falls L. & W. Co., 14 Idaho, 5, 93 Pac. 789, 797.

The judgment, which follows the verdict, is for $500 more than the plaintiff anywhere in the record demands. The plaintiff sought to recover $6,342.32; the verdict of the jury was for $6,842.32. This evidently was due to some clerical error, and the judgment therefore will be modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $500. In all other respects, it is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Tench against Eliza McMeekan. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William H. H. Hart and Aylett R. Cotton, for appellant. R. B. Tappan, for respondent.

HALL, J. This action was brought to obtain a decree that the defendant held certain described real estate in trust for plaintiff and for a conveyance thereof. Plaintiff recovered judgment as prayed for, and defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied. In due time defendant appealed from the judgment and order to the Supreme Court. The appeals were subsequently, by order of the Supreme Court, transferred to this court for determination.

Respondent claims the premises in suit under a conveyance from John Tench, now deceased, to herself, while appellant claims the said premises under a conveyance from Temperance Tench, now deceased, who in her lifetime had received a conveyance of the premises from said John Tench. For the better understanding of the case it is proper to make a general statement as to some undisputed facts in the case. On the 31st day of May, 1906, John Tench, then aged 73, was, and for some time prior thereto had been, sick and a paralytic to such an extent as to be almost helpless and unable to walk or to attend to his personal wants, and so continued up to the time of his death, which occurred on the 18th day of July, 1907. His wife, Mary Ann Tench, had deceased on May 22, 1906, leaving said Tench without any near relative except his sister Temperance Tench, who during the last illness of his said wife had cared for both the wife and John Tench, and after the death of said Mary Ann, continued to care for and keep house for John Tench as before until May 31, 1906. On May 31, 1906, John Tench, by a deed executed on said day, conveyed the premises in suit, of a conceded value of $3,500, to his sister Temperance Tench, and at the same time transferred to her all the money he had on deposit in the savings and loan society, consisting of $1,150.29. This was all the property he owned save a little household furniture and personal effects of little value. Temperance Tench thereupon moved her own personal effects into the home of John Tench, which was the lower flat of the premises in suit, and continued to care for and keep house for him until the 5th day of October, 1906, when she was taken ill, and was no longer able personally to attend to her said brother, but did on the following day, to wit, October 6, 1906, employ plaintiff, then Mrs. Brandt, a widow, to nurse and care for both herself and said John Tench. From the deposit account transferred to her Temperance drew and used for the support of herself and said John Tench $250. On the 16th day of October, 1906, she transferred the entire balance of the money still on deposit to appellant, and at the same time conveyed to appellant the premises in suit. Temperance Tench died October 29, 1906. Plaintiff, formerly Mrs. Brandt, married John Tench October 31, 1906, and thence continued to live with and care for him until his death, which occurred July 18, 1907. On May 27, 1907, John Tench by deed conveyed the premises in suit to plaintiff, his then wife.

It is alleged in the complaint that on May 31, 1906, said Temperance Tench promised and represented to her said brother, John Tench, that, if he would convey to her the premises in suit, she would care for and keep house for him as long as he should live, and would not record the deed thereto nor claim ownership therein until his death. It is also alleged that she also promised and represented to him that, if he would transfer and assign said sum of $1,130.29 on deposit in said bank to her, she would accept said money and use it for their joint support, and would not assert ownership to any portion of said sum of money until after his death. It is further alleged, and not denied, that on May 31, 1906, John Tench, now deceased, reposed great trust and confidence in his said sister Temperance Tench, and believed that she would deal fairly and justly with him. It is further alleged that said John Tench relied on the said promises and representations of his said sister, and in reliance thereon conveyed the premises in suit, and transferred the money to her, and without other consideration, and that said representations and promises were made in bad faith and without any intention to perform them.

The court found the facts in accordance with the allegations of the complaint above set forth. It is further alleged and found, and as we think upon abundant evidence, that the conveyance and assignment to appellant were without any consideration, and were taken by her with knowledge of the trust and conditions upon which Temperance held the same. Further allegations are made as to breach and nonperformance of the promises in reliance upon which the conveyance to Temperance by John Tench was made, and upon which findings were made in favor of respondent.

[1] If, however, the promises were made as alleged, without any intention of performing them, and the conveyance was made in reliance thereon, the conveyance was obtained by actual fraud, and respondent, as the grantee of John Tench, would be entitled to a conveyance from Temperance Tench or her grantee with notice and without consideration. Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189; Nordholt v. Nordholt, 87 Cal. 552, 26 Pac. 599, 22 Am. St. Rep. 268.

[2] Appellant, however, attacks the sufficiency of the evidence to support either the finding that Temperance made the representations and promises alleged, or that the conveyance to her was made by John Tench in reliance thereon, or that said Temperance made said promises without intention of performing them. As to the making of the promises, and that the conveyance to Temperance was made in reliance thereon, we think the evidence is ample to support the findings upon these issues.

The very circumstances surrounding the transaction strongly suggest that the conveyance and assignment were both made for the purpose of securing to the old, sick, and helpless grantor the care, support, and attention that he would inevitably need for his remaining days. Up to the time of the death of Mary Ann Tench it is apparent that the care and services rendered by Temperance to her brother and his wife were but of a temporary nature. Upon the death of Mary Ann it became necessary that some more permanent arrangement should be made for the care of John Tench and his home. The suggestion that he make a conveyance of his home and a transfer of his bank account to Temperance came from appellant. She made the arrangements therefor and herself drew the deed. She enlisted the aid of John Baird to explain the transaction to the sick man. In effect the evidence of this witness John Baird shows that appellant, in the presence of Temperance Tench, requested him to procure the execution of the conveyance and assignment from John Tench to Temperance, and to explain to him that Temperance for such conveyance and assignment would take care of him as long as he lived, but that the deed would not take effect until after his death and would not be recorded until after his death. Among other things this witness said: "Miss McMeekan said that the purpose of getting me there was to have the deed signed and that Temperance Tench was willing to take care of her brother for the property, and that if it was signed into her name it would not be recorded. The deed would be held and would not become effective until after John Tench's death. The money was to be used for their joint use, to be John Tench's just the same as though there had been no assignment made. Whatever was left of the money and property after John Tench's death, it would go to Temperance Tench." For this property he further said that Miss McMeekan said that "she" (Temperance) "was to take care of him, nurse him during his life. * * *" According to his testimony, he thereupon explained the matter to John Tench in substance as instructed by appellant. The witness said: "I told him that this deed was to transfer his property over to his sister, and it would not take effect until after his death, that the property would be his just the same as long as he lived. At his death the property and the money would go to his sister, what was left. During his life it would be his just the same as if there would be no transfer taken. * * * I said that his sister would take care of him."

In addition, there is evidence of admissions made by Temperance Tench during her life, and, while she held the title to the premises, that she held it and the money in trust only while her brother lived, and that it would only become hers at his death.

From the evidence above quoted, as given by John Baird, and the conduct of both John and Temperance, it is a fair deduction that both understood that for the transfer of the money and the conveyance of the realty she was to care for John Tench as long as he lived, to use the money for their joint support, and to hold the home for him during his life, and to claim no interest therein until after his death. That he made the conveyance and transfer in reliance on such promises there can be little doubt. Otherwise we must believe that in his old age, when helpless and incurably sick, of what would or might probably be a long illness, he made himself a pauper without claim upon any one for care and support except by way of charity. Appellant earnestly attacks the finding that the promises and representations of Temperance were made in bad faith and without intent to perform the same. What a person's intent in such a matter may be is often a difficult thing to determine. It usually must be ascertained from his future conduct and speech, and the fact as to such intent is one peculiarly to be deduced by process of reasoning from the facts in evidence by the trial judge.

[3] It is not sufficient, to reverse his finding upon this or any other fact, for us to say that we would have come to a different conclusion. If the finding of the trial court finds support in the evidence or by fair inference therefrom, it must stand.

[4] Appellant points to the fact that Temperance cared for John until she was taken sick, and then employed a nurse (this respondent) to take her place. This is true, but, on the other hand, the evidence shows without conflict that she also on the 16th day of October, 1906, made an absolute transfer and conveyance of all the money and property which had been conveyed to her by John, and to which alone he might look in the future for his support. There is no pretense in the record for any claim that when she assigned and conveyed to appellant she imposed any duty or obligation on appellant to support or care for John. Both in her pleadings and in her testimony appellant claims that the transfer and conveyance to her by Temperance, as well as the transfer and conveyance from John to Temperance, were absolute and without promise of any kind by her or Temperance. It is true that appellant did not disturb John Tench in his occupancy of his home, and allowed the tenant of the upper flat to pay the rental thereof to him until his death, and furnished him a small sum of money before his death. But she distinctly claims to have done this out of no legal duty to do so, but because she had a right to do with her own as she pleased. In addition to the undisputed evidence as to what Temperance did with the money and property before her death, there is evidence that she also at about the same time made efforts to have her brother sent to the county poorhouse. There is evidence that Temperance showed anxiety that her brother John might soon die, so that all the property might then become hers. In speaking of sending him to the county poorhouse, it is in evidence that she said that "she thought he would live about two weeks after he did get there. That would fix him."

The promises made by Temperance contemplated that she should give her personal attention to him as long as he should live, and that he should be supported out of the money and property transferred. By her sickness and death she was unable to carry out her promise for personal care, and by her deliberate act she at least attempted to deprive him of the right of his future support. While it must be conceded that a different conclusion might have been drawn by the trial court as to the intention of Temperance when she made the promises, we think that there is sufficient in the evidence to support the finding made that the promises were made in bad faith and without intention to perform same.

Some claim is also made that the evidence shows that the deed to Temperance was made in consideration of some advances that it is claimed had been made by Temperance to John. From the whole record it is extremely doubtful whether or not any such advances had been made. If any were made, they were of a most trifling amount, but it is clear that the deed was not made in consideration thereof, or that they were taken into consideration in connection therewith at all.

[5] Appellant also contends that the court erred in admitting parol evidence as to admissions and statements made by Temperance Tench concerning her title and interest in the property in dispute. The court did not err in so doing. Parol evidence is admissible to establish a constructive trust, or fraud in procuring a conveyance. Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189.

[6] And the declarations of a decedent against his interest, in respect to his real property, are admissible in evidence. Section 1870, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc.

Appellant also urges that she was entitled to judgment on the pleadings and findings, because it appears therefrom that John Tench conveyed the premises in suit to Temperance Tench. But the allegation and findings as to such conveyance must be read in connection with the other allegations and findings, which overcome the effect of such allegation, and show that respondent is entitled to a reconveyance of the title thus fraudulently acquired.

The findings support the judgment.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Tench against Eliza McMeekan and others. From a judgment against Eliza McMeekan and from an order denying a new trial, she appeals. Modified and affirmed.

William H. H. Hart and Aylett R. Cotton, for appellant. R. B. Tappan, for respondent.

HALL, J. These are appeals from a judgment against Eliza McMeekan and the order denying her motion for a new trial, and are presented in one transcript.

The action grows out of the same general state of facts as were involved in the case of Elizabeth Tench v. Eliza McMeekan, 118 Pac. 476, No. 877, the appeals in which were this day decided by this court. The present action was brought to recover the balance remaining of the money referred to in the opinion filed in the other action. Isadora Brandt and her husband, F. W. Brandt, were made parties because the name of Isadora Brandt had been joined with that of appellant as depositor of the fund sued for, but, as her name was subsequently removed from the account, no judgment was taken against her or her husband.

The facts concerning the transfer of both the money and the land are set forth in the complaint in this action substantially as in the other, and the allegations of the complaint are supported by the same evidence. The court made similar findings in this case as in the one to recover the land, and similar attacks are made upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and for the reasons set forth in the opinion in the other case we think these attacks are not well founded. In disposing of this case we do not deem it necessary to restate in detail the facts disclosed by the record. They are quite fully stated in the opinion filed to-day in the case involving the land, to which reference may be made for a complete understanding of the facts. The complaint in this case was framed upon the theory that the assignment made by John Tench to Temperance Tench of the money which he had on deposit in the bank was in trust during their joint lives, to be used for their joint support, and that said Temperance was to acquire no interest in said money until the death of John Tench. That such interpretation of the assignment was justified by what was said and done in connection with the making of the assignment, in view of all the surrounding circumstances we have no doubt.

[1] It was represented to John Tench, then old and helpless from paralysis, that, if he would assign his money to his sister Temperance, she would use the same for their joint support; that the money would be his just the same as if there had been no assignment made, and whatever was left after his death would go to Temperance Tench. He accordingly made the assignment. Probably neither John nor his sister Temperance clearly or at all had in mind that John might survive Temperance, which he in fact did. But it is clear that neither understood or intended by the assignment that Temperance should become the beneficial owner of the fund until after the death of John. That her understanding was that until such event occurred she held the money as well as the land in trust only is made certain by her repeated declarations to that effect to various witnesses who so testified. It is a fair deduction from the evidence as to what was said and done, in view of the conditions and circumstances surrounding the parties, that it was never intended that Temperance should become the beneficial owner of either the land or the money unless she should survive her brother. To accept the contention of appellant that both the conveyance of the land and the assignment of the money were absolute would be to suppose that John Tench in his old age, when sick and helpless, intended to deprive himself of all means of support except as the same might be accorded him as a matter of charity. This we would be loath to do.

Appellant with notice of the conditions of the assignment from John Tench to Temperance Tench, which she herself instigated and without any consideration therefor, took an assignment from Temperance of the balance of such money then on deposit in the bank. When Temperance died, John was entitled to this money. The court found, in accordance with the contention of appellant that she had drawn from the money on deposit, either personally or through Mrs. Brandt, $350; that from such sum she had expended various sums for specified purposes. From the findings it appears that $148 thus expended was for the support of either John or Temperance Tench, while the balance of the $350 was expended in and about the burial expenses of Temperance. The court gave appellant credit for the $148, but charged her with the balance of the $350, and included the same in the amount for which it gave judgment. The court in terms found that she had appropriated such balance to her own use. This, in view of the findings as to the specific purposes for which such balance was expended, should be treated as a conclusion of law and not properly a finding of fact. The court treated the expenditures for the burial of Temperance as not properly chargeable against the trust fund.

[2] In this we think the court erred. The action against appellant was in effect an action in equity to charge her as an involuntary trustee for the estate of John Tench with the amount of the balance of a trust fund in her hands at the time of his death. Temperance Tench at her decease was an unmarried woman, and John Tench was her brother and her next of kin; and, if the theory of plaintiff in this action be correct, had sufficient means to bear the expense of her burial, while Temperance was of right possessed of no means whatever. Under section 292 of the Penal Code, it was the duty of John Tench to cause the body of his sister Temperance to be buried and to bear the expense thereof. This section provides that: "The duty of burying the body of a deceased person devolves upon the persons hereinafter specified: (1) * * * (2) If the deceased was not a married woman, but left any kindred, the duty of burial devolves upon the person or persons in the same degree nearest of kin to the deceased, being of adult age, and within this state, and possessed of sufficient means to defray the necessary expenses."

The next section (293, Pen. Code) provides that, if the person whose duty it is to cause the burial of the remains of a deceased person fails to perform such duty, the person who does do so may recover from such delinquent treble the expenses thereof. See, also, Enos v. Snyder, 131 Cal. 68, 63 Pac. 170, 53 L. R. A. 221, 82 Am. St. Rep. 330. Upon John Tench, therefore, devolved the duty of causing the remains of his sister Temperance to be buried. He did not do it, but appellant performed that duty and paid the expense thereof out of a trust fund in her hands belonging to John. In this action to recover of appellant the balance of such trust fund it would clearly be just and equitable that she should be allowed for the expenditures thus made, and we think that the court erred in not so doing. The amount for which judgment was ordered and entered September 2, 1909, is the sum of $815.37 and costs of suit. As appears from the findings and conclusions of law, this amount included the sum of $251.89 which the court erroneously charged against appellant as the principal and interest thereon on account of the amount expended out of the trust fund in and about the burial of Temperance Tench. This latter sum, $251.89, should be deducted from the principal amount for which judgment was rendered, as of date September 2, 1909.

Appellant also contends that, because it is alleged and found that John Tench assigned his interest in the money in question to Temperance, the judgment is not supported by either the pleadings or the findings. This allegation and finding must be read in the light of the other allegations and findings, which show that such assignment was in trust only. Thus read there is no basis for appellant's contention in this regard. The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed, and the trial court is directed to modify the judgment entered by substituting in lieu of the figures "$815.37" the figures "$563.48" as of date September 2, 1909, and as so modified the judgment is affirmed.

1. Prohibition (§ 11*)—Grounds for Relief—Want of Jurisdiction.

Irregularities in proceedings, or abuse by the court of discretion, are not grounds for prohibition, which is available only where there is want of jurisdiction, or legal authority in the court to make the orders complained of.

3. Elections (§ 280*)—Contests—Citation—Alias Citation.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1119, 1121, requiring the issuance of a citation to contestee in an election contest, and service thereof five days before the time fixed for hearing, and requiring the court to meet at the time fixed and determine the contest, but authorizing the court to adjourn from day to day, and to continue the trial before its commencement for any time not more than 20 days, the superior court, continuing an election contest for more than 20 days before the commencement of the trial, but not dismissing the proceeding, which was based on a proper written statement of grounds of contest, does not exhaust its jurisdiction to hear the contest; and, where the original citation was not served five days before the time originally fixed, the court has authority to issue an alias citation and fix a time for the hearing of the contest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; P. J. Shields, Judge.

Petition for writ of prohibition by Charles O. Busick against the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento and Peter J. Shields, judge thereof. Writ denied.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court (Sac. 1,951) August 24, 1911.

O. G. Hopkins, A. L. Shinn, and Chas. O. Busick, for petitioner. Shelley & Hoag, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is a petition for a writ of prohibition. In reply to the order to show cause, respondent filed a demurrer, upon the ground "that the petition does not state facts sufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ prayed for," and thus is presented the question for determination. It appears that, on the 16th day of November, 1910, the board of supervisors of the county of Sacramento, after duly canvassing the returns of the general election held on the 8th day of November, 1910, by resolution duly passed, declared the result thereof, and on said 16th day of November, 1910, by resolution passed and entered on its minutes, the said board of supervisors declared the petitioner elected to the office of justice of the peace of said Riverside township. On the 9th day of December following, Michael F. Shelley filed, in the office of the county clerk of said county, a statement of his contest of the right of petitioner to said office of justice of the peace. On December 15th the court made an order setting the 28th day of said month as the day upon which a special session of the court should be held to hear said contest, and directed the clerk of the court to issue a citation, directed to said Charles O. Busick, citing him to appear on said date and answer the contest of the said Michael F. Shelley. Said citation was issued, and, on said 28th day of December the said court convened for the purpose of hearing said contest, and also the contest of J. S. Hill v. R. A. Merkeley, 114 Pac. 805. Petitioner appeared specially and objected, on certain grounds, to the hearing of said contest, and the court thereupon made and entered its order quashing said citation, and refused to proceed with the trial, placing its decision on the grounds: First. That the court had not acquired jurisdiction over the contestee, as the citation had not been served upon him personally, nor in the manner provided by law; and, second, that the said order of the court was made and the said citation issued prior to the expiration of the time for filing contests to the right of persons declared elected to office at the general election held on said 8th day of November, 1910, and therefore that the court was not authorized to proceed with the trial at the time appointed. The foregoing order has never been set aside nor appealed from. On said 28th day of December, while said Michael F. Shelley and his attorneys were present, without any affidavit by any person, the court made an order continuing said special session from time to time till the 8th day of March, 1911, when the ballots in said Riverside township were opened by said court for the purpose of having a recount taken of the votes cast for the various candidates in all contested elections, where it appeared from the statements filed that a recount was necessary, and a recount was taken in the said election contest of Hill v. Merkeley. In said proceeding no request was made by said Shelley that a recount be had in his contest against petitioner. At no time on or after March 8, 1911, did said Shelley ever apply to said superior court for any continuance of the trial of his said contest or of said special session and no continuance was had after said March 8th. On the 17th day of April following, the said Shelley served upon petitioner an affidavit of merits and notice of intention to apply to said court for an order directing said clerk to issue an alias citation, and for an order fixing a day for the hearing of said election contest. In said affidavit, as exculpatory of his delay, affiant declared: "That plaintiff and his attorneys, at the time said order was made [the order quashing the citation], believed that the court was without power to order an alias citation issued and served in such procedure and therefore, because of their mistaken understanding of the law governing election contests, the plaintiff did not at said time ask the court for an alias citation." On the 1st day of May, the said motion of Shelley came on for hearing, and was regularly continued until the next day, and was then submitted, after a full hearing, upon the affidavits, records, and papers on file in said election contest. On the 19th day of May, the said court made and entered an order that a special session of the said court be held on Wednesday, May 31, 1911, "at which session the ballots shall be opened and a recount be taken, in the presence of all the parties interested in the above-entitled contest and cause, of the votes cast at the last general election held on November 8, 1910, for the parties to this contest, where it appears from the statement filed that such recount is necessary for the proper determination of said contest; and it is further ordered that the clerk of this court shall issue an alias citation, directing the said defendant to appear at the time and place specified in this order and answer the plaintiff's statement of contest on file herein." Hence this application for a writ of prohibition.

[1] It may be observed that the record, as above recited, suggests certain questions of irregularity in the proceedings, or of possible abuse of discretion on the part of the lower court, that might be the proper subject of discussion on appeal, but which are not germane to the consideration here, which relates entirely and exclusively to the jurisdiction or legal authority of the court to make the orders in controversy. And it is manifest that we are concerned only with the validity of the said order, directing an alias citation to be issued, and fixing the 31st day of May for the hearing of the contest.

[2] As to the authority of the court to issue an alias citation where the original has not accomplished its purpose, there can be no doubt. This question has been decided by the Supreme Court in O'Dowd v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 537, 111 Pac. 751, wherein it is said: "But, in view of the provisions of section 1121 [Code Civ. Proc.], it is not intended, or at least there is no room for construing the section as to service as contemplating, that service within the five days prior to the day fixed for the hearing was a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the court over the party upon whom the sheriff had failed to make proper service. On the contrary, we think that the provision of section 1119 as to service was simply, as held in Hadley v. Gutridge, supra (58 Ind. 302), directory to the sheriff as to the time within which, and the method whereby, he should make the service; that failure on his part, in either of these particulars, did not oust the court of jurisdiction to further provide for such service, but only precluded the court from proceeding with the hearing against a contestee until service was made upon him by order of the court, and by virtue of the power vested in it to do so under section 1121."

As to the order fixing the time for the hearing of the contest, the situation in the O'Dowd Case was different from what we have here. There the hearing was not continued beyond the 20-day limitation after the time originally set for the trial of the contest. Here, as we have seen, the first order was made on the 15th day of December, 1910, fixing the 28th day of the same month for the date of the contest. It was nearly five months thereafter, to wit, the 19th day of May, 1911, when the order was made for the issuance of the alias writ, and fixing the 31st day of May for the hearing of the contest. Said section 1121 provides that: "The court must meet at the time and place designated, to determine such contested election, and shall have all the powers necessary to the determination thereof. It may adjourn from day to day until such trial is ended and may also continue the trial before its commencement for any time not exceeding twenty days for good cause shown by either party upon affidavit, at the costs of the party applying for such continuance." It is the contention of petitioner that by virtue of this provision the superior court exhausted its jurisdiction to hear the contest, since it was continued for more than 20 days beyond the time originally fixed. It is insisted that proceedings to contest an election are special and summary in their nature, and that this limitation is inconsistent with the exercise of the general discretionary power of granting continuances possessed by courts in ordinary civil actions, and that the expression of the particular modes and time of continuances is exclusive of all not enumerated.

[3] It is to be remembered, however, that, while the proceeding is statutory and summary, and the "provisions" of the statute, as said in the O'Dowd Case, supra, "contemplate a speedy adjustment of the question as to who is legally entitled to an office, but the speedy determination which the Legislature had in view is not to dominate the construction of these provisions, so as to defeat altogether the right to have a contested election settled on its merits, unless such construction is imperative. A determination on its merits is what the statute mainly has in view." We think the same liberal spirit of interpretation which led the Supreme Court to hold that the power in reference to the citation is directory merely should be applied to the section before us, and should lead to a like conclusion. Indeed, we have authority for the position that this section is not mandatory and exclusive, as contended by petitioner. Thomas v. Van Zandt, 56 Wash. 595, 106 Pac. 141; Hagerty v. Conlan, 115 Pac. 762. The former was a decision by the Supreme Court of Washington, but the statutory provisions therein construed are similar to the sections of the law involved herein. We quote from the opinion as follows: "It is contended by learned counsel for respondents in effect that, since the trial court, by its order to show cause of November 25th, set the cause for hearing on December 9th, which to that extent was valid, and no legal process was issued or served, returnable on that day, to bring the respondents into court, therefore the court exhausted its power to thereafter acquire jurisdiction to try the cause. This contention is based upon the assumption that the statute is, in effect, mandatory in requiring the court to enter such order on the day of filing the contest, finally fixing the day of the hearing, and when once made such order cannot be changed or superseded by another order fixing another return day. We are quite unable to agree with this construction of the law. We find nothing in section 1433 which can be construed as rendering it mandatory that the order fixing the return day shall be made upon the day of filing the contest, or within any specified time thereafter; and clearly, if such order made upon that day should for any cause prove futile, that fact could not take away or lessen the power of the court to make an effective order at a later time, fixing another return day."

In the Hagerty Case, supra, the District Court of Appeal of the First district, after citing section 1118 of the Code of Civil Procedure, declared: "Notwithstanding the use of the word 'thereupon' the requirements of this section, with reference to the time of making the order designating a special session of the court, are not mandatory. The word 'thereupon' does not necessarily mean immediately"—citing cases. In that case, on the 24th day of January, 1910, the trial court had made an order "that the motion to dismiss proceedings be and the same is hereby granted, and that judgment of dismissal be entered." From this order an appeal was taken, and the said appellate court, on March 21, 1911, reversed the judgment, and the trial court was directed "to designate another day for a special session of the court; to thereupon issue an alias citation for service upon respondent, and upon a return thereof showing a service in the manner and within the time required by law, to hear and determine the contest." Thus the court held upon appeal that it was not only within the jurisdiction, but the duty, of the lower court to make another order, fixing another date for the hearing of the contest, which order would necessarily be made more than a year after the first order was entered and, indeed, more than a year after a judgment of dismissal of the proceedings had been entered. It is impossible to construe said decision otherwise than as warranting respondent's action herein.

But, viewing one or two of the vital considerations a little more in detail, with the single object of testing the jurisdiction of the court to make the order in controversy, it becomes more manifest that the court below has not transcended the bounds of its judicial authority. If there had been a judgment of dismissal entered, as in the

Hagerty Case, supra, it could probably be maintained that the whole cause had thus been withdrawn from the cognizance of the court, and, as long as such judgment was not suspended or set aside by appeal or otherwise, it would, of course, preclude any further proceeding, unless a new action were brought. Here, however, no disposition was made of the action itself. There was, rather, nonaction on the part of the court, as far as the determination of the cause is concerned. There was no hearing whatever upon the merits, and there was simply an abatement, not of the cause itself, but rather of that particular trial under the original citation. As far as the contest itself is concerned, it is still pending in the lower court. The written statement of the grounds of contest, which may be considered the complaint, is unaffected by any order that has been made, and it still invites the consideration of the court. It is this statement which gives the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. O'Dowd v. Sup. Ct., supra. In the O'Dowd Case, certain decisions to the effect that service on the contestee before the hearing is essential to and a limitation on the jurisdiction of the court to proceed with a hearing of the contest are held not applicable to our practice, for the reason that they involved "the question of jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the contest itself, and not jurisdiction of the person against whom the contest was directed. Under the statutes of our sister states, whose decisions are referred to, an election contest was not inaugurated by filing a petition or statement, and then giving notice; but it was provided that where a contest was contemplated the party contemplating it should, within a given time, serve notice on the contestee of his intention to contest, or his intention to appeal from the findings of an election commission to the courts. The proposed contestants in those cases failed to serve their notice of intention within the time prescribed, and, of course, the court never acquired any jurisdiction of the subject-matter. * * * Under our statutes, however, the superior court in the election proceeding here under consideration had acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the contest, as the statement of contest was filed within the time." Jurisdiction of the subject-matter having thus been acquired, and not having been lost, as far as the record shows, it was within the legal power of the court to appoint another time for the contest, and to proceed to trial, if in the meantime jurisdiction is obtained of the person of the contestee by proper service of the alias citation. Some other minor questions are suggested by counsel, which we deem unnecessary to a determination of the proposition before us.

We are satisfied that the court has jurisdiction to do what it contemplates, and the demurrer is sustained, and the order to show cause is discharged and the writ denied.

1. Criminal Law (§ 1144*)—Appeal—Regularity—Presumptions.

An appeal, in a proceeding under Pen. Code, § 758, from a conviction of defendant of corrupt misconduct in office will be presumed to have been duly taken, in the absence of objection by the people, and on otherwise regular submission of the cause, though the record fails to show that an appeal has been taken.

2. Indictment and Information (§ 125*)—Proceedings Against Public Officers—Accusation—Joinder.

The rule restricting indictments to a single charge does not apply to an accusation under Pen. Code, § 758, charging a municipal officer with corrupt misconduct in office, and such accusation may join more than one specification of misconduct.

3. Extortion (§ 7*)—Acts Constituting.

That accused extorted money from persons soliciting privileges from the city council of which he was a member, or having large claims against the city for local improvements, by soliciting loans from such persons, and that moneys were advanced to him on his unsecured notes unwillingly, to prevent unfavorable official action by him, shows official misconduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extortion, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. Extortion (§ 7*)—Extortion by Public Officers.

It is extortion for a public officer to demand money as a condition to doing his duty, and especially if it is demanded as a condition of allowing a just claim against a public corporation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Proceedings under Penal Code, § 758, against W. T. Shepard, for misconduct in office. From a judgment of conviction, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, for accused. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Geo. F. McNoble, Dist. Atty., and Max Grimm, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. [1] This is a proceeding under section 758 of the Penal Code, instituted by an accusation in writing presented by the grand jury of San Joaquin county, charging W. T. Shepard, a member of the Stockton city council, with corrupt misconduct in office. A trial of the accusation resulted in a conviction of the defendant. A transcript of the record has been filed here which contains no evidence that an appeal has been taken to this court, or to any court, except a stipulation of counsel that it contains a correct copy of a notice of appeal, while in fact no such copy is to be found. We shall assume, however, in the absence of any objection on the part of the people, and in view of an otherwise regular submission of the cause, that an appeal to this court was duly taken in conformity to the decision in the Burleigh Case, 145 Cal. 36, 78 Pac. 242, in which it was held (contrary to my opinion) that an accusation presented under said section 758 is not an indictment, and consequently that the only appeal allowed in this class of cases is that secured by the statute to the defendant. Pen. Code, § 770. Upon this assumption, I shall proceed to consider such of the numerous errors assigned as counsel has attempted to sustain by argument.

[2] 1. The accusation against the defendant contained 15 specifications of misconduct. He demurred to the accusation upon that ground, and as to each specification moved to strike out. His demurrer was overruled, and his motion to strike out sustained as to the specifications Nos. 6 and 13. Upon the remaining 13 he was put to trial. His general objection to the accusation presented by the demurrer is the joinder of distinct charges of misconduct, and this he attempts to sustain by reference to the rule governing indictments. But, as held in the Burleigh Case and in other cases, the rule restricting indictments to a single charge does not apply to this class of accusations, in which more than one specification may be joined.

[3, 4] 2. The more specific objections to the accusation presented by the demurrer, and by the several motions to strike out were, in effect, that the facts alleged did not constitute official misconduct. The various charges were in substance that the defendant had extorted money from parties soliciting franchises or privileges from the council of which he was a member, or having large claims against the city for moneys due or alleged to be due upon contracts for the performance of public works, such as grading, paving, etc. It is charged that he solicited loans of money from these parties while their petitions and claims were pending or accruing, and that moneys were advanced to him on his unsecured notes unwillingly by said parties to prevent unfavorable official action by him. If these allegations were true, we cannot doubt that they constituted official misconduct. To avoid the risk of misstating the contention of counsel for appellant as to this point, we quote from his brief: "As above stated, the defendant was a legislative officer, and his acts to constitute official misconduct must have been committed in the line of his legislative duties and by way of ordinance or resolution, for that was the only method whereby he could act officially." The application of this argument is to the failure of the accusation to charge that defendant voted in favor of any of the claims or petitions of those from whom he received money when, as matter of justice, or to protect the rights and interests of the public, he should have opposed them. But it is extortion for a public official to demand money as a condition of doing what is his duty, as trustee of a public trust, to do, and more especially if it is demanded as a condition of allowing a just claim against a public corporation.

[5-7] 3. It is claimed that the verdict is void for uncertainty. The verdict was as specific as the plea. The accusation was of corrupt misconduct in office with 13 specifications. The plea was simply "not guilty," without any specification, and an unqualified verdict of guilty responds to the plea. It imports a finding of official misconduct and is sufficient to support the judgment of removal. This is a summary proceeding, regulated, as far as it is regulated at all, by a statute (Pen. Code, § 758 et seq.) which the Legislature has plenary power to pass under the authority of section 18 of article 4 of the Constitution, providing for the trial of public officers for misdemeanor in office otherwise than by impeachment. It is exempt from merely technical rules of procedure. Case of Burleigh, supra.

[8] 4. For the same reason, it is no objection to the jurisdiction of the court that the accusation was not formally entitled "People of the State v. Shepard." Undoubtedly it is a criminal action in every essential respect, but it is not governed by the rule applied in Santa Barbara v. Sherman, 61 Cal. 57, which was a prosecution for an ordinary misdemeanor.

5. Nor is the decision in Craig v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 481, 108 Pac. 310, at all in point upon the question of jurisdiction. The opinion in that case carefully and properly distinguishes proceedings to remove firemen and policemen from proceedings to remove elective officers. This case is governed by the decision in Coffey v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 525, 82 Pac. 75.

[9] 6. It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to sustain any of the specifications of misconduct. The record of the proceedings at the trial is very bulky—made unnecessarily so by the repetition of objections and motions to strike out—and the case upon the facts has been very meagerly presented in the printed arguments of counsel. Such examination of the testimony as we have found time to make does not warrant us in holding that the verdict is wholly unsupported by the evidence. The testimony of the defendant, and the testimony of those who advanced him money in the form of loans, is all to the effect that they were bona fide loans, made from motives of friendship, and without any thought of influencing official action; but there were circumstances from which the jury might reasonably have put a more unfavorable construction upon these transactions.

7. There are 36 separate errors assigned upon the rulings of the trial judge admitting or excluding evidence, or striking out or refusing to strike out evidence. Many of these exceptions are based upon legal propositions above discussed and disapproved. With respect to the others, it may be said that the rulings were generally correct, and if in one or two instances they were technically wrong they were harmless.

The judgment is affirmed.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 730 v. SNOWBALL et al. (Sac. 1,831.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 9, 1911.)

In Bank. On petition for rehearing. Rehearing denied.

For opinion in department, see 117 Pac. 905.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing.

The special defense discussed in the last paragraph of the opinion of the court, I think, deserves more consideration than it has received. When a reclamation district includes in its plan of works, and appropriates and uses, a levee originally constructed by the owner of lands within the district, he has an undoubted claim against the district for the value of the levee so appropriated. This is conceded in the case of Reclamation District v. Burger, 122 Cal. 442, 55 Pac. 156, which is cited by the court as sufficient to support the decision here. But the only point there decided was that the commissioners appointed to assess benefits have no jurisdiction to determine the equities between the district and the owner of the levee so appropriated. Because they attempted to do so, their assessment was declared invalid. The effect of this decision was to remit the owners of private levees taken over by reclamation districts to the courts for a remedy, and I know of no reason why the remedy may not be invoked by way of counterclaim in a suit to enforce the lien of an assessment.

According to the statement of the case the value of the levee taken over by the district was due when it was taken, and before the commencement of this action. The district owed the defendant so much, and the defendant owed the district so much. They were counterclaims within the meaning of sections 438, 439, of the Code of Civil Procedure. If they were not the subject of set-off, the reason for denying them that character must be sought elsewhere than in the Burger Case.

In re HOWE'S ESTATE. (L. A. 2,818.)

1. Executors and Administrators (§ 314*)—Distribution of Decedents' Estates—Jurisdiction of Probate Court—"Matters of Probate."

Code Civ. Proc. § 1678, authorizing a court of probate to order distribution of a decedent's estate, though some of the heirs, legatees, or devisees have conveyed their shares, applies only where no question arises on the distribution as to the conveyances having been made; and, where the fact of conveyance is disputed or its validity is in issue, the question is not within probate jurisdiction; "matters of probate" including the determination of the persons succeeding to the estate of a decedent, either as heir, devisee, or legatee, the amount to which each is entitled, and the construction of the will, but not including a determination of claims against heirs or devisees for their portion arising subsequent to decedent's death.

2. Executors and Administrators (§ 314*)—Distribution of Decedents' Estates—Jurisdiction of Probate Court.

Where, in probate proceedings for the distribution of the estate of a decedent, there were conflicting claims to the interest of the surviving husband of decedent, one party claiming under an execution sale of the husband's interest, another claiming as a judgment creditor of the husband, and another claiming under an assignment prior to the execution sale, the court must remit claimants to a court of competent jurisdiction to determine the conflicting claims.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Proceedings for the distribution of the estate of Cora C. Howe, deceased, in which John A. Stanwood and others appeared and asserted conflicting interests in the interest of an heir of the deceased. From a judgment denying relief, John A. Stanwood and others appeal. Affirmed.

Tanner, Taft & Odell, for appellants. Porter & Sutton, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. Edward T. Howe, on July 10, 1908, was appointed administrator of the estate of the deceased, his wife, who died on June 4, 1908, the owner of certain lots of land in Los Angeles county, and leaving as her heirs at law said husband and two children. On September 12, 1908, John A. Stanwood and others, as trustees of the Citizens' Co-operative Company, brought suit against said Edward T. Howe for debt, attached his interest in said lots, obtained judgment against him for $3,382.85, and on execution sale John A. Stanwood purchased the interest of said Howe in the property of said estate for $2,500. On May 21, 1909, the Law Credit Company, a corporation, sued said Howe in the justice's court, obtained a judgment, and on August 6, 1909, filed a transcript thereof in the recorder's office of Los Angeles county. On June 20, 1909, said Howe, as administrator, under order of the superior court, sold the said real estate for something over $15,300, and the sale was confirmed. On May 26, 1910, said Stanwood and the Law Credit Company petitioned the court in the matter of said estate for an order requiring said Howe, as administrator, to file his final account, and prayed that on settlement thereof, an order distributing all the interest in said estate belonging to said Howe, as heir, be distributed to them as his successors in interest, alleging as a basis thereof their actions brought against said Howe, their judgments obtained, and the sale of his interest in the property of deceased to Stanwood, and the lien of the Law Credit Company thereon. On June 10, 1910, said Howe filed his final account as administrator, accompanied by a petition for distribution, and on the same day filed his demurrer and answer to the petition of Stanwood and the Law Credit Company. His demurrer was subsequently overruled. His answer asserted the invalidity of the attachment in the suit by Stanwood and others, as trustees, and the invalidity of the judgment sale on execution; denied that certain real property, the proceeds of which Stanwood asked should be distributed to him, was sold under execution; and denied that the Law Credit Company had ever obtained any lien against said real property. He further set up an assignment, made on April 28, 1909, of all his interest as heir of the deceased to Charles C. Sutton as security for the payment of legal services and advancements made by the firm of Porter & Sutton.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In his final account, as far as its items are pertinent here, he credited himself with $622.75 for services as administrator, and with $805.09 as a portion of his distributive share of the estate paid by him as administrator to himself as heir; both items being credited on September 1, 1909. A balance of $834.41 was shown in the account, to which he claimed he was entitled on distribution as a balance of his distributive share as heir; full payment to the other heirs of their full proportion of the estate being shown in the account. On September 26, 1910, after hearing on the settlement of the account and the petition for distribution and the objections of said Stanwood filed thereto leveled particularly against the items of $622.75, administrator's fees, and $805.09, advancement to himself as heir, for which said Howe asked credit in the settlement of the account, the court made its order and decree in the matter. In the decree the court set forth that said Stanwood claimed the balance of $834.41 in the hands of the administrator, and the $805.09 which the latter sought credit for as an advancement to himself as heir, by virtue of the attachment and sheriff's sale of the interest of said Howe in the property formerly belonging to the estate of said deceased, and that the claim of Stanwood was contested by said Howe and by Messrs. Porter & Sutton; that Stanwood and others, as trustees of the Citizens' Co-operative Company, claimed an interest in or lien upon the $622.75 paid by the administrator to himself as administrator's fees, under a garnishment served on Howe, as administrator, on March 5, 1910, which claim was contested by said Howe and by Messrs. Porter & Sutton; that said Porter & Sutton claimed an interest in all said moneys under an assignment thereof made to them on April 28, 1909, by said Howe, which claim is contested by said Stanwood and others as said trustees. The court then determined that, sitting as a court of probate, it had no jurisdiction to determine the validity of the claims of said Howe, John A. Stanwood, John A. Stanwood and others, as trustees, and Messrs. Porter & Sutton to the interest of said Howe in the estate of his deceased wife, and ordered that the petition of Stanwood praying for the distribution to himself of the interest of said Howe in the estate be dismissed and denied, without prejudice to his right to assert his claim to the moneys remaining in the hands of the administrator in a proper action and in the proper court. The court then ordered that the final account as presented be allowed and approved, "excepting as to the item of $622.75 paid by said administrator to himself as administration fees in the settlement of said estate, on the 1st day of September, 1909, and excepting as to the sum of $805.09 paid by said administrator to himself as an heir, on the 1st day of September, 1909, the amounts of which items are hereby found to be correct; but the right of said administrator to make said payments is not determined because of the conflicting claims thereto of said Edward T. Howe, John A. Stanwood, John A. Stanwood et al., trustees for said Citizens' Co-operative Company, and Messrs. Porter & Sutton; that the payment of $622.75 by said administrator to himself, as commissions on the settlement of said estate, is ratified and approved, subject to the rights, if any, of John A. Stanwood, John A. Stanwood et al., trustees of the Citizens' Co-operative Company, and Messrs. Porter & Sutton; that the sum of $838.41, cash on hand, as shown by said account, and said sum of $805.09, advancement made to said Edward T. Howe, making together the sum of $1,643.50, be, and the same is hereby, distributed to Edward T. Howe, subject to the rights, if any," of all the last-named parties. This appeal is taken by John A. Stanwood and John A. Stanwood and others, as trustees of the Citizens' Co-operative Company, from the said decree settling the account ond ordering distribution.

It is insisted by appellants that the sale of the real property belonging to the estate of Cora C. Howe, deceased, to Stanwood on October 6, 1909, based on the attachment levied on September 12, 1908, transferred and conveyed to Stanwood the interest of Howe as heir in the property of the estate, subject to the payments of the debts thereof, and that the interest of Howe in the estate as of the date of the levy of the attachment and under the execution sale based on it should have been distributed to appellants under section 1678 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that distribution of an estate may be made, although some of the original heirs, legatees, or devisees may have conveyed their shares to other persons, "and such shares must be assigned to the persons holding the same in the same manner as they otherwise would have been to such heirs, legatees or devisees"; that the sale by the sheriff of the interest of Howe in the property of the estate on execution had the same effect as a conveyance made by the judgment debtor, which would have entitled appellants to have had the interest of Howe distributed to them in kind, if the property had not been sold, and though the real property was sold under probate sale still the proceeds were subject to the lien of the attachment and execution, and appellants were entitled to have the share of Howe in such proceeds distributed to them.

But, assuming that the certificate of sale of the interest of Howe in this real property, which is all that appellants held at the time of distribution, was equivalent to a conveyance by the judgment debtor Howe, we do not perceive that appellants were entitled to any other consideration under the decree than the court gave them. The court, sitting as a court of probate, simply refused for want of jurisdiction to determine the disputed and conflicting claims to the interest of Howe between appellants and Howe and Porter & Sutton, remitting the former to a court of competent jurisdiction, where they could assert their rights to the interest of Howe in the estate, and, while settling the accounts of the administrator as to the amounts to which appellants asserted their claims, and ordering distribution to Howe, made such approval and distribution subject to the rights of appellants.

[1] While section 1678, relied on by appellants, authorized the court to distribute the share of "heirs, legatees or devisees" to those who have received conveyances thereof, this section only applies where no question arises on the distribution as to such conveyances having been made. When, however, the fact of conveyance is in dispute, or where its validity or effect is an issue upon the distribution, the determination of that question is not a matter within the probate jurisdiction of the court. As said in Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 354–356, 70 Pac. 459: " 'Matters of probate' include the ascertainment and determination of the persons who succeed to the estate of a decedent, either as heir, devisee, or legatee, as well as the amount or proportion of the estate to which each is entitled, and also the construction or effect to be given to the language of a will, but do not include a determination of claims against the heir or devisee for his portion of the estate arising subsequent to the death of the ancestor, whether such claim arises by virtue of his contract or in invitum; nor is the determination of conflicting claims to the estate of an heir or devisee, or whether he has conveyed or assigned his share of the estate, a 'matter of probate.' "

[2] In the matter at bar, a question of the validity of the attachment proceedings under which appellants claim to have acquired the interest of said Howe in the estate of the deceased was raised, as well as the effect of the execution and transfer of any interest by Howe in the estate, and what portion of the property of the estate in which he had an interest was sold under the execution; it being alleged, as we understand the answer of Howe, that one-half in value of the real property of the estate had been sold under order of sale of the court long before the entry of judgment against him in either the Stanwood suit or the Law Credit Company case, and the rest was not sold under the execution at all; while appellants claim that the interest of Howe in all the real property of the estate was attached and sold under the execution. In addition is the claim by Porter & Sutton of an assignment by Howe to them of all his interest in the estate long prior to the alleged sale under execution. All these matters would necessarily have to be settled, before it could be determined who of the claimants, if any of them, had acquired the interest of Howe in the estate. While these matters might have been of ready solution, the court in a strictly probate proceeding, could not determine them, and properly remitted appellants to a court of competent jurisdiction, wherein, in a proper action, these conflicting claims might be settled, while at the same time by its decree the probate court secured their rights while being asserted as far as it possibly could.

The decree appealed from is affirmed.

1. TAXATION (§ 679*)—TAX SALE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—"HIGHEST BIDDER."

Under Pol. Code, § 3897, which provides that, when the state shall become the owner of property sold for taxes, the tax collector in reselling it shall sell the property to the highest bidder for cash, etc., the term "highest bidder" means the one who will make the highest cash bid for all the property, and not the person who will pay all the tax for the least amount of the land.

When an owner delinquent in taxes has been accorded the constitutional right to due process of law by a publication of a notice of sale to the state, and the state thereunder acquires title to the property, it takes an absolute title to it and may dispose of it in any manner it may choose, subject to the rights given to the delinquent owner to redeem it any time before an actual sale by the state.

Action by the Merchants' Trust Company, as executor of the last will and testament of Edwin R. Fox, against W. S. Wright and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles Lantz, for appellants. L. M. Fall and Webster Davis, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action to quiet title asserted under tax deeds from the state of California issued to plaintiff's intestate. The case was here before on appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendants, and was reversed. Fox v. Wright, 152 Cal. 59, 91 Pac. 1005. Upon a new trial judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

[1, 2] When this case was here before, one of the points urged by the present appellants, then respondents, in support of the judgment in their favor was that section 3897 of the Political Code, which provides that the tax collector in making sales of property by the state which it is required of delinquent taxes "shall sell the property * * * at public auction to the highest bidder," was unconstitutional. His argument was that if section 3897 was to be construed as requiring a sale of the entire property of the delinquent owner to the purchaser who would pay the higest cash price for it, and not as under former statutes, to the person who would pay the tax for the least quantity of the land, then, as the law made no provision for the payment to the former owner of the surplus money over the accrued taxes, charges, and penalties, there was imposed on the delinquent owner an excessive burden for the support of the government in violation of the constitutional provision requiring taxation to be uniform and compelling a person to bear only his proportionate share thereof.

This contention was decided adversely to the then respondents, the court holding that, "when the law speaks of a sale of the 'property,' it means all of the land, and, when it says that the land shall be sold to the 'highest bidder,' it means him who will make the highest cash bid for all the property," and that so construed the section is not unconstitutional, although the law makes no provision for the return to the owner of the property of any excess of the selling price above the accrued taxes, charges, and penalties.

[3] On this present appeal, where they are now the appellants, they make another attack upon this same section 3897, but on a different constitutional ground than urged by them as respondents on the former appeal, and it is the only point they make. Their claim now is that the sale of the entire tract of land when the sale of a smaller portion thereof would be sufficient to enforce the lien of the state is unconstitutional as being a deprivation of a citizen of his property without "due process of law." We do not, however, perceive any more force in this contention than there was to the other constitutional objection to the same section disposed of on the former appeal. In fact, the same reasons which are set forth at length in the opinion above referred to on the former appeal dispose as effectually of this constitutional objection as they did of the other.

That the Legislature may provide for the present system of taxation under which the state acquires title to the property of one who permits the taxes thereon to become delinquent and may authorize a subsequent sale thereof is not open to question. While it is undoubtedly true that a delinquent owner cannot be deprived of his property under such proceedings without due process of law, this due process of law, as far as tax proceedings are concerned, means only that due notice of sale shall be given to the delinquent owner, and this is fully accorded him by sections 3764–3767 of the Political Code, which provide for a notice to him by publication of the sale to the state. This is all the notice he is constitutionally entitled to, and when this is provided for by law, as it is here, he has been accorded the full measure of his constitutional right in that respect. Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234, 90 Pac. 936; Fox v. Wright, supra.

[4] As held in this latter case, when the delinquent owner has been accorded his constitutional right to due process of law by publication of the notice of sale to the state and the state thereunder acquires the property, it takes (save as to the rights given to the delinquent owner to redeem at any time before an actual sale by the state) an absolute title to it, and may dispose of such property in any manner it may choose. These matters as to the nature of the title vested in the state under sale to it for delinquent taxes and its power to dispose of such property are fully considered in the case referred to. While no particular discussion was there had of the precise point as to "due process of law" made now, it was declared that such process consists of the notice provided by law to be given to the delinquent taxpayer of the intended sale of his property to the state. As that notice is provided for and there is no pretense that appellants did not have it and no other attack is made on the validity of the tax proceedings or the manner in which the property formerly owned by them was sold, this appeal presents nothing for further consideration.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Clifton H. Connick, Judge.

Action by J. H. Weaver and another against Theodore H. Howatt. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

G. W. Hunter and Denver Sevier, for appellant. E. W. Wilson, J. H. G. Weaver, and W. F. Clyborne, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs. It was taken less than 60 days after the judgment was rendered, and consequently the evidence is subject to review.

In form, the action is to quiet title to land, but the sole object in the suit is to determine the location of the boundary line between the lands of plaintiffs and the lands of the defendant. All the lands are situated in township 2 S., range 3 E., Humboldt base and meridian. The plaintiffs own the N. ½ of the N. E. ¼ of section 11, and the N. W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼ of section 12. The latter adjoins the eastern end of the first tract. The defendant owns the S. W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 1 and the adjoining S. E. ¼ of the S. E. ¼ of section 2. The north line of sections 11 and 12 forms the north line of plaintiffs' land. The same line, being also the south line of sections 1 and 2, forms the south line of the defendant's land. The location of this common boundary is the point in dispute. The location claimed by plaintiffs is, according to the findings of the court, several chains north of its position as claimed by the defendant. A tract 10 chains wide, north and south, and about 40 chains long, or the full extent of defendant's two tracts, east and west, comprises the disputed territory.

The location of this common section line was fixed by the official survey of the United States, from whom both parties derive title. The court found that the monuments set by the United States surveyors at the common corner of sections 1, 2, 11, and 12, to show the position of this line, have disappeared, and that the original location thereof could not be ascertained. The same finding was made as to the quarter section corners on the line dividing sections 1 and 12 from sections 2 and 11. The north common corner of sections 1 and 2 and the south common corner of sections 11 and 12 were accurately ascertained and located by the government monuments there set. No attempt was made to locate the position of the east and west line in question by reference to monuments set elsewhere thereon, as, for instance, at the northeast corner of section 12 on the range line, or at the northwest corner of section 11. It was apparently agreed that those corners could not be found. The court found, in effect, that the north and south line actually run by the government surveyors between the common corner of sections 11, 12, 13, and 14, and the common corner of sections 1, 2, 35, and 36, cannot be retraced, found, or located on the ground by any of the monuments set thereon, or by any of the natural objects mentioned in the field notes, and that the distances therein given between the natural objects mentioned are not accurate. Having decided that it was impossible to find the actual position of the monument set at the common corner of sections 1, 2, 11, and 12, or the positions of the monuments set at the quarter section corners on this north and south section line, the court concluded that they were "lost corners," and that it must remeasure the whole line, divide it into four equal parts, and set monuments accordingly, without regard to the government survey. This was done, and the portions falling to plaintiffs and defendant, respectively, by this method, were adjudged to them; the result being to take from defendant a large part of the land he claims.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1-3] The propriety of this mode of adjusting boundary lines of United States sections and sectional subdivisions, in a case where the places where the original monuments were set cannot be located on the ground, and the objects referred to in the record of the official survey furnish no means of finding the actual location of the original lines or corners, is not seriously disputed. The defendant's claim is that this is not such a case, and that there were data in the notes and maps from which the court could and should have found and declared the actual position or location of the line in controversy. If this is true, of course the rule for re-establishing lost corners or lines does not apply. Yolo v. Nolan, 144 Cal. 448, 77 Pac. 1006. The decision of the case, therefore, depends on the question whether, from the records of the official survey (that is, the maps and field notes) and the evidence as to the present conditions and positions of natural objects, the position of the line can be lawfully located, and should be fixed at a point more favorable to defendant. The maps and field notes constitute parts of the descriptions in the original patents. Foss v. Johnstone, 158 Cal. 128, 110 Pac. 294, and cases cited. These monuments and objects, so far as they can be located, are controlling, and usually prevail over courses and distances. Code Civ. Proc. § 2077; Kimball v. McKee, 149 Cal. 450, 86 Pac. 1089.

The following map shows approximately the outlines and relative positions of the tracts and some of the important markings, as shown on the map returned with the government survey:

The line upon which the chief dispute arises is the line from A to B on the map, and dividing sections 1 and 12 from sections 2 and 11. The section lines of the official survey were run by S. W. The following is a copy of his field notes of the survey of that line:

The distances given in these notes as those at which the natural objects were reached are all found to be inaccurate. The total length of the line was not 160.50 chains. It was only 151.01 chains, or 9.49 chains short. The distance from the south end, the common corner of sections 11, 12, 13, and 14 to the place marked "begin steep descent," was not 55 chains. It was 56.10 chains. The place marked "enter bottom land" was not a total distance of 93 chains from this corner. It was only 65.42 chains, as the court found, a difference of 27.58 chains. The total distance to the south bank of Eel river was 88.35 chains, not 100.60 chains, as the notes make it, a difference of 12.25 chains. To the north bank of Eel river it was 97.37, not 109.19, a difference of 11.82 chains. From the north boundary of the township south to the north bank of the river was not 51.31 chains, but was 53.64 chains, or 2.33 chains longer.

The creek shown on the official plat as crossing the south line of section 12 east of the southwest corner, and running northerly through the west half of the section, and thence into section 1 and through the defendant's land to Eel river, does not exist as delineated. It could not run along the slope between the point where the steep descent begins and the bottom land, as the notes would have it. The course of the creek that crosses the south line of section 12 is shown on the map attached hereto by the dotted line crossing the west line of section 12 at the place marked "C," a point only 41.60 chains north of the south common corner of sections 11 and 12, and, according to the official measure, 50.25 chains south of the place referred to in the field notes by the words "11.85. A creek 20 lks. wide runs N. W." It is also south of the "steep descent" mentioned in the notes at 55 chains. No such creek as this is mentioned in the field notes of the survey of this line. On the notes of the survey of the south line of section 12, Sonoma creek is mentioned as crossing the line 6.50 chains east of the southwest corner. The government surveyor does not make these official plats. They are prepared in the General Land Office at Washington. U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2395 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1471). It is suggested as a possible explanation, that the draughtsman supposed that the "creek" noted as crossing the line between sections 1 and 2 was the same creek as Sonoma creek crossing the south line of section 12 and delineated it on the plat accordingly. It is clear from the evidence, at all events, that the call for a creek in the field notes on the line of sections 1 and 2 is a false call, and that it should be rejected as a means of locating the division line in question.

sible to locate the exact spot fixed by the official survey as the common corner of sections 1, 2, 11, and 12, in the absence of the monument set to mark it, yet there is ample evidence to show that it was not fixed at or near the place selected by the court, upon its theoretical subdivision of the line. It is not the province of the court to determine where the corner should have been fixed. This is not an action to vacate the government survey. It must be assumed that the line was measured and the monuments set. Their positions as set fix the rights of the parties, regardless of the inaccuracy of the measurements and the errors in distance found in the field notes. The court must ascertain, as near as may be, where this monument was set by the government surveyor. If the exact spot cannot be found, it must, if possible, decide from the data appearing in evidence its approximate position, and the proportional method is to be used only when no other reasonable method is possible, and it must be so used that it does not contradict or conflict with the official data that are not impeached, and which, if not impeached, confine the actual position within certain limits. The application of the proportional method must, in that case, be also confined to the same limits.

The country between the corner of sections 11, 12, 13, and 14 and the place of "steep descent," and also between Eel river and the north township boundary is very hilly and rough. It is stated in the evidence, without contradiction, that the discrepancies in distance between the official survey and the private survey between these points (1.10 chains in the first instance, and 2.33 chains in the other) is not an unusual difference between successive surveys over such ground. The distance of the place where the steep descent begins was therefore stated in the field notes with substantial accuracy. The field notes state that at the common corner there are no trees near, that the soil there is second or third rate, that the land is hilly, that it is on a northwest slope, and that what timber there is near consists of fir, oak, redwood, madrone, and brush or chaparral. They also show that the government surveyor in his progress north arrived at the corner post and monument before he entered the "bottom land." The distance given is apparently wrong, but the natural object—the bottom land—is there, and the field notes describe it as having been encountered after passing north of that corner. The court fixed the corner, not on the slope before reaching the bottom land, nor where the land is hilly, but nearly ten chains into the bottom land, and on practically level land; not in second or third rate soil, but on first-class rich soil; not where the timber is fir, oak, redwood, madrone, brush, and chaparral, as is the case on the slope, but in the midst of a thick forest which is all redwood. It is obvious from these facts that the original corner is not near the place fixed by the judgment. Furthermore, the field notes show that the line between sections 1 and 2 was established by surveying two lines: First, a random line run north to the township line at a point 40 links, or less than 3 feet, east of the old township monument set as the section corner; and, second, by a true line run south from that monument to the south section corner, stated to be 20.60 chains south of Eel river. The true line was, of course, the line officially established. The notes of this survey of the true line show that the surveyor again found the meander posts on Eel river at the same distance from the township line as before, and again found the south section corner, here involved, at the same distance from the river as before, and again noted that it was situated on hilly land, on a slope, in second and third rate soil, that the timber about it was oak, fir, redwood, and madrone, and that it was 20.60 chains south of Eel river.

[5] These natural objects and conditions still exist, and they are all found a considerable distance south of and not at the place in the redwood forest selected by the court. They indubitably show that the court's location is wrong, and that the true corner must be located farther south, where it is not in a redwood forest, nor in first-rate soil, nor in distinctly "bottom land." The distance of 20.60 from the corner to the river may be incorrect. Under the rule established, it must give way, as evidence of location, to the natural objects mentioned in the field notes as descriptive, of the true location, so far as the two conflict. They do describe the actual location with some certainty and within ascertainable limits. The false calls and inaccurate measurements being rejected, those objects referred to which are found to exist must control, so far as they point to or circumscribe the location. The case is, in this respect, very like Chapman v. Polack, 70 Cal. 487, 11 Pac. 764, where a similar conclusion was reached. We cannot determine the place. It is for the trial court, upon all the evidence, to fix the place at a point where it will best accord with the natural objects described in the field notes as being about it, and found to exist on the ground, and which is least inconsistent with the distances mentioned in the notes and plat. It may be that, under all the circumstances, the distance of 20.60 chains, measured from the south bank of Eel river and noted on the plat, affords the most reliable means of ascertaining the approximate position, but as upon a new trial there may be different evidence, we lay down no rule to that effect. Circumstances may be such that distances control, especially where the natural objects do not definitely fix the place, but leave it to be fixed within certain limits. Kimball v. McKee, supra, 149 Cal. 450, 86 Pac. 1089; Code Civ. Proc. § 2077. Other cases supporting our conclusion are Wise v. Burton, 73 Cal. 170, 14 Pac. 678; Whiting v. Gardner, 80 Cal. 80, 22 Pac. 71; Tognazzini v. Morganti, 84 Cal. 161, 23 Pac. 1085; Yolo County v. Nolan, 144 Cal. 449, 77 Pac. 1006; Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Thompson, 117 Cal. 602, 49 Pac. 714; Galbraith v. Shasta I. Co., 143 Cal. 96, 76 Pac. 901.

The judgment is reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Proceedings for the probate of the will of Mary Ashbury Kent, deceased. From a judgment denying probate, and from an order denying a new trial, proponent appeals. Reversed.

Marshall Stimson and Hugh T. Gordon, for appellant. L. M. Chapman and Ward Chapman, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This was a contest of a will before probate, and from a decree refusing its admission to probate and from an order denying the motion of the proponent of the will for a new trial these appeals are prosecuted.

The alleged will does not appear anywhere in the record on appeal, and the only matters concerning its execution or as to its contents are contained in the petition for its probate. It appears from that petition that the deceased died in the county of Los Angeles on August 30, 1904, a resident thereof. She left no property in California, but left a small tract of land in the state of Ohio which by her will she devised to her mother. The will purported to have been executed on August 9, 1904, in Los Angeles county, but no attempt was made to have it admitted to probate until April 10, 1910, nearly six years after her death.

The contest of the will was inaugurated by certain relatives of the deceased, who alleged that, as the Ohio land left by her was ancestral property acquired by deceased from her father, they would, under the laws of Ohio, if deceased had died intestate, take it as her heirs at law, to the exclusion of her mother. The grounds of contest, among others, were that the deceased at the time the alleged will was executed was of unsound mind and incompetent to make it, and that said will was not executed in accordance with the laws of this state in that it was not subscribed by the testatrix nor declared by her to be her last will, nor did the two attesting witnesses, or either of them, sign the same as witnesses thereto at the request of testatrix or in her presence.

On the trial, which was had before the court without a jury, two witnesses were called by proponent. One of these, a physician—Dr. Lewis—who had been called in to see the deceased during her last illness, testified that on or about August 12, 1904, his first visit, her mind was clear and she was perfectly rational, but that on or about August 24, 1904, when he called again, she was not so clear and rational, and was physically weak. The other witness—Dr. E. B. Alexander—was the regularly attending physician of the deceased, had drawn her will, and was one of the witnesses thereto. He was examined solely with reference to the preparation and execution of the will and the circumstances surrounding it.

He testified on direct examination that he had known the deceased during nearly all the time of his residence in Los Angeles, about 18 years; that he was making her a visit one afternoon when Miss Kent (the testatrix) asked him to draw her will for her; that the materials for that purpose were brought; that he sat by her bedside and prepared her will at her dictation; that the only other person present in the room at the time was Miss Bergheer, the attending nurse of the deceased; that after drafting the will the testatrix asked him to sign her name to it for her, saying she was too weak to sign it, and he did so; the testatrix then asked him and Miss Bergheer to sign it as witnesses, which they did, both signing immediately after it was drawn, at the side of the bed occupied by testatrix; that, after the will was signed by himself and Miss Bergheer, he left it with testatrix, and did not see it again until about a month before the trial of the contest. On cross-examination the witness stated that he could not recollect whether testatrix at the time the will was executed made any declaration as to the instrument being her will nor did he remember definitely whether the testatrix asked him and Miss Bergheer to sign it as witnesses, that they were the only ones present when he drafted the will or when it was witnessed, and that she must have asked him and Miss Bergheer to sign it as witnesses or they would not have done so, that the matter did not impress itself upon his memory particularly, and that on account of the length of time that had elapsed since the transaction he had no recollection as to these matters.

At the close of the testimony of this witness the court said: "I do not see that there is any use in taking up any further time with this woman's mental condition. It seems to me that you have not shown any execution of the will unless you have some other witness to prove it." The attorney for proponent responding that he had no further witnesses except on the question of the mental capacity of the testatrix, the court announced its conclusion that under the evidence the will was not entitled to probate and a decree to that effect was entered accordingly. The proponent moved for a new trial on the ground, among others, that the evidence did not justify the decree of the court denying probate, which motion being denied, an appeal from such order of denial, and the judgment are taken.

[1] We are satisfied that the point made by the proponent that the decision of the court denying probate of the will on the evidence adduced was not warranted must be sustained. In other words, that the testimony of Dr. Alexander as a subscribing witness to the will, as it stood when the court practically ordered a nonsuit against the proponent, constituted a sufficient showing of the due execution of the will of the testatrix. It does not appear (because, as we have said, a copy of the will is not in the record) whether it contained an attesting clause such as is usually attached to wills, and the presence of which, when the memory of the attesting witnesses fails, may be resorted to as presumptive evidence that the statutory requirements recited therein to have been performed were complied with, as, for instance, when it recites that the will was signed by the testator in the presence of the attesting witnesses, declared to be her will, and that their signatures to the will as witnesses were signed at the request of the testator in his presence and in the presence of each other. For the purposes of this discussion, it may be assumed that there was no such attesting clause, and that the attesting witnesses simply signed their names thereto without even designating on the instrument that they signed as witnesses.

Considering now the evidence adduced, it is not necessary to go into any elaborate consideration of this matter or to discuss the authorities referred to by the respective counsel in the case arising in other jurisdictions, because the sufficiency of the testimony of Dr. Alexander to sustain the due execution of the will is clearly settled in this state by the case of Estate of Tyler, 121 Cal. 405, 53 Pac. 928, to which doubtless the attention of the trial court had not been directed. This case was the converse of the one before us as to the ruling of the superior court. In the Tyler Case the court held that the due execution of the will was sufficiently proved and the contention on appeal was that the evidence did not sufficiently show it. Here the trial court held that the evidence was insufficient to show due execution and the claim on this appeal is that it did. Yet it will be seen that in the Tyler Case and in this the evidence relied on to prove due execution was practically of the same character, though in some particulars the evidence tending to show due execution of the will in the present case is somewhat stronger than appears in the case referred to.

In the Tyler Case the objections of appellant to the sufficiency of the evidence sustaining the probate of the will were (among others not involved here) that such evidence did not sufficiently show that the testatrix had declared to the subscribing witness that the instrument was her will or that she requested one of the subscribing witnesses—Berger—to sign his name as a witness. Comparing the facts as stated in the Tyler Case with those in this case: There was no attesting clause to the will under consideration in that case. There the signature of the testatrix was proven as so it was proven here. There, there were two subscribing witnesses—Hurd and Berger. At the time of the contest Hurd was dead, and his signature proven. Here the witness Bergheer could not be produced and her signature was proven. Berger, the other subscribing witness to the will, was called as a witness in the Tyler Case. He remembered signing the will and swore to his signature, but he had no definite recollection of certain things which occurred at the time he attested the will. He could not remember whether the testatrix actually signed the instrument or verbally acknowledged her signature to it in his presence, or whether she declared the document to be her will in the presence of the attesting witnesses, or whether she requested him to sign as an attesting witness. He did not testify, however, that these things were not done, nor was there any evidence impeaching the execution of the will or to throw upon it the shadow of any kind of suspicion. Here Alexander necessarily remembered the signature of the testatrix because he wrote her name at her request, and, like Berger, he did not remember whether she published the will or requested him to sign it as a witness. But neither did Berger in the Tyler Case nor Alexander here testify that these things had not been done; nor was there any evidence impeaching the execution of the will involved here or to throw upon it the shadow of any kind of suspicion. Having stated the further fact that Berger was called as a witness a dozen years after the making of the will, the court in the Tyler Case then discusses the rule which must govern when the question of the due execution of a will is presented under such evidence. It says: "Appellants contend that the will must fall merely because the memory of the witness failed. The court held that as one attesting witness was dead and the other unable to recollect, as above stated, and as there was no evidence tending in any way to invalidate the will, proof of the signatures of the testatrix and the attesting witnesses was, under the circumstances described, sufficient to establish the due execution of the instrument. We see no valid reason for disturbing this conclusion. * * * It is our view, both upon reason and authority, that the finding of the trial court that the will was duly executed is beyond disturbance here. While the Code provides that certain things are necessary to the making of a valid will, it does not prescribe how those things shall be proven. It leaves that to the general rules of evidence. There is provision, it is true, that if the attesting witnesses are alive and present in the county, they must, in the event of a contest, be called. This is a very natural and just provision; for in such case the failure of the proponent of a will to call his attesting witnesses would be a very suspicious circumstance. But there is no statutory declaration, and no principle of law, to the effect that a will executed in due form shall go for naught unless an attesting witness after the lapse of many years shall continue to recollect anything material that occurred at the time he subscribed his name to it. Such a rule would make the validity of the will dependent, not upon the disposing mind of the testator, nor his freedom from duress, undue influence, or fraud, nor upon his clear expression of his intention in the body of the instrument, nor upon its execution in conformity to the form and ceremony prescribed by the statute; but upon the fullness, accuracy, and persistency of the recollection of one of the persons who signed it as a witness. Such a rule cannot be maintained either upon principle or precedent. What constitutes a sufficient execution of a will is prescribed by the statute. What constitutes sufficient proof of such execution is not so prescribed, and is a different question —a question to be solved by the general principles of evidence. In the case at bar there was no person other than Berger present at the making of the will, who was capable of testifying, at the time of the trial, to its execution. * * * The fact that the instrument was signed by the testator and the attesting witnesses was proven. There was no evidence tending to disprove the proper execution of the will, or to impeach it in any way. These are the facts of the case; and it is not necessary for the purposes of this decision to go beyond them. We are satisfied that upon these facts the court was warranted in holding the will duly executed. Where an attesting witness has no recollection as to certain matters connected with the making of the will, the case is, upon principle, in the same condition as where he is dead, insane, or absent; and in such case 'proof of the handwriting of the testator and of the subscribing witnesses, or any of them, may be admitted as evidence of the execution' (Code Civ. Proc. § 1315); and such evidence is sufficient in the absence of any countershowing to prove the execution."

[2] The court then proceeds to refer to and discuss authorities (text and adjudications) abundantly sustaining the principle that where a will shows compliance with other provisions of the law which must appear upon its face—that is, it purports to be signed by the testatrix and witnessed—upon proof of the fact of such execution it will be presumed on the death of the witnesses to the will being shown, or on the failure of their memory, that all the other details of the statute, proof of which depends upon the recollection of the witnesses, were duly observed.

Appellant as one of his grounds for a new trial set up newly discovered evidence. He made a clear showing that he had used extreme diligence in endeavoring to discover the whereabouts of the other subscribing witness to the will—Miss Bergheer—and was unable to find her until after the judgment of the court denying probate of the will was entered. He discovered her in Seattle and obtained an affidavit from her that she would testify that in the execution of the will to which she was a witness that all the statutory requirements had been complied with. In view, however, of the conclusion that we have reached that the evidence of Dr. Alexander, as the case stood when the court of its own motion nonsuited appellant, was sufficient of itself to show due execution of her will by testatrix and hence a new trial must be ordered, it is unnecessary to discuss the matter of the newly discovered evidence as a further alleged ground why appellant should have been granted a new trial.

Some points of practice as to the validity of the appeal taken by appellant are raised on this hearing, but we consider them without merit.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

HIBERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOCIETY (UNRUH, Intervener) v. DORAN.

(S. F. 5,826.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 9, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 634*)—RECORD—DEFECTS—AFFIRMANCE.

A party appealing from an order determined in part by affidavits must, to perfect his appeal, follow the method prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c, and file a request for the transcript of the testimony, with a bond, and the court must require a transcript of the reporter's notes, which transcript must consist of copies of the affidavits, the rulings of the court, and any other evidence taken at the hearing; or he must have the papers and evidence used on the hearing authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, as provided by Supreme Court rule 29 (78 Pac. xii); and where neither method is pursued, but jurisdiction is vested by the notice of appeal, the order must be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2775; Dec. Dig. § 634.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 797*)—DISMISSAL—MOTION.

Though ordinarily the Supreme Court on appeal will not entertain a motion to dismiss involving an examination of the record in advance of a hearing on the merits, yet, where a mere inspection of the record shows, that no relief can be given to appellant, the motion will be decided and the appeal dismissed, or the order or judgment affirmed for want of record.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society against W. J. Doran, in which H. A. Unruh, Executor of E. J. Baldwin, deceased, intervened. From an order denying a motion for change of place of trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. V. McClure, for appellant. Tobin & Tobin, Bradner W. Lee, and F. S. Brittain, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal taken from an order denying defendant's motion for change of place of trial. Attempting to appeal under the new method, defendant gave the clerk of the trial court the notice contemplated by section 941a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, seemingly under the belief that nothing further was required of him, did no more. The clerk of the trial court prepared a purported transcript for the use of this court, and certified thereto that it contained "true and correct copies as the same are on file in my office of the following papers and pleadings in the above-entitled action." The subjoined list of papers and pleadings contained notices of motion and affidavits.

[1] This being an appeal from an order heard and determined, at least in part, upon affidavits, to perfect it, it became necessary for appellant to follow either the method prescribed by sections 953a, 953b, and 953c, of the Code of Civil Procedure, or the method prescribed by rule 29 of this court (78 Pac. xii). But appellant did neither. Treating the attempted appeal as one taken after trial, by authority of section 953a, it became appellant's duty, in addition to giving the notice prescribed by 941b, to file his request for a transcript of the "testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received," etc., as prescribed by 953a, with the undertaking contemplated by 953b. Thereupon it would have become the duty of the court to require a transcript of the reporter's notes taken at the "trial." In the case of an appeal from an order such as this, this transcript would have consisted of copies of the affidavits, the rulings of the court, and any other evidence taken at the hearing. It would there have become the duty of the judge to examine the transcript, and, satisfying himself of its correctness, so to have certified. But, as has been said, appellant in this case took no one of these initiatory steps, either by filing his request or his undertaking. As little did he comply with the second method outlined by rule 29 of this court. For, admittedly, there is in this record no authenticated bill of exceptions, and, indeed, no bill of exceptions at all. Appellant, therefore, having pursued neither method to perfect his appeal, it results that that appeal stands here upon a record making it impossible for the court to review the order appealed from.

[2] It is a rule of convenience for the expedition of the business of this court that it will not ordinarily entertain a motion to dismiss involving an examination of the record in advance of the hearing upon the merits. But where, as in this case, a mere inspection of the record discloses that no relief can be given to the appellant, this court will consider the question, to save unnecessary delay and expense to litigants. Ordinarily it can matter little whether the form of the order made in the premises be one of dismissal, or one of affirmance for lack of proper record. In the present case, however, jurisdiction over the appeal having been vested under the new system by the notice given by appellant to the clerk, the proper order would be one of affirmance of the order upon appeal for lack of record showing error.

It is ordered accordingly.

ALLEN v. HANCE, City Treasurer (HUBER, Intervener). (L. A. 2,687.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 13, 1911.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 538*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENT — WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS—FINDINGS.

In a suit to restrain the foreclosure of a street assessment, evidence held to sustain findings that a waiver of objections executed by plaintiff and her husband related to a defect in the contract according to the law as previously defined in a particular case by the Supreme Court, and that the work had been completed in accordance with the specifications and ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 538.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 488, 489*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—LIEN—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER—INDEPENDENT SURVEY.

Where plaintiff expressly waived any right to refuse to pay an assessment lien, under a recent case decided by the Supreme Court, if an independent survey should demonstrate that the work was constructed on the grade established by the ordinance fixing the grade of the street, etc., such waiver did not require that a "joint" independent survey be made at the instance of both parties; and hence plaintiff, by paying prior installments on the improvement bond, and by failing to offer any evidence of error in an independent survey subsequently made, waived any right she originally had to participate in such survey.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 488, 489*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS — CONTRACT—PUBLIC POLICY.

Where a street improvement contract was held invalid because the specifications contained the provision that all loss or damage arising from the nature of the work should be sustained by the contractor, such holding did not involve public policy, but was for the benefit of the property owner; and hence he could waive the right to rely on such objection, as provided by Civ. Code, § 3268.

4. ESTOPPEL (§§ 12, 52*)—JUDGMENT (§ 634*) —DEFINITION.

An estoppel, whether resting in judgment, deed, contract, or in pais, means only that a man is forbidden to show the existence of a fact where, by his past conduct, declarations, agreement, deed, or judgment, it would work an injustice and an injury to his adversary to permit him to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 121-127; Dec. Dig. §§ 12, 52;* Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1150; Dec. Dig. § 634.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 488, 489*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENT — ESTOPPEL—LIEN.

That the levy of a street assessment for improvements creates a lien on the property assessed, and not a personal liability against the owner, does not prevent the operation of an estoppel against the owner, preventing him from showing that there had not been a strict compliance with the statute.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Mary W. Allen against C. H. Hance, Los Angeles City Treasurer, and Mrs. I. B. Huber, Intervener. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Morris, for appellant. Edward Judson Brown, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by plaintiff against defendant, the treasurer of the city of Los Angeles, to restrain the sale of plaintiff's property in the foreclosure of a lien for certain street assessment work.

The city of Los Angeles had entered into a contract with one Whittier for the performance of certain street work on Pasadena avenue. The specifications for the work contained the following clause: "All loss or damage arising from the nature of the work to be done under this agreement * * * shall be sustained by the contractor." The firm of Tryon-Brain Company succeeded to Whittier's rights and obligations under the contract, and were proceeding with the work. When it was more than half completed, the contractors became aware of the decision of this court in Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 662, 67 Pac. 1061, 57 L. R. A. 213, which held that the clause in the specifications above quoted rendered the proceeding void. Tryon-Brain Company then prepared and presented to the owners of the property affected by the street work an agreement whereby, in consideration of their completing the work in a good and workmanlike manner, the property owner waived "any and all objection in law which he may have or be entitled to make to the legality or validity of the assessment for said improvement, or the legality or validity of any street improvement bond that shall be issued to represent the cost thereof"; the waiver applying to and binding the executors, administrators, grantees, and assigns. Mr. Tryon, of the Tryon-Brain Company, presented this waiver to plaintiff and her husband, explaining the purport of it, and explaining that his corporation feared the effect of the decision in Blochman v. Spreckels, and was unwilling to expend more money on the unfinished work, saving under this assurance from the property owners. Plaintiff's husband then retired to an adjoining room, and wrote the specific waiver which follows; it being signed both by himself and his wife, plaintiff herein: "I am unwilling to waive any question dependent upon the acceptance of the street supt. or counsel but if an independent survey shall demonstrate that the work from Ave. 48 to Ave. 50 is constructed upon the grade established by the ordinance fixing the grade of the street, I am willing to waive any right involved in the recent case decided by the Supreme Court, the San Diego case.—Nothing here being construed as a waiver of damage to our property on account of injury to the property by the change of grade, by ordinance or otherwise." This waiver was recorded with the others. The contractors finished the work according to the specifications; it was duly accepted by the street superintendent; and the bond on plaintiff's property for the amount of the assessment thereon was duly issued. Plaintiff made no objection to the issuance of the bond, and never demanded the survey contemplated by the waiver, and paid the installments on the bond as they became due from January, 1904, to January, 1908, without protest. In February, 1905, the bond was purchased by Mrs. I. B. Huber, intervener herein, and she received the payments made after that date until January 2, 1908, when plaintiff refused to make further payments. Such was the situation until August, 1908, when the intervener, still the owner of the bond, requested the city treasurer to advertise the property for sale to satisfy the bond. The plaintiff then instituted against the city treasurer this action to restrain him from making the sale. The intervener caused a survey to be made, which established the fact that the work had been done according to the grade fixed by the ordinance, and this and other matters were pleaded both in the answer of the treasurer and in the complaint in intervention filed by the intervener. The answer and the complaint in intervention thus pleaded waiver and estoppel by contract. The findings of the court are outlined in the above statement of facts. As conclusion of law, it found that plaintiff was estopped by contract, and judgment was rendered accordingly. From this judgment, plaintiff appeals.

[1] It is contended that the finding to the effect that the case of Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 662, 67 Pac. 1061, 57 L. R. A. 213, was the case meant by plaintiff's language in waiving "any right involved in the recent case decided by the Supreme Court, the San Diego case" is unsupported by the evidence. Upon this subject plaintiff's case rests wholly upon the testimony of Mrs. Allen, the plaintiff. Her testimony does not negative the finding. She admits her signature to the waiver, and her husband's and that the handwriting of the waiver is her husband's but further than that her recollection fails to go. The admission of her attorney is: "She signed it. She is bound by it. What more?" The testimony of Mr. Tryon for the defendant and intervener, however, established without contradiction that he presented the waiver to Judge Allen, husband of plaintiff, explained the fear he felt as to the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Blochman-Spreckels Case (which was a case arising in San Diego county), and that after this explanation Judge Allen himself wrote the waiver above quoted, signed it himself, and procured his wife to sign it. The finding is therefore clearly supported.

The same is true of another finding of the court which is here attacked—the finding to the effect that the work had been completed in accordance with the specifications and ordinance. Indeed, it can hardly be said that there is an issue upon this proposition, since plaintiff's complaint alleges that it was under the contract and specifications in her complaint set forth, and under no other contract or specifications, that the contractors performed and completed the street inprovement work. There is no denial of this in either the answer or in the complaint in intervention, but both contain averments to the same effect. Moreover, the issuance of the bond afforded prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings, the acceptance of the work, and, consequently, that it was done according to the specifications. Statute 1899, p. 43. And, finally, the whole course of conduct of plaintiff's attorney under defendant's offer to prove in detail the performance of the work in accordance with the plans and specifications amounted to a specific waiver of any more formal proof than was actually made at the trial. Thus, says plaintiff's attorney, when offer of proof on this matter was made: "I have got my idea of it. They assert, and we deny. I don't know of any better way of their proving it than to prove the city accepted it. I think that is all the proof that is absolutely necessary." This invited proof was made.

[2] The third objection of the plaintiff is that, treating the waiver as valid, there was a noncompliance with its terms which relieves her from the enforcement of it. This noncompliance, it is urged, comes from the fact that the "independent survey" which demonstrated that the work was constructed upon the grade estabished by the ordinance was not made by the parties jointly. But to this it must be answered that plaintiff's waiver does not in terms declare that a joint independent survey be made at the instance of both parties, and, whatever may have been her original right to participate in the making of such a survey, she waived it by her acquiescence in the issuance of and the payment of the installments upon the bond, and, when proof of the independent survey made by the intervener was offered to establish the true grade, by her failure even then to establish its error.

[3] Appellant argues that under the authority of Blochman v. Spreckels the assessment was void as against public policy, and that such being the case a waiver of the right to assert this is itself invalid. But in this appellant errs. It was not upon the ground of public policy that the specifications, such as those considered in Blochman v. Spreckels, were held to invalidate the contract. It was because they were in violation of and not authorized by the statute, and because the effect of permitting them might be illegally to increase the burden upon the property owner; but this determination was one for the protection and benefit of the property owner, and one which, therefore, he could waive. Civ. Code, § 3268.

[4] The last contention of appellant is that she was not estopped, because, "there being no personal liability, the doctrine of estoppel in pais has no application." Waiving the fact that the estoppel in this case is founded on contract, and does not rest in pais, it must be conceded that appellant's position finds support in the language of Heft v. Payne, 97 Cal. 108, 31 Pac. 844. There the asserted estoppel was in pais. In an action to enforce a street assessment lien for work that had been completed after the time fixed for its performance, it was alleged that the defendant owner had expressly waived all objections which he might have by reason of the failure of the contractors to complete the work within the time fixed, and that he had stated that all he wanted was a completion of the improvement to the satisfaction of the council, and when that was accomplished no further objections would be made, and the assessment for the work would be paid; that, relying upon this, the council set aside the assessment and warrant, and ordered further work to be done, and that the contractor, relying upon the good faith of the promises, proceeded with the work and completed it to the satisfaction of the proper officers. Upon this statement, it is said by this court in department: "It is contended that the defendant is estopped by his representations and promises from claiming that the work was not done within the time required. But this is an action purely to foreclose a lien on the land for the cost of a public improvement. There is no personal liability, and under such proceedings the doctrine of estoppel in pais has no application. Meuser v. Risdon, 36 Cal. 239." A reading of Meuser v. Risdon, cited as the sole support for the doctrine thus announced, will disclose not only that it does not support the doctrine, but contains nothing in reference to it. In Meuser v. Risdon, the contractor had failed to perform the work, and it became necessary to relet the contract for it. The clerk of the board of supervisors, without authority from the board (even if such authority could be vested in him), undertook so to relet the contract. This court held under that state of facts, in an effort to collect the assessment for the work, that the reletting of the contract was a separate and independent proceeding, that the board of supervisors could not transfer its duties and powers to call for bids to the clerk, and that the board of supervisors had not the power to ratify the invalid act of its clerk under the circumstances, so as to give validity to these invalid proceedings. It would seem that the learned author of the opinion in Heft v. Payne, supra, must have read Meuser v. Risdon as meaning a ratification by the property owner, for only upon the theory of such ratification could the doctrine of waiver or estoppel have any application. But in Meuser v. Risdon it was not contended that the property owner had by silence or by speech, or by action or inaction, done anything in the nature of waiver, ratification, or assent. The language in Heft v. Payne, therefore, stands absolutely without support in the authority cited to uphold it. In Union Paving Co. v. McGovern, 127 Cal. 638, 60 Pac. 169, language similar to that in Heft v. Payne is used as follows: "In an action to foreclose a lien upon land for the cost of a public improvement in which there is no personal liability, and where the proceedings are purely statutory, and the lien exists by virtue of a strict compliance with the provisions of the statute, the doctrine of estoppel in pais has no application." The sole authority adduced in support of this declaration is Heft v. Payne. We think it will be found impossible to sustain these declarations, either in reason or by authority. Whatever of the varying definitions of an estoppel may be accepted, they differ not at all in the one essential, namely, that by an estoppel a man is precluded from pleading or proving the truth, because, in the language of Coke (Coke on Lit. 352a), "a man's owne act or acceptance stoppeth or closeth up his mouth to allege or plead the truth." Whatever may have worked the estoppel, whether the estoppel rests in judgment, deed, contract, or in pais, in its essence it amounts to but this: That a man is forbidden to show the existence of a fact because, by his past conduct, his declarations, his agreement, his deed, or a judgment, it would work an injustice and an injury to his adversary to permit him to do so.

[5] The fact that in street assessment cases there is a lien upon property, and not a personal liability, has no bearing upon the question of an estoppel, whether arising in pais or by any other recognized method. One may estop himself from denying the existence of a lien upon his property as well as he may estop himself from denying a personal liability; and, while it is true that in street assessment cases the lien exists only by virtue of a strict compliance with the provisions of the statute, if a property owner has estopped himself from showing that there has not been a strict compliance with the statute, then as to his property there has been such strict compliance, and the lien exists. The declarations above quoted in Heft v. Payne and Union Paving Co. v. McGovern must therefore be overruled, and, indeed, they have been overruled, though tacitly, in the later decision of this court in Cummings v. Kearney, 141 Cal. 156, 74 Pac. 759, where the doctrine that estoppel, even in pais may be successfully invoked against the owner of property in the case of a street assessment is recognized and approved by this court in bank. But that elsewhere the rule is universally recognized may be seen from a reading of 2 Elliott's Roads and Streets, § 731, and in the note to the section, where a very great number of cases are collated.

It follows, therefore, that the court was correct in its conclusion that plaintiff had estopped herself by her written waiver of her contract, and the judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

WILLIS v. LAURIDSON et al. (Sac. 1,857.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 9, 1911. Rehearing Denied Nov. 8, 1911.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 144*) — PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—VERIFIED COMPLAINT.

Where injunctive relief is sought by a verified complaint, the complaint takes the place of an affidavit, and the facts stated therein must stand the same test as oral testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 316, 317, 321; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 144*) — PLEADING — COMPLAINT AS EVIDENCE—VERIFIED COMPLAINT.

Averments in a verified complaint upon which an injunction is sought which are mere conclusions of law are not competent as evidence, though they might be sufficient as a matter of pleading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 316, 317, 321; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

3. INJUNCTION (§ 118*) — SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

Unless conclusions of law alleged in a verified complaint praying an injunction are supported by allegations of fact, the complaint is insufficient to support an injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 223–242; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 283*)—DIRECTORS—ELECTION.

Failure to file with the county clerk until 1909 corporate by-laws adopted in 1900, making the number of directors 11 instead of the 7 provided for in the articles of incorporation, pursuant to St. 1895, p. 221, as amended in 1905 (Civ. Code, § 653c), would not invalidate the by-laws so as to make the election of additional directors thereunder on January 14, 1909, as provided by statute, illegal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 101*)—ISSUANCE OF CERTIFICATES—FRAUDULENT ISSUE—REMEDY OF STOCKHOLDER.

Notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 653c, providing that no member of a co-operative business association can have or acquire a greater interest therein than any other member, the issuance to a member of more than one share would not constitute fraud authorizing an injunction prohibiting the issuance of certificates at the suit of a member, where the member receiving the several shares assigns his excess shares to persons qualified to hold them before attempting to benefit by the excess issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 450, 451; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 155*) — DIVIDENDS—AUTHORITY TO COLLECT.

That authority from the holders of certificates in a co-operative business association to collect dividends is not on file does not imply that no such authority was given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

7. CORPORATIONS (§ 155*)—DIVIDENDS—DISPOSITION.

The bona fide holder of a certificate in a co-operative business association has the right to dispose of his dividends.

8. CORPORATIONS (§ 189*)—CERTIFICATES—WRONGFUL ISSUANCE—REMEDIES OF STOCKHOLDER.

An allegation of the complaint in a suit by a member of a co-operative business association for an injunction to prevent the recognition of the validity of membership certificates issued that a certain certificate was issued to a member who was under the age of 18 years, when the statute fixes the minimum age of members at 18, was not sufficient to authorize the injunction, since such member might have been 18 years of age when the suit was brought, and also for want of a showing that she ever claimed any rights under the certificate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

9. CORPORATIONS (§ 189*) — CERTIFICATES OF MEMBERSHIP — WRONGFUL ISSUANCE — INJUNCTION—RIGHT OF ACTION.

The complaint in an action to enjoin a co-operative business association from recognizing the validity of certain membership certificates alleged that the dividends paid on account of a certain certificate were paid to the mother-in-law of one of defendants, when there was nothing on file authorizing her to receive the dividends. Held, that the allegation did not authorize an injunction, since the mere payment of dividends to defendant's mother-in-law would not be ground therefor, and authority to receive the dividends might have been subsequently filed or the receipt ratified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

10. CORPORATIONS (§ 101*)—ISSUANCE OF CERTIFICATES—SIGNING BY-LAWS.

That the name of a holder of a certificate in a co-operative business association was signed to the by-laws by another was not fraud authorizing an injunction inhibiting the recognition of the validity of such certificate, if her name was signed by authority of the holder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

11. CORPORATIONS (§ 56*)—BY-LAWS—AMENDMENTS.

If the by-laws of a co-operative business association permitted their amendment by the written consent of two-thirds of the members filed with the secretary, the directors could not adopt by-laws without such consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 152; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

12. CORPORATIONS (§ 189*)—STOCKHOLDERS—RIGHTS OF STOCKHOLDERS — ACTIONS—ALLEGATIONS OF COMPLAINT.

Complaint in a suit against a co-operative business association and certain stockholders and directors held not to state facts authorizing an injunction forbidding the recognition of the validity of certain membership certificates, the adoption of by-laws, payment of dividends, and the election of an increased number of directors, on the ground that certain stockholders desired to do such acts to fraudulently procure control of the association.

13. CORPORATIONS (§ 189*)—STOCKHOLDERS—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER—PARTIES.

All of the stockholders of a co-operative business association should be represented in an action by one of them against the corporation and certain officers and stockholders to enjoin the recognition of the validity of certain certificates, the adoption of by-laws by the directors, the payment of dividends on such certificates, and the election of an increased number of directors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

14. INJUNCTION (§ 118*) — SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

A complaint for an injunction is bad if it does not state facts sufficient to determine how plaintiff's property will be permanently injured by the acts complained of, but merely states general conclusions as to irreparable injury, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-242; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

15. INJUNCTION (§ 9*)—RIGHT.

To authorize an injunction, the right thereto should be clear, and the alleged injury be imminent, and such that it can only be avoided by the injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Suit for injunction by Frank Willis against N. A. Lauridson and others. From a decree for plaintiff, a part of defendants appealed to the District Court of Appeal, whence the cause was certified to the Supreme Court upon disagreement of the justices of the District Court of Appeal. Reversed, with directions to vacate injunction.

Grove L. Johnson and Wahrhaftig & Shinn, for appellants. F. F. Atkinson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. By reason of the disagreement of the justices of the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District, the above-entitled cause was certified to this court.

In the District Court of Appeal, Chipman, J., prepared the following opinion, which, meeting the views of this court, is hereby adopted, and, for the reasons in that opinion given, the order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant defendants' motion to vacate the injunction:

"A temporary injunction was granted upon plaintiff's verified complaint. Defendants, other than Lauridson and Barry, moved to dissolve the injunction on the grounds (1) that the facts alleged are insufficient to constitute a cause for an injunction; (2) that the court had no jurisdiction to issue said injunction; (3) that said injunction suspends the general and ordinary business of a corporation, and the same was granted without notice.

"The complaint, which is the basis of the order, is composed of 28 paragraphs, and, with its exhibits, embraces 360 odd folios. It is not possible to present a satisfactory analysis or fairly comprehensive statement of its material averments in a brief compass. Before examining the complaint, it may be well to state some established rules of law which must govern us in determining its sufficiency as a basis for the extraordinary remedy of injunction.

[1] "Where the verified complaint is the basis for the relief sought, it takes the place of an affidavit and must be treated as such; and the facts so stated must stand the test to which oral testimony would be subjected.

[2] "Averments which are but conclusions of law are not competent testimony, though they might stand as matter of pleading.

[3] "Unless the statement in the nature of a conclusion is supported by the facts or circumstances on which it rests, it is insufficient to sustain an application for injunction. If the complaint, otherwise unsupported, is open to attack on general demurrer, it is insufficient. Howard v. Eddy, 56 Kan. 498, 43 Pac. 1133; State v. Parsons, 77 Kan. 774, 95 Pac. 391; 22 Cyc. 941. The action is brought by plaintiff, as a stockholder, in his own right alone and in the interest of no others. The defendants are the association in its corporate capacity, and certain 11 alleged stockholders. It is averred that the association filed its articles of incorporation with the county clerk on December 10, 1900, and filed the same with the Secretary of State; that its objects are set forth in said articles, a copy of which is attached to the complaint as Exhibit A; that, among other things, said articles provide that the number of directors shall consist of seven members and shareholders of the association; that on the ——— day of December, 1900, the association, and the members thereof, purported to adopt a code of by-laws for its government, which was never filed in the office of the county clerk until about September 3, 1909, when it was so filed, a copy of which is attached to the complaint as Exhibit B; that said by-laws provided that the number of directors should consist of 11 members; that on January 14, 1909, the members of the association met and voted for and purported to elect the defendants, other than defendant the association and defendant Chappell, as directors, and that said Chappell claims to have been elected a director about the ——— day of November, 1909, and is now acting as such; that no other persons have been elected directors, since said January 14th, except as before alleged, and ever since said date said defendants have purported to act as such directors and have managed the affairs of said association; that the said articles provide for the selection of seven directors, and no more, and said articles have never been amended but are as set forth in Exhibit A; that said code of by-laws is not a legal code of by-laws. It is then alleged that defendant Reed, 'for the purpose of carrying out his fraudulent intention to control the management and operation of the said defendant association, on or about the 9th day of December, 1909, caused to be filed' with the county clerk 'the purported by-laws claimed to have been adopted by said alleged board of directors, * * * so controlled by the said defendant Reed, as herein alleged,' a copy of which is attached to the complaint as Exhibit D; and 'the said by-laws were never adopted at any regular or any meeting of the said alleged board of directors, * * * and the said by-laws * * * are not legal by-laws of said association;' that, under the law by which said association was incorporated, and under its articles, no member can hold more than one share of the stock, and no person can become a member who is under the age of 18 years.

[4] "To this point the only averment of any irregularity is that the by-laws adopted in 1900 were not filed with the county clerk until 1909. By these by-laws it was provided that there shall be eleven directors, whereas the articles provided for seven. The statute of 1895 (Stats. 1895, p. 221) also amended in 1905 (C. C. § 653e) requires the association, within 40 days after it becomes an association, to adopt a code of by-laws, and a copy must be filed with the county clerk, but no time is prescribed within which this must be done. It then appears that under said by-laws the persons named as defendants were on January 14, 1909, elected as directors of the association, and have since managed its affairs. The statute authorizes the association by its by-laws to provide for the number of directors (C. C. § 653e); and the directors were chosen as thus provided, and have since been and are now acting as such. They were therefore legally chosen, and the failure to file a copy of the by-laws with the county clerk until in 1909 does not invalidate their selection, nor does it render the by-laws void or illegal. Under the existing by-laws the members had a right to elect 11 directors.

"The by-laws (Exhibit D) do not differ materially from the by-laws first adopted and on their face appear to have been 'duly adopted by the written consent of a majority of the members of said association, filed with the secretary thereof.' They were therefore legal by-laws, and the averment that defendant Reed, 'for the purpose of carrying out his fraudulent intention to control the management and operation of the said defendant association, on or about the 9th day of December, 1909, caused to be filed' the said by-laws, shows no fraud or attempted fraud on his part.

[5] "It is then alleged that certificates of membership Nos. 91, 92, 93, and 94 were issued to one Josephine Keith, and that she assigned Nos. 92, 93, and 94 to three different persons, and hence they were never legally issued by said association. The statute provides that 'the rights and interest of all members are equal, and no member can have or acquire a greater interest therein than any other member has.' C. C. § 653c. We see no evidence of fraud in issuing to one person more than one share where that person, before attempting to benefit by such issue, assigns his excess shares to persons qualified to hold the shares. There is no averment that the issuing of the shares to Josephine Keith and her subsequent assignment of three of them was done with any fraudulent intent, or that the assignees were not qualified to hold the shares.

"It is next averred that certificate No. 59 was issued to one S. E. May and certificate No. 64 was issued to one Sam May, and 'that plaintiff is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief alleges, that the said S. E. May and the said Sam May are one and the same person, and upon such information and belief alleges that certificate of membership No. 64 in said defendant association in the name of Sam May has been illegally issued.'

"There is no averment of fraudulent intent in the alleged irregular issue, or that there has been or is intended any illegal use of the certificate No. 64.

"It is next alleged that certificates 72, 73, 74, and 75 appear separately in the names of Aliace Lawson, Frank Lawson, Margaret Lawson, and Leahe Lawson, and it is alleged on information and belief that said persons did not sign the book of by-laws, and that 'the signatures of said persons on said book of by-laws appear to have been written by one and the same person,' and, upon information and belief, it is averred 'that the dividends paid to the holders of said certificates or paid on account of said certificates of membership have been paid to E. D. Keith or Josephine Keith, each of whom is a bona fide member of the said defendant association' and that there is no authority on file from said persons to said Keiths to represent them or to collect any dividend 'on behalf of said aforenamed persons.'

[6] "The fact that authority from the holders of these certificates is not on file does not necessarily or inferentially imply that no such authority was given.

[7] "The bona fide holder of a certificate would have the right to dispose of his dividend.

"It is next alleged that certificate 82 was issued in the name of F. J. Keith, number 83 to George Keith, 84 to Roscoe Keith, 85 to L. M. Keith, 86 to G. S. Keith, 87 to Lillian Keith, 88 to Edwin Keith, 89 to Lulu Keith, 102 to May Keith, and 103 to Harry Keith. On information and belief it is alleged that said certificates were 'illegally issued by said defendant association and the same are not now legal shares of said defendant association'; and upon information and belief it is averred that 'said E. D. Keith has drawn the dividends payable and paid on the said certificates hereinbefore in this paragraph mentioned,' and on information and belief it is alleged that there is no authorization on file authorizing him to receive said dividends. There is no averment of any fact from which it would appear that the certificates were illegally issued, and it is not alleged that E. D. Keith received any dividends without authority so to do. Besides, these certificate holders are not complaining.

"It is next alleged that certificate No. 80 'issued in the name of Robert I. Reed was issued to a minor under the age of 18 years, to wit, of the age of about seven years and the said Robert I. Reed, at the time of the issuance of said certificate, did not sign the by-laws' and 'the dividends paid on account of said certificate or standing in the name of Robert I. Reed have been paid to defendant P. F. Reed,' and that said certificate was illegally issued and said dividends illegally paid. There is no distinct averment that Robert I. Reed, in whose name the certificate was issued, is the minor of seven years referred to. The statute fixes the eligible age for membership at 18 years. C. C. § 653c. Assuming that this certificate was improperly issued, this fact alone would not justify the injunction.

[8] "It is next alleged that certificate 105 was issued to Ruth Slocum, and that at the time of its issue she was under the age of 18 years, and hence was illegally issued. She may have been 18 years of age the next day or when the action was brought, and, besides, no injury to plaintiff is shown by its issuance. It does not appear that the holder ever claimed any right under it.

[9] "It is next alleged that certificate 115, 'issued in the name of Ruth Ann Reed, was issued to a minor under the age of 18 years'; that she did not sign the by-laws, 'and that dividends paid on account of said certificate No. 115 have been paid to the said defendant P. F. Reed by said defendant association.' There is no distinct averment that any dividends have been paid on this certificate, and, if it sufficiently appears that any were paid, no such injury has been shown as would warrant the issuance of an injunction. As in the preceding case, she may have been of age the day after the certificate issued or when the action was commenced.

"It is next alleged that certificate No. 116 was issued to Eve G. Lewis, and at the time she did not live in this state, and did not sign the by-laws, and 'that the dividends paid on account of said certificate have been paid to one Mrs. Ingraham, the mother-in-law of defendant P. F. Reed,' and that 'at the time of the payment of said dividends * * * there was nothing on file * * * authorizing said Mrs. Ingraham to receive said dividends.' We find nothing in the statute requiring residence in the state as necessary to eligibility to become a member of the association. That Mrs. Ingraham happens to be the mother-in-law of defendant Reed would hardly be urged as ground for an injunction. If there was no authority on file for her to draw dividends at the time, it may have been subsequently filed or the act ratified.

[10] "It is next alleged that certificate 128 'was issued in the name of John Gilbert and subsequently transferred to one Mary E. Jones.' On information and belief it is alleged 'that at the time of the issuance of said certificate number 128 there was no such person in existence as the said John Gilbert who was entitled to own a share of said defendant association' and on information and belief it is alleged that the transfer to said Mary E. Jones was illegal and on information and belief it is alleged 'that the name of Mary E. Jones appearing on the book of by-laws of the defendant association was signed by the defendant J. J. Ruggles.' It is not alleged that John Gilbert never existed; the averment is that no such person existed 'who was entitled to own a share of said defendant association.' Why he was not entitled does not appear. Nor does it appear why the transfer of this share to Mary Jones was illegal. No fraud can be imputed if it be admitted that Ruggles signed the by-laws for Mary Jones and no injury is shown.

"A very similar case is certificate 129, alleged to have been issued to Fred Gilbert, and was transferred to Maggie Yuell.

"It is next averred that certificates 135 and 217 'are shown by the records of said association to have been issued in the name of Frank Fox,' certificate 211 'in the name of one F. Fox,' 134 'in the name of one Frank Fox,' and 136 'in the name of F. C. Fox'; that 'the names of the parties to whom the said certificates * * * were issued were signed on the book of by-laws by one Frank Fox; that the dividends paid for or on account of said shares * * * have been paid to one Frank Fox,' and there is nothing of record to show that 'the said Frank Fox was authorized to receive said dividends on account of said shares numbers 218, 154 and 136.' As heretofore observed, it does not follow that the dividends were illegally paid because there was at the time they were paid no authority on file. This may have been subsequently furnished or may have been exhibited at the time, but not filed. There is no averment that the certificates were illegally issued, or to fictitious persons.

"It is next alleged that certificate 225 was issued to one Baby Bagge; that the said Baby Bagge 'was at the time of the issuance of said certificate a minor' and said certificate was illegally issued. So far as appears, Baby Bagge might have been a minor, and, being 18 years of age, be eligible to membership. Whether Baby Bagge was a male or female does not appear.

"It is alleged that the directors 'have treated, recognized, and counted, and do treat, recognize, and count, as valid, the said illegal certificates, * * * and will continue to treat, recognize, and count as valid said illegal certificates of membership, unless restrained.' Clearly, unless it be shown that the certificates are illegal, the directors should so treat them.

"Then follow paragraphs 23 to 38, both inclusive, which may be thus summarized: That for the purpose of carrying out the said fraudulent intent to control said association said P. F. Reed, who is secretary thereof, by and through the names of said illegal shareholders, caused to be elected directors of said association, a majority of whom have done the bidding of said Reed; that he has caused said directors to elect him manager of said association, and as such manager he has selected as employés certain of his relatives. No facts are shown why the directors exceeded their authority or violated any duty in electing Reed as manager, and no facts are stated showing that his relatives were unworthy employés. It is alleged that he has caused certain shares to be canceled which were owned by persons who would not do his bidding, naming none such and stating neither time nor circumstance of such alleged action; that he has caused a new code of by-laws to be prepared, 'giving to the said Reed and to said alleged board of directors absolute control and management of the affairs of said association, and to take over the rights and privileges of all members, * * * who will not act in accord with the wishes of said defendant P. F. Reed,' as appears by Exhibit C; and that at the next monthly meeting of said directors as fixed by the by-laws filed on September 3, 1909, to be held on the second Monday of December, 1909, the defendants other than defendant association have determined and will, unless restrained, adopt said by-laws (Exhibit C), and will 'without right vote to adopt and will adopt' said last-named by-laws. We have examined this Exhibit C and compared it with the by-laws (Exhibit B), and find no such power given as is claimed. The changes proposed are not many nor are they such as the members may not adopt.

[11] "The indorsements on Exhibit C show that they were to be adopted upon the written consent of members in accordance with 'article XII, sec. 3 of the present by-laws,' which provide that 'they may be amended upon the written consent of two-thirds of the members filed with the secretary.' Without such consent the directors could not adopt a code of by-laws. But if they did assume to do so, and thereafter attempted to be governed by them, it does not appear, either by averment or from a comparison of Exhibit B with Exhibit C, that any injury would come to any shareholder.

"It is alleged that defendant P. F. Reed, acting by authority of said directors, has announced his intention of declaring a dividend among the members 'and particularly to the said illegal shareholders hereinbefore mentioned,' and, unless restrained, he will make such distribution 'and the portion of the said * * * funds distributed by (probably means to) said illegal shareholders will be received and retained by the defendant P. F. Reed and converted to his own use.' It does not sufficiently appear that the alleged illegal shares can be so classed or considered, and, unless illegally issued, the plaintiff cannot complain if Reed appropriates their dividends.

"It is then alleged that Reed 'has conceived the idea and intent to control * * * the affairs of the defendant association by and for himself,' and this he will accomplish, it is averred, by voting said 'fictitious and illegal stock issued by said defendant association as hereinbefore described, at a meeting of said defendant association or of said alleged board of directors * * * to be held December 13, 1909, as alleged in paragraph 32 hereof, unless restrained.' It appears that there are outstanding 250 shares—i. e., there are 250 members—each having an equal voice with all the others. It is not made to appear how Reed could accomplish his alleged purpose if it be admitted that all these alleged illegal votes are illegal, and that he could control them, 29 in all.

"It is next alleged that he intends to carry out his alleged purpose by voting these alleged illegal shares at the annual meeting to be held on January 11, 1910, in the election of a board of directors, who when elected 'will do and vote in regard to the conduct and management of said association as directed by said Reed.' It does not appear that he can work his purpose any more successfully in this regard than in his other alleged schemes for self-aggrandizement.

"Finally, it is alleged that if the said Reed votes such illegal certificates at said election, and if said directors treat, recognize or receive said illegal stock as legal, the said acts of defendants will cause plaintiff great and irreparable injury, and 'no compensation can afford plaintiff adequate relief.'

[12] "Upon a more careful examination of the complaint, and after disjointing it and finding out the full force of its several parts, I am convinced that the trial court was not justified in issuing the restraining order complained of. The court did not stop with its command not to recognize the validity of the certificates especially named in the preliminary injunction, which in my judgment was not authorized by any showing made, but the court forbade defendants from attempting to adopt any code of by-laws, or from attempting to declare any dividend or distributing any money of the association to any of the shareholders or members. Also forbade the election of any number of directors greater than seven, although the by-laws, which the complaint shows were adopted, provided for eleven directors, a number not forbidden by the statute. There is no statement of facts such as would warrant the court in preventing by its order the discharge of duties devolved upon the directors by statute and the by-laws duly adopted. There is no showing that would warrant the court in prohibiting all payments of dividends.

[13] "Before the court could thus so seriously invade the rights of all the stockholders they should have been represented in some way in the action. Morawetz on Priv. Corporations (2d Ed.) § 258; Minn. v. Northern Securities Co., 184 U. S. 235 [22 Sup. Ct. 308, 46 L. Ed. 499]. It has been held that in a suit to enjoin the voting of a stockholder's stock for the election of directors he is an indispensable party. Taylor v. S. P. Co. [C. C.] 122 Fed. 147. The question is not one alone of jurisdiction. 'We put it,' said the United States Supreme Court, 'on the ground that no court can adjudicate directly upon a person's rights, without the party being actually or constructively before the court.' Mallow v. Hinde, 25 U. S. 194 [6 L. Ed. 599].

"The court has not only made an order affecting all the shareholders in respect of certain of their rights, but it has specifically undertaken to pass upon the legality of certain 20 odd certificates, the holder of no one of which is a party to the action or has had his day in court.

[14] "Upon the general question, this court said, in Bishop v. Owens, 5 Cal. App. 83 [89 Pac. 844]: 'A complaint for an injunction which does not state facts sufficient to determine how plaintiff's property will be permanently injured by the acts complained of, and which states merely general conclusions, as to multiplicity of suits and irreparable injury, not warranted by any pleading of facts, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for equitable relief to enjoin the acts complained of.' (Syl.)

[15] "To issue an injunction is the exercise of a delicate power, requiring great caution and sound discretion and rarely, if ever, should be exercised in a doubtful case. 'The right must be clear, the injury impending and threatened, so as to be averted only by the protecting preventive process of injunction.' St. Louis S. F. M. Co. v. Sanitary S. F. M. Co., 161 Fed. 725 [88 C. C. A. 585].

"The complaint in this action, I think, falls far short of measuring up to these requirements."

TAYLOR v. LAURIDSON et al. (Sac. 1,858.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 9, 1911. Rehearing Denied Nov. 8, 1911.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by D. W. Taylor against N. H. Lauridson and others. From an order granting a temporary injunction, a part of the defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions to vacate injunction.

Grove L. Johnson and Wahrhaftig & Shinn, for appellants. F. F. Atkinson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The questions involved herein are substantially the same as those in the case of Willis v. Lauridson et al., 118 Pac. 530, this day decided. For the reasons therein given, the order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant defendants' motion to vacate the injunction.

LAKE et al. v. BONYNGE et al. (L. A. 2,662.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 713*)—RES JUDICATA—ISSUES.

The state having recovered judgment foreclosing a purchaser's certificate of purchase of state land, and no appeal having been taken, an assignee of the purchaser's interest, after the land had been sold by the state to defendant, moved to vacate the judgment for want of service of process on the original purchaser. An order was made granting this relief, which was afterwards vacated at the instance of the state, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to vacate the judgment. An appeal was taken from this order, on which the principal question was whether the judgment showed that the trial court had acquired jurisdiction of the defendant. It was held that it had, and the judgment was therefore affirmed. Held, that such judgment was res adjudicata of that question as against the original purchaser and his privies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 713.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 642*)—APPEAL—MOTION—SUBSTANTIAL RIGHT.

Where a substantial right or the merits of a case are involved, the judgment is res adjudicata, notwithstanding the decision is made on appeal from an order granting a motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 642.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 279*)—JUDGMENT ROLL—CONTENTS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 670, prior to its amendment in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 45), providing that the judgment roll in a case where the complaint was not answered by any defendant should consist of the summons, with the affidavit and proof of service, and the complaint, with memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, together with a copy of the judgment, an affidavit and order for the publication of the summons constituted no part of the judgment roll.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 279.*]

4. STATUTES (§ 267*)—RETROACTIVE OPERATION.

The validity of a judgment is to be determined by the law in force when it was rendered, and if valid then subsequent changes in the law will not affect it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 267.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 54*)—EVIDENCE.

Where defendants persistently resisted the offer of any evidence tending to a collateral attack on the judgment relied on as res adjudicata, and an affidavit and order of publication of the summons prior to the rendition of such judgment were admitted over their objections, and the affidavit of the original defendant, denying service, was introduced by defendants, not as independent evidence in the case, but only as one of the papers used on and in relation to the motion to set aside the judgment, and in connection with an order therefor, and with the appeal from an order setting aside the order vacating the judgment, in support of defendant's plea of res adjudicata, the admission of such evidence was unavailable to show that the judgment was void for lack of proper service.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by Fred W. Lake and another against Mary A. Bonynge and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. C. Boynton, F. D. Brandon, R. P. Henshall, and J. A. Cooper, for appellants. Frank H. Short, Frank Garrett, Wm. J. Hunsaker, G. E. Whitaker, Hunsaker & Britt, and J. W. McKinley, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. On March 20, 1889, a certificate of purchase for 640 acres of land belonging to the state of California, located in Kern county, was issued by the state to S. Davis, after payment by him of 20 per cent. of the purchase price, together with interest for the first year on the balance of the purchase price as required by law. On August 25, 1892, an action was commenced in the superior court of Kern county by the people of the state of California against said S. Davis, to obtain a decree and judgment foreclosing and annulling said certificate of purchase on account of the failure of the said Davis to pay the interest on the unpaid balance of the purchase price, which was payable January 1, 1892. On December 28, 1892, a decree and judgment, foreclosing and annulling said certificate of purchase and all rights of said Davis therein was entered. No appeal was taken from said judgment, and it became final on December 27, 1893. At the time said action of foreclosure was commenced, no assignment by Davis to any one of any interest in the said certificate of purchase had been filed with the registrar of the state land office, nor has any ever been filed there. On July 22, 1899, the defendant Mary A. Bonynge applied to purchase the said land from the state, and a certificate of purchase therefor was issued January 21, 1900. On December 7, 1900, Davis executed to Charles H. Gilman a conveyance of said certificate of purchase issued to him, which was recorded December 11, 1900, in the office of the county recorder of Kern county and on the same day Gilman conveyed to plaintiffs herein a certain proportion of his interest in the certificate to said land and the patent therefor, under an agreement on their part to take all necessary legal proceedings to assert and maintain title as it originally accrued from the state of California under the certificate of purchase issued to Davis. On December 31, 1900, one of the plaintiffs—F. W. Lake—claiming to be a successor in interest of said Davis, moved the superior court of Kern county, in said action of the People of the State of California v. Davis, to vacate and set aside the judgment of foreclosure entered therein, on the ground that no service of summons had been actually or constructively served on Davis in said action, and that the judgment was therefore void. The motion was made on the record, proceedings, and files in said case, and the affidavits of said Lake, C. H. Gilman, and said Davis, and on the same day the motion was made the court granted it, and made an order purporting to set aside and vacate said judgment and the service of summons on the defendant Davis and his default entered in pursuance thereof in said action. On October 29, 1901, the people of the state of California, plaintiff in said action, moved said court to vacate and set aside its above order made on December 31, 1900, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to vacate it; said motion being based on the judgment roll and records in said cause. On November 11, 1901, this latter motion was granted and an order made, annulling and vacating the order of December 31, 1900, and adjudging and declaring that the judgment made and entered in the case of the People, etc., v. Davis was in full force and effect. An appeal to this court was taken by said Lake from said order of November 11, 1901, and the order was by this court affirmed on June 23, 1904 (People, etc., v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651). On January 25, 1909, the defendant Mary A. Bonynge, having paid to the state the full amount of the purchase price of said land, received from the state a patent therefor. On March 1, 1909, plaintiffs brought this action against said Mary A. Bonynge and her codefendant, alleging in their complaint the issuance of the said certificate of purchase from the state to said Davis and assignments thereof to plaintiffs; that said certificate of purchase had never been vacated, annulled, or set aside, and was, when the patent was issued to the defendant Mary A. Bonynge, and now is, the only valid subsisting certificate of purchase issued by the state of California, and entitled plaintiffs to a patent for the land on payment to the state of the purchase price thereof; that the patent to said Mary A. Bonynge under her certificate of purchase and payment of the purchase price thereof was inadvertently made by the state.

The prayer is for a judgment and order that the said defendants hold the naked legal title to said land in trust for plaintiffs; and that upon payment of the amounts which the court may determine due from plaintiffs to defendants by reason of the payment by the latter of the purchase price of the land to the state the defendants be required to convey to plaintiffs their several interests in said land acquired under the patent.

The answer of the defendants admitted the issuance of the certificate of purchase to

Davis, and, among other defenses, set up the judgment, in the case of the People, etc., v. Davis, of December 27, 1902, foreclosing and annulling his certificate of purchase; the motion and order of December 31, 1900, setting aside and vacating said judgment; the proceedings and order of November 11, 1901, vacating this latter order; and the fact of an appeal therefrom to this court, and the judgment of affirmance here of the order of November 11, 1901; and averred that the said judgment of December 28, 1892, was "duly given and made and entered," and was a valid, subsisting, and final judgment, under which said certificate of purchase issued to Davis was foreclosed and annulled, and all his rights thereunder terminated; and, further, that the judgment of this court on the appeal from the order of November 11, 1901, was res adjudicata as to the validity of said original judgment.

The court found in favor of the defendants as to the validity and effect of these respective judgments, and entered a decree in their favor, sustaining the validity of the patent to the defendant Mary A. Bonynge.

On this appeal, the main questions presented for review are whether the finding that the original judgment of December 28, 1892, was a valid judgment, and the further finding that the judgment on appeal here from the order above referred to was res adjudicata, estopping the defendants from attacking it in this action, are supported by the evidence.

[1] In the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to consider both of these points, because we are satisfied that the judgment rendered here on the appeal from the order of November 11, 1902 (People, etc., v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651), is res adjudicata on the subject of the validity of the original judgment, and conclusive against collateral attack upon it, which was sought to be made in the present action in the court below.

It is insisted by appellants that on the appeal from the order of November 11, 1901 (to be referred to hereafter as the Davis appeal), this court "merely determined that Davis (or his successor in interest, Lake, one of the plaintiffs here) could not move to set aside the judgment more than one year after its entry, unless the judgment was void on its face. It did not determinte the question whether or not the court had acquired jurisdiction of the person of Davis." But in this assertion we are satisfied that counsel is in error, and that the very question which was determined, and which was the essential point involved on the appeal, was whether the original judgment entered against Davis was or was not valid. The appeal which was taken from the order of November 11, 1901, vacating the order of December 31, 1900, which had set aside the judgment against Davis, may have involved incidentally the question whether the order setting aside the original judgment was invalid because application therefor had not been made within a year after its entry (Code Civ. Proc. § 473), but it involved principally the question whether the order could be supported on the ground asserted by appellant on that appeal, namely, that an inspection of the judgment roll showed on its face that the judgment was invalid.

The record on that appeal showed that the motion of December 31, 1900, was based on the judgment roll and records in the case, with the affidavits of Lake, Gilman, and Davis, and the ground generally alleged was that the judgment was void on its face, accompanied by the particular ground that there was no service of summons, either actual or constructive, made on Davis, and that for these reasons, and on other grounds, the judgment was void. On the hearing, the superior court made a general order, setting the judgment aside. The record further shows that the motion upon which the order of November 11, 1901, setting aside the previous order of December 31, 1900, was that the original judgment against Davis was valid on its face, and that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order setting it aside. So it is apparent that the hearing here of the Davis appeal involved not merely whether the superior court had jurisdiction after the lapse of more than one year to set aside the judgment for an asserted failure to serve the defendant Davis, but whether the judgment which was attacked on the original motion of December 31, 1900, was void upon the face of the judgment roll on account of a failure to show that the court had acquired jurisdiction of defendant Davis by service of process. This latter question was essentially involved in the appeal, because if from an inspection of the judgment roll by the superior court the judgment in question appeared to be void on its face that court had jurisdiction to set it aside at any time, and it would have been error to have made the order of November 11, 1901, appealed from, annulling the previous order doing so. And the very matter which the court in the Davis appeal, in the discussion of that appeal, addressed itself to was a determination of whether the judgment of the superior court, entered on December 27, 1892, was or was not void. The court, after discussing the powers generally of a court to set aside judgments and disposing of some other questions presented on the appeal, and after declaring that "what has been said disposes of all questions on this appeal, except the single one as to whether the original judgment was void upon its face," proceeded to discuss and determine that question. 143 Cal. 677, 77 Pac. 652. It said:

"Was the judgment void upon its face? This question as we have already seen, must be determined from an inspection of the judgment roll. Under the statute, as it was at the time of the entry of this judgment and for several years thereafter, the judgment roll, in cases where the complaint was not answered by any defendant, consisted of the summons, with the affidavit and proof of service, and the complaint, with a memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering, was entered, and a copy of the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 670, subd. 1, as it stood prior to amendment to 1895 [St. 1895, p. 45].

"Neither the affidavit for publication of summons nor the order for publication constituted any part of the judgment roll under the law then in force, and cannot therefore be considered, notwithstanding the fact that they have been placed in the bill of exceptions. People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 453 [37 Pac. 414]. The case in which the judgment in question was rendered was one in which service by publication was authorized, and it must be conclusively presumed, upon the attack made upon it, that there was a sufficient affidavit and a sufficient order. There is therefore nothing in the point that the affidavit and order for publication were insufficient.

"It is further urged in support of the claim that the judgment was void on its face; that the summons was not published as issued.

"While a comparison of the original summons with the copy attached to the affidavit of publication shows a few discrepancies, they are very slight, and not capable of misleading the defendant as to the nature of the proceeding, the land affected, and the relief demanded. As was said in regard to a similar objection in Sharp v. Daugney, 33 Cal. 505, 513: 'In sense and meaning, the original summons and the published version of it are identical, and that is enough.'

"It is further urged that the original summons was returned and filed with the clerk five days after the date of its issuance, and that the attempted service by publication was thereafter had without withdrawing it from the files, or having an alias summons issued. There is nothing in this contention. The judgment roll does not show that no alias summons was issued, but simply contains the original summons, with the return of the sheriff that he was unable to find the defendant, dated and filed August 30, 1892, and the affidavit of publication, which does not show that an alias summons was not issued prior to the publication. The judgment recites that the defendant had been 'regularly served with process as required by law.' There is nothing in the judgment roll tending to rebut this recital of the judgment. People v. Harrison, 84 Cal. 609 [24 Pac. 311]; Whitney v. Daggett, 108 Cal. 235 [41 Pac. 471].

"These are the only points made in favor of the contention that the judgment was void upon its face. The lower court did not err in holding that the judgment was upon its face a valid judgment, and that the order purporting to vacate it, made after the lapse of eight years, was a mere nullity and should be vacated."

From this quotation, as to what was decided in that case, it appears clearly that the pivotal question upon which the validity of the order under review in the Davis appeal turned, was whether the judgment roll showed that the trial court had acquired jurisdiction of the defendant. It was held that it had, and such decision is res adjudicata. Under this decision, the status of the judgment as a valid one was settled forever, as against any collateral attack upon it by the parties to the appeal or their privies. Gilman had succeeded, by the agreement of December 7, 1900, to the rights of Davis under his certificate of purchase, and on the same day conveyed to Snow an undivided one-fourth and to Lake an undivided one-half interest in said certificate and the lands described in it. An agreement was entered into at the same time by Snow and Lake with Gilman, which recited that, "as the Davis certificate had been foreclosed and a decree annulling the same entered in a suit brought for that purpose, it is necessary, in order to maintain the claim of present title under said certificate of purchase, to take proceedings to set aside and annul the judgment and decree of foreclosure in said suit entered," and that Snow and Lake agreed "at their own expense and cost to take all necessary proceedings * * * to claim, assert and maintain the title to said land as it originally accrued * * * by reason of said certificate of purchase, and to recover and take the same as if no judgment of foreclosure had been entered," and that the services to be performed by them towards that end was the true consideration for the conveyance from Gilman to them. Pursuant to that agreement, Lake moved the court to vacate the judgment, and took the appeal from the order annulling the previous order obtained by him, vacating it. As successors of Davis through mesne conveyances, Lake, Gilman, and Snow, as their interests were injuriously affected by the judgment in People, etc., v. Davis, although not parties to the original action, had a right to make themselves parties to that action by moving to set aside the judgment, and on the denial of their motion had a right to appeal to have the proceedings of which they complained reviewed, not only for excess of jurisdiction, but for error. Elliott v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 501, 77 Pac. 1109, 103 Am. St. Rep. 102. In making himself a party by moving thereunder and taking that appeal pursuant to the agreement made by him and Snow with Gilman, Lake was acting in behalf of Gilman, Snow, and himself in attacking the validity of the judgment in favor of the people of the state, plaintiff in that action, and under and through whom the respondent here (Mary A. Bonynge) acquired her title. While the parties of record on appeal were the people, Davis, and Lake, still the parties to the present action in which the conclusiveness of the judgment on appeal is involved are the same, or are parties who were in privity with them as parties to that appeal, and so are bound by the judgment therein. As said in Koehler v. Holt Manf'g Co., 146 Cal. 335, 337, 80 Pac. 73, 74: "The case comes clearly within the principle that a judgment operates as an estoppel to preclude the 'parties and privies from contending to the contrary of that point or matter of fact which, having been once distinctly put in issue by them, has been, on such issue joined, solemnly found against them.'"

[2] It is contended that because the decision in the Davis appeal was upon a motion that the principle of res adjudicata does not apply; that it can only apply where the decision is by final judgment in an independent action. This may be true where the appeal on the motion does not involve any substantial right of the parties, or where the merits of the controversy are not in review upon the appeal, and are undecided. When, however, a substantial right or the merits of the case are involved and determined, the judgment is res adjudicata, notwithstanding the decision is made on an appeal from a motion.

Freeman on Judgments, § 323, declares: "The tendency of the recent adjudications is to inquire whether an issue or question has been in fact presented for decision and necessarily decided, and, if so, to treat it as res adjudicata, though the decision is the determination of a motion or summary proceeding, and not of an independent action. This is especially true when the decision did not involve a mere question of the proper form or time of proceeding, but was the determination of a substantial matter of right, upon which the parties interested had a right to be heard upon issues of law or fact, or both, and these issues, or some of them were necessarily decided by the court as the basis of the order which it finally entered, granting or denying the relief sought."

In Com'rs of Wilson County v. McIntosh, 30 Kan. 234, 1 Pac. 572, it is said: "We think there is a growing disposition to enlarge the scope of the doctrine of res adjudicata, and to place more regard on the substance of the decision than on the form of the proceedings. * * * It used to be the practice that no ruling of the trial court went up for review until after final judgment; any preliminary rulings, if erroneous, might up to that time be corrected by the trial court. Then it was assumed that a final examination in that tribunal had been had, and the whole record was ready to be transferred to the appellate court; and hence it was argued that no prior decision should be considered as final or as res adjudicata. * * * Now, that the decision of a motion can be preserved in a separate record, and taken up by itself, presupposes a full and careful consideration in both the trial and the appellate courts; and when that is had it would seem that the question thus separately and carefully considered should be finally disposed of, and not be thrown back for further litigation at the mere caprice of either party." While the court in the excerpt from the opinion just quoted speaks of appeals from rulings made prior to the final judgment, the principle announced is equally applicable to appeals taken from orders after final judgment, such as the order which was involved in the Davis appeal.

Boylan v. Bock, 60 Wash. 423, 111 Pac. 454, involved the point under consideration here. Judgment in a tax proceeding had been entered, and a motion was made to vacate the judgment, on the ground that no summons was served on the defendants, and that the court was therefore without jurisdiction to enter the tax judgment. The motion was denied in the lower court, for the reason that "the defendants should have appeared by petition and not by motion." An appeal was prosecuted from the order and affirmed; the court holding that as the judgment in the tax proceeding recited that due service of process was made on the defendants this was conclusive against alleged defects in the record. Bock v. Sanders, 46 Wash. 462, 90 Pac. 597. It will be noted that the order of the trial court, denying the motion, was based solely on a ground of procedure, and the affirmance was on the merits. After this affirmance of the order, an action was commenced to set aside the tax judgment on the same ground set out in the motion. Defendants pleaded the order denying the motion to vacate the judgment as a bar, which plea was sustained by the trial court. On appeal from the judgment, the only question involved was the effect of the previous judgment of the superior court, affirming the order denying the motion to vacate the judgment, and the court, speaking with reference thereto, said: "The affirmance was on the merits, however, and not upon the particular ground on which the order was based in the court below. * * * The appellant contends, however, that the former judgment was not on the merits for two reasons, and was therefore not a bar, first, because the motion to vacate was denied, on the ground that the moving party had adopted the wrong procedure; and, second, because the motion to vacate was based on the face of the record; whereas the present action was based on matters dehors the record. Conceding for the purpose of the argument that these distinctions are sound, they are not supported by the record. While the court below denied the first motion on the ground stated, this court passed on the merits of the application, regardless of the form of the action or proceeding; and an examination of the record in the two cases shows that the motion and accompanying affidavit filed on the first application set forth the identical grounds for vacating the judgment which are set forth as the basis for relief in the present complaint. Such being the case, the former judgment is a complete bar to this action." The same situation is presented here as in the case cited. On the Davis appeal, the decision was on the merits; the court determined that an inspection of the judgment roll showed a recital of due service in the judgment, and was conclusive evidence that the court had acquired jurisdiction of Davis, and the judgment was valid as against any collateral attack.

Appellants, in support of their position that a judgment rendered on a motion cannot be invoked as res adjudicata, cite Pioneer Land Co. v. Maddux, 109 Cal. 633;[1] Estudillo v. Security Land, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 564, 87 Pac. 19; and Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 484, 89 Pac. 317. In the first case cited, the defendant pleaded as res adjudicata a judgment of affirmance by this court on an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a judgment annulling a certificate of purchase which was involved in that action. The superior court had denied the motion on the ground of laches in making it (People v. Goodhue, 80 Cal. 199, 22 Pac. 66), and the order of denial was affirmed here on that same ground. No question as to the regularity or validity of the judgment was presented or decided on the appeal in the Goodhue Case, and, of course, the affirmance of the order there could not be invoked as res adjudicata on a matter which was neither involved nor decided. In the two other cases cited, the attack upon the decrees was not a collateral attack as here, but a direct attack upon them, upon the ground that they had been procured, the one by fraud, the other by mistake. In such cases it is well established that the principle of res adjudicata invoked here does not apply.

[3, 4] In addition to the points made and discussed, appellants insist that the decision in the Davis appeal cannot be considered res adjudicata, because the entire judgment roll in the case of the People, etc., v. Davis was not before this court, as they assert that there were not contained therein the affidavit and the order for the publication of summons which, over the objection of the respondents, the court admitted in evidence in this case; that this affidavit for publication failed entirely to comply with the law as to what should be shown therein warranting an order for publication, and hence there was no authority for the publication of summons, and that the presumption of jurisdiction from the recital in the judgment that defendant "was regularly served with process as required by law" is of no effect, when the record shows what was actually done to give the court jurisdiction, and that as so done it was insufficient in law to confer it. This point of appellants is grounded solely on the claim that the affidavit and order for publication constitute part of the judgment roll in People, etc., v. Davis. But they do not. In 1895 the Legislature amended section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure so as to thenceforth make the affidavit and order for publication a part of the judgment roll, but when the judgment in People v. Davis was entered in 1892 these papers did not constitute any part of such judgment roll. Under the Code section as it existed then, the judgment roll in a case where the complaint was not answered by any defendant consisted of the summons, with the affidavit and proof of service, and the complaint, with a memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment. The judgment roll as so made up was before this court on the Davis appeal, and it was found on inspection of the face of that judgment roll that the judgment was valid. In fact, it was expressly held there that the affidavit for publication and the order therefor constituted no part of the judgment roll under the law in force when the judgment in question was entered. People v. Davis, supra; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414; Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 100 Pac. 1086; People v. Mulcahy, 112 Pac. 853. The validity of the judgment is to be determined from the law in force when it is rendered, and if valid then subsequent changes in the law cannot affect it. Railroad Co. v. Twombly, 100 U. S. 78, 25 L. Ed. 550; Anderson v. Hygeia Hotel Co., 92 Va. 687, 24 S. E. 269.

[5] It is further insisted by appellants that, as this action is one in equity, and the evidence introduced on the part of appellants, and likewise by respondents, shows that no sufficient affidavit was filed to warrant a substituted service; and the affidavit of Davis shows that no personal service of process was made upon him, the court should have found that the judgment was void for failure to obtain jurisdiction to render it. We may assume, purely for the purposes of this decision, that, while a party relying on a judgment which is valid on its face may successfully resist any attack upon it which is collateral and not direct, still where the attack might be resisted as collateral, if he admits facts which show that a service of summons, constructive or personal, was not made on the defendant to the judgment, and allows evidence to be introduced without objection showing this fact, as it is then established that the judgment is void, it is the duty of the court to so declare. Hill v. City Cab, etc., Co., 79 Cal. 188, 21 Pac. 728; People v. Harrison, 107 Cal. 541, 40 Pac. 956. But this rule has no application here. The respondents persistently resisted throughout the trial the offer of any evidence tending to a collateral attack on the judgment. The affidavit and order for publication were admitted in evidence over their objections, and the affidavit of Davis was introduced by respondents, not as independent evidence in the case, but as one of the various papers used on, and in relation to, the motion of December 31, 1900, to set aside the judgment in People v. Davis, and in connection with the order therefor and the appeal from the order annulling and setting aside the latter order; all the papers in relation thereto, including the Davis affidavit, were offered and admitted for the purpose only of supporting the plea of respondents that the matter of the validity of the judgment in People v. Davis was res adjudicata by the decision in the Davis appeal.

While some other points are made on this appeal, we do not think them of sufficient merit to require mention or discussion.

As the only appeal in this case is from the order denying the motion of appellants for a new trial, that order is affirmed.

JONES v. VAN NUYS et al. (L. A. 2,688.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 156*)—WATER CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION — WATERS GRANTED.

A contract, in terms granting "all the water now flowing or hereafter to flow" from three certain wells on a certain five acres, and covenanting that the water flowing from the wells at the date of the contract measures more than 110,000 gallons a day, and that, if the water flowing therefrom shall decrease to less than 105,000 gallons a day, the grantor will, "from the water rising or flowing from or on said five acres, or that can be developed from said five acres," increase the flow to 110,000 gallons a day, but that he shall not be obliged to furnish more than one-third of all the water that may be flowing on or from said five acres, or that can be developed or obtained therefrom, is not a contract to furnish 110,000 gallons of water a day, or a specific quantity, but is a grant of all the water flowing from the three wells, with an agreement to endeavor to keep that flow up to 110,000 gallons by certain means, and to the extent of one-third of the water obtained by such means.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 156*)—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—MEANS FOR DEVELOPING WATER.

A contract, granting all the water flowing from three artesian wells on a certain five acres, with the right to conduct it, at the expense of the grantees, from the wells by pipes inserted into the wells between two and three feet below the surface of the ground, and providing that, if the wells fail to supply 110,000 gallons a day, the grantor will, "from the water rising or flowing from or upon said five acres, or that can be developed or obtained from said five acres, immediately at his own expense" increase the stream of water for the grantees to a flow of 110,000 gallons a day, but that the grantor shall not be obliged to furnish the grantee more than a third of all the water that "may be flowing on or from said five acres, or that can be developed from or obtained by putting down as many wells as can be safely made * * * to a depth of from 20 to 50 feet, at least one-half of said wells to be 50 feet deep"; and that, if after sinking them sufficient water shall not be developed to furnish the grantees with 110,000 gallons, they may demand that the wells shall be so deepened as to obtain such supply for them, they to bear a third of the expense thereof; and nowhere mentioning the employment of artificial means to furnish the grantees water from the wells to be sunk or deepened, or the expense of any such thing—does not contemplate that the grantor shall install a pumping plant, if sufficient water cannot be developed without it, though with it enough can be developed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by E. W. Jones against I. N. Van Nuys and another. From an adverse judgment and order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank W. Burnett and J. W. McKinley, for appellant. O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment entered against him after demurrer sustained to his amended complaint.

Kate W. Dobbins is made a party defendant, under an allegation that she is a proper party plaintiff who refused to join with plaintiff as such, and hence is made a defendant. No relief is asked against her; the real parties to the action being the plaintiff and the defendant I. N. Van Nuys.

The complaint alleged the making of a contract, or water deed, on June 3, 1880, between James Foord, of the first part, and William H. Stephens, Kate W. Dobbins, Henry P. Tallant, and V. S. Owen, of the second part, and the instrument was set out in full in the complaint. It provided that in consideration of certain amounts of money which had been paid by the parties of the second part to the agreement, to said Foord (Stephens, $2,000; Kate W. Dobbins, $1,714.28; and Tallant and Owen jointly, $2,285.73) "the said Foord does hereby grant, bargain, sell and convey to the said parties of the second part, to be owned and held and enjoyed by them in proportion to their said respective payments and to their heirs, representatives and assigns forever, all the water now flowing and hereafter to flow from three wells located on said grantor Foord's land in said county and hereinafter described (5 acres) the said wells being each found by driving into the ground an iron pipe of seven inches in diameter. Also the full and perfect right to conduct the water from said wells by means of pipes which shall be inserted into the said wells at a point not less than two feet nor more than three feet below the surface of the ground immediately around such well, and which conducting pipes shall be so inserted or attached as not to interfere with the free use of a sand pump in said wells, and as not to create a siphon." Then follow provisions granting the right to the second parties to conduct their water pipes to their tract of land through the land of Foord, but at their own expense, and other provisions regarding said pipes, their repair and removal at the expense of the grantees, all immaterial to the question of the construction of the contract here involved, so far as requiring any detailed statement.

It is then further provided in the contract that: "The grantor stipulates and covenants that the total quantity of water flowing from said three wells measures at this date more than 110,000 gallons in each successive twenty-four hours (measured by cubic feet and the gallon estimated at 231 cubic inches) and for himself, his heirs, representatives and assigns, he covenants and agrees with the grantees, their heirs, representatives and assigns, that if at any time or times hereafter the water flowing from said wells shall so decrease as to measure less than 105,000 gallons in each period of twenty-four hours and shall so continue for a period of thirty days, he and his said heirs, representatives and assigns, shall and will from the water rising or flowing from or upon said five acres, or that can be developed or obtained from said five acres, immediately and at the expense of said grantor, his heirs, representatives and assigns, increase the stream of water for the grantees to the flow of 110,000 gallons in each period of twenty-four hours so as to deliver to them the quantity stipulated for. But the grantor, his heirs, representatives and assigns shall not be obliged to furnish and deliver to the grantees more than two-thirds of all the water that may be flowing on or from said five acres, or that can be developed or obtained by putting down as many wells as can be safely made without interfering one with another, and to a depth of from twenty to fifty foot, at least one-half of said wells to be fifty feet deep. Provided, however, that if at any time or times hereafter one-third of all the water flowing or developed or to be developed in the manner aforesaid, and at the expense of the grantor, shall still fall short of 110,000 gallons in each twenty-four hours, and the grantor shall fail to furnish the grantees that quantity, then the grantees shall have the right to demand that of the said wells then on the said five-acre tract one or more shall be so deepened as to obtain such supply for the grantees and one-third of the expense thus incurred shall be paid by the grantees, and the remainder by the grantor. And if in such case the grantor shall fail or refuse to make such deepening as would be necessary to furnish the grantees with the said 110,000 gallons in twenty-four hours, then the grantees shall have the right to enter upon said five acres and to make said deepening, and two-thirds of the expense thereof shall be adjudged a legal charge against the grantor, his heirs, representatives and assigns to the extent of the value of the said five acres of land and no further, and against said five acres of land and against whomsoever shall own the same or any part thereof and to the same extent and no further. And all the water so added to the flow up to the said 110,000 gallons for each twenty-four hours shall go and belong to the grantees, their heirs, representatives and assigns in like manner and in the same proportions as the original quantity heretofore conveyed in the operative part of this conveyance. The grantor shall bear the expense of removing from said wells all accumulations of sand so far as may be necessary or desirable and of repairing and removing and renewing the pipes forming said wells, whenever necessary, and he shall do said repairing, removing and renewing whenever necessary to the preservation of the flow of water."

Foord then covenants that all the property interests and rights conveyed to the parties of the second part and stipulations in their favor shall survive and pass to their heirs, representatives, and assigns; that the covenants and stipulations shall run with the said five acres of land and are declared a burden thereon and in whomsoever's hands the same may come; and that all persons who take said five acres, or any part thereof, shall be held personally responsible to the extent of the value of said five acres herein charged with the performance of all the covenants and stipulations made in favor of the parties of the second part. Then follows a description of the five acres of land, referred to as wholly swamp, with a particular description by monuments and distances of the exact location on the tract of the three wells mentioned in the contract or deed, followed by a final provision therein that the parties of the second part, mentioned as grantees, shall take as between themselves their proper interests as tenants in common, and not as partners, and in proportion to their said payments—Stephens seven twenty-first parts, Dobbins six twenty-first parts, and Tallant and Owen the remaining eight twenty-first parts.

The complaint, after alleging that the contract above referred to was duly acknowledged by the parties thereto and recorded, proceeds to allege that plaintiff is, and for more than four years has been, the assignee of the interest therein reserved to said Henry P. Tallant and V. S. Owen, and to six-seventeenths of the interest of said Kate W. Dobbins, who still owns the remainder of her interest under said contract; that said defendant Van Nuys for more than four years last past has been the owner of the five-acre tract described in the contract as successor in interest of said James Foord, and has also acquired the interest reserved under the contract to said Wm. H. Stephens, and the whole of the latter has been merged into the fee; that the flow of the three wells mentioned in the contract gradually diminished and more than four years ago practically ceased; that plaintiff, without objection from defendant, up to a year last past made efforts to restore said flow by deepening said wells and by the use of a siphon, but without success; that beneath the surface of said five acres and reaching within 50 feet thereof there exists a large body of water which, while it will no longer flow naturally to the surface through wells sunk therein, is capable of being developed by pumping, and that by installing and operating pumping plants upon said five acres a quantity of water could be developed, one-third of which would be equal to the quantity reserved to said grantees by said contract, and that this condition has existed at all times since the execution of the contract; that defendant Van Nuys has installed a pumping plant on said five acres and within the last four years has pumped a large quantity of water thereby, but has failed to deliver any to the plaintiff under said contract; that in 1907 plaintiff undertook to install a pumping plant upon said five acres for the purpose of pumping water for his use, but defendant Van Nuys objected, and secured an injunction against the erection of said pumping plant by plaintiff; that when the above-recited contract was executed each of the grantees therein was the owner of land in the vicinity of said five acres, and said water was purchased for use on said lands respectively, and was so used as long as the same was furnished; that plaintiff now owns the land then owned by Tallant and Owen, and also six-seventeenths of the land owned by said Kate W. Dobbins.

It is then alleged that plaintiff has expended $1,000 and upwards in attempting to obtain water due under said contract, and a further sum of $1,200 in purchasing water elsewhere to supply his needs, and that by reason of lack of sufficient water his trees and crops have been damaged in the last four years to the extent of $1,000 and upwards; that all these damages accrued through the neglect and failure of the defendant Van Nuys to secure water upon said five acres by pumping in accordance with said contract, or to deliver water already secured by him through pumping.

The prayer of the complaint is for damages in the sum of $3,200, and a judgment that defendant Van Nuys be ordered to forthwith install and operate a pumping plant or plants upon said five acres sufficient to develop water to supply plaintiff with the proportion of water due him under the aforesaid contract, or to supply him with water from the pumping plants already installed, and that if defendant fails to comply with said order, a receiver be appointed to take possession of a sufficient portion of said five acres, and supply water by pumping therefrom sufficient to supply plaintiff with the proportion due under said contract; the expense of said receivership to be borne by defendant Van Nuys, and be a charge upon said five-acre tract. The defendant demurred generally and specially to the complaint. The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend and electing to stand upon his pleading, the judgment from which he appeals was entered against him.

The only point involved on this appeal is the proper construction to be given to the contract, or water deed, upon which plaintiff bases his right of action, and this narrows down to what was the nature of the "development" of the water which Foord and his successors in interest agreed to make, in order to keep the flow of water for the benefit of the grantees up to 110,000 gallons at any time when the water flowing from said three wells so decreased as to measure a flow of less than 105,000 gallons.

In the contract, Foord is uniformly designated as the grantor, and the several parties who are given proportionate rights to the water mentioned therein are designated as the grantees, and these terms will be used by us in discussing the rights of the parties under the contract.

It is insisted on the part of appellant that by the terms of the contract Foord conveyed to the grantors, and covenanted to deliver to them a specific quantity of 110,000 gallons of water; that, while it was provided in the first instance the supply should be furnished from the three wells then existing upon the five-acre tract, it was contemplated by the parties thereto that the flow therefrom might at some time diminish, and in contemplation of this possibility Foord covenanted and agreed that if the quantity decreased to less than 105,000 gallons during a period of 30 days that he would, "from the water rising or flowing from or upon said five acres, or that can be developed or obtained from said five acres," immediately, at his own expense, "increase the stream of water for the grantees to the flow of 110,000 gallons * * * so as to deliver them the quantity stipulated for"; that this contract to supply the decrease in the stipulated quantity from "water that can be developed or obtained from said five acres" is to be construed as a covenant to develop water in any such manner as might secure the supply; and that, if by installing a pumping plant such supply can be secured, the covenants of Foord embrace such a method. In so insisting that this is the proper construction to be put upon the contract, appellant relies particularly on the case of Garvey, etc., v. Huntington, etc., 154 Cal. 232, 97 Pac. 428. The trial court in sustaining the demurrer generally necessarily held that the contract was not susceptible to this construction; that it did not provide or contemplate the development of water by the installation of a pumping plant when the amount supplied from the three wells decreased in flow, but solely a development whereby a natural artesian flow from the wells could be obtained.

In construing a contract, the basic rule is to be adopted that each clause is to be considered with reference to every other clause upon which it has any bearing, and all the clauses and provisions are to be construed together as the unified medium whereby the intent of the parties to the instrument is to be reached, and this rule is to be applied here.

[1] Appellant, as we have said, insists that under the grant from Foord there was conveyed to the grantees a specific quantity of water amounting to 110,000 gallons during each 24 hours. This, however, is certainly not the fact as far as the operative part of the conveyance—the granting clause—is concerned; no specific quantity is there mentioned; the amount being of all the waters of the three wells "now flowing or hereafter to flow" therefrom. Under this granting clause, the grantees were entitled to no specific quantity of water; they were entitled to all the waters flowing therefrom, whether the flow amounted to less than 110,000 gallons or exceeded it.

In this connection, too, it is to be noticed as bearing materially on the construction to be placed on subsequent provisions of the contract that these wells were artesian wells. It is evident, not only from use of the term "water now flowing or to flow" from the wells, but also from the manner in which the supply pipes of the grantees were to be connected with them—three feet below the surface—and this was the only method provided for obtaining the water.

Now, while it is clear that there is no conveyance of any specific quantity of water in the granting clause of the contract, it is insisted by appellant that a subsequent provision thereof amounts to such a grant. The provision on which this claim is based is the one where Foord covenanted that the quantity of water flowing from the three wells at the date of the contract measured more than 110,000 gallons, and in which he agreed that if the flow decreased, so as to measure less than 105,000 gallons, he would, "from the water rising or flowing from or upon said five acres, or that can be developed or obtained from said five acres," increase the flow to 110,000 gallons. But this provision contains no grant of a specific quantity of water to the grantees, either directly or inferentially. All that it amounts to is a covenant that at the date of the contract the wells to which the grantees acquired the entire flow of water therefrom flowed more than 110,000 gallons, and that if it decreased the grantor would increase the flow up to 110,000 gallons. That there was no definite or specific quantity of water is further apparent from the subsequent provision of the contract immediately following the one last referred to, where it is provided that of the waters to be furnished from said five acres, or that can "be developed or obtained" therefrom, the grantor shall not be required to furnish more than one-third thereof. Under this provision, as the flow from the three wells and the further quantity to be furnished by the grantor under the contract might be less than 110,000 gallons, it is evident that no specific quantity of water was contracted to be furnished. What the grantor did convey was all the water flowing from the three wells, whatever that amount might be, with an accompanying agreement that he would endeavor to keep that flow up to 110.000 gallons by certain means to be taken by him for that purpose, and to the extent of one-third of the water obtained by such means; but this falls far short of a grant of a specific quantity of water.

[2] Now as to the means which were to be employed by the grantor to provide the grantee with this quantity of water. Appellant insists that it is a matter of common knowledge that the flow from wells and springs may not be permanent, and, as the five-acre tract contained a nonfailing supply of water which, if it ceased to run by gravity or natural pressure, could be by artificial means made to flow, the parties to the contract must have had in contemplation a resort to such means—that is, pumping—if the natural flow from the wells should cease; that the terms "developed," "obtain," and "increase the stream of water" employed in the contract are words and phrases capable of broad signification, and, taken in connection with the fact that the grantees paid a valuable consideration for the water to be furnished them, as it is capable of being furnished by the artificial means of pumping, there is no reason why a construction to that effect should not be given to the contract.

There would be much force in the position of appellant if, after granting all the waters flowing from the three wells, there was nothing further in the contract than an agreement that if these wells failed to supply 110,000 gallons that the grantor would, "from the water rising or flowing from or upon said five acres, or that can be developed or obtained from said five acres, immediately, at his own expense," increase the stream of water for the grantees to a flow of 110,000 gallons. The difficulty, however, in giving to these terms of the agreement the broad signification sought by appellant is found in subsequent provisions of the contract immediately following the clause above referred to, defining just how the water to keep up a supply of 110,000 gallons is "to be developed and obtained." In the first subsequent proviso, it is declared that the grantors shall not be obliged to furnish the grantees more than one-third of all the water that "may be flowing on or from said five acres, or that can be developed or obtained by putting down as many wells as can be safely made * * * to a depth of from twenty to fifty foot, at least one-half of said wells to be fifty feet deep." Here the provision defines exactly how the water shall be developed and obtained; it is to be by the sinking of a number of shallow wells, and by this means only. The parties evidently contemplated that as the wells already sunk, and the waters of which the grantees were entitled, were of artesian flow, that, in case of a decrease in their supply, other wells sunk on the tract would likewise produce an artesian flow. As such a result would be obtained by simply sinking wells to open the artesian flow, this affords an all-sufficient reason why nothing was said in the contract about pumping or the employment of mechanical or artificial means by the grantor to furnish the supply.

And that it was in contemplation of the parties that the sinking of these wells by the grantor would supply an artesian flow, and that such sinking alone was to be the maximum work to be done by the grantor at his own expense, is very evident from the next following provision of the contract. This provision referred to was inserted on the theory that the sinking of the shallow wells might not produce an artesian flow, so it was there provided that, if after sinking them sufficient water was not developed to furnish the grantees with 110,000 gallons, then the grantees might demand that one or more of the wells on the tract should be so deepened, so as to obtain such supply for the grantees; the expense thereof to be borne by the grantor and the grantees in certain proportions. All that is required on the part of the grantor by the terms of the contract is the sinking of wells or the deepening thereof, and as to the last provision the only purpose of deepening the well would be to obtain an artesian flow thereby. There is no suggestion in or inference to be drawn from any of these provisions that any artificial means of supplying water was contemplated or provided for. What the parties had in mind when the contract speaks of water to "be developed or obtained," in the event the artesian flow in the three wells should decrease beyond a given quantity, was the obtaining of an artesian supply by sinking other wells, or deepening those that had been sunk. It is impossible to explain the entire absence in the contract of any mention of the use or employment of artificial means to furnish grantees water from the wells to be sunk or deepened upon any other ground than that an artesian flow was all that was contemplated to be obtained by the particular means which it was provided that the grantor should adopt to secure the supply.

But, as further confirming the fact that the parties were relying for the supply of water under the contract upon the development of an artesian flow by the sinking of the shallow additional wells, or the deepening of them, is the fact that if the establishing of a pumping plant for the purpose was in contemplation by the parties no provision is made in the contract for the expense of installing, operating and maintaining it. In providing for what each was expressly to do under the contract, the parties were very careful to stipulate as to who were to bear the expense or the proportions in which it was to be borne. To illustrate: The conducting pipes from the wells to the lands of the grantees were to be laid down, and repaired, and renewed at the expense of the grantees; the expense of removing and repairing the casing pipe of any of the wells, the sinking of new wells, and removing sand accumulations therefrom are to be borne by the grantor, and the expense of deepening the wells, should it become necessary, are to be borne, two-thirds by the grantor, and one-third by the grantees. All the work to which it should apply was particularly provided for, and the specifications of the contract in that regard are entirely consistent with the idea that what was intended in providing for the sinking of additional wells and deepening existing ones, if the three original wells decreased in flow, was to obtain a similar flow, such as had proceeded from the three wells, namely, an artesian flow. On the other hand, if, as contended by appellant, it was the intention of the parties, if an artesian flow was not obtained by the means specified to be taken to accomplish that end, that the artificial means of pumping was to be resorted to, then we have an absence in the contract of any provision for the payment of the expense thereof. It is to be noted that whatever rights the grantees acquired under the contract were not for any limited period, but were perpetual. If the installing of a pumping plant was in contemplation of the parties, then necessarily there was a perpetual expense in its maintenance and operation, and yet, not a word is said in the contract as to who shall bear this expense. In face of the fact that as to all operations or means which the contract specifically requires to be taken or done by either party to the contract the expense of doing so is particularly imposed upon one or the other of the parties thereto, it is not within the realm of reasonable probability that if it were intended that a pumping plant should be established and maintained perpetually to obtain a flow of water that not a word should be said in the contract about the expense of its installation or operation, or by whom the burden of that expense should be assumed. The entire absence of any such provision only strengthens the construction which the provisions of the contract disclose that resort to such artificial means as pumping was not within the contemplation of the parties, but that the only thing contemplated by the sinking of the shallow wells, or the deepening of some of them was to obtain an artesian flow similar to that supplied by the three original wells, and that the sinking of the shallow wells or, on demand, the deepening of some of them was the maximum of development and the kind of "development" work to be done by the grantor under the contract.

There is nothing in Garvey, etc., v. Huntington, etc., 154 Cal. 232, 97 Pac. 428, relied on by appellant, which requires a different construction of the contract here under consideration. The contract in the Garvey Case and the contract here are essentially different. In the Garvey Case, the Shorbs, owners of the Shorb ranch, granted to Garvey a first or prior right to a full, uninterrupted, and perpetual flow of 30 inches of any water then or thereafter to be developed or flowing upon or from their lands. It was expressly covenanted that they did not warrant a continuance of the flow of 30 inches, but they did covenant that water was on the land, and that it was their intention to continue to develop the flow therefrom, reserving the privilege of doing so by boring wells and driving tunnels, and such other means as engineering skill might suggest; they further stipulated that if the flow of water then or thereafter developed upon the land should decrease, so that Garvey should not receive the quantity granted, that Shorb, at the expense of Garvey, would "do or perform such work towards restoring the flow of water as any competent engineer" that Garvey might select "shall direct to be done"; the necessary money "to carry on such work of development" to be advanced by Garvey. It was held that under the last provision of the contract the installment of a pumping plant for the restoration of the supply of water from one of the artesian wells from which Garvey had been getting his specific quantity of water was "development work" within the meaning of the contract. There can be no question but that pumping is a means for the development of water, and that, as the Shorbs had agreed to do "such other work" as an engineer might determine would restore the development of the waters which Garvey was to receive, the determination of the engineer that a pumping plant should be installed for that purpose we held was in the contemplation of the parties "development work." But here Foord had not agreed to be governed by the suggestion of anybody, or to do anything upon such a suggestion. The parties, as the contract showed, had in view the restoration of an artesian flow, such as the original three wells were supplying under the contract so made. If this supply decreased, what Foord was to do to restore it to the grantees was clearly and definitely specified in the contract. He was simply to sink other shallow wells, or deepen those already existing, to the end that an artesian flow might be obtained. He did not stipulate that any other means would be taken by him for that purpose, or that it should be left to anybody else to determine any other way in which it might be done, all of which distinguishes this contract from that under consideration in the Garvey Case.

Under this construction of the contract between the parties, the complaint stated no cause of action against the defendant thereunder; and hence the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MAYR v. MAYR. (L. A. 2,542.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 93*)—PLEADING—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

Defendant's answer in a suit for divorce, as first filed, contained no prayer for affirmative relief, but an amendment contained such a prayer. The cross-complaint alleged various acts of cruelty "wrongfully" inflicted, with the express purpose of harassing defendant and inflicting intense mental suffering, and that such purposes were fully accomplished. It was also alleged that prior to 1904 plaintiff had resolved to so conduct herself toward defendant as to compel a separation, to render his life miserable, and, if possible, to force him into the appearance of deserting her. Also that plaintiff's recital to defendant of her misconduct in another state was intended to cause defendant great distress, and that she had in almost every respect failed to conduct herself as a loving and dutiful wife, but had done innumerable things that could not be specifically recalled, with the purpose of continually harassing, and that such was her general course of treatment. Held, that such cross-complaint, as amended, in the absence of demurrer, was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 292–307; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 150*)—FINDINGS—MISCONDUCT OF PARTIES.

In a suit for divorce, findings of misconduct on the part of both parties held to justify denial of a divorce to either.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 150*)—DESERTION—SEXUAL INTERCOURSE.

Civ. Code, § 96, provides that persistent refusal to have reasonable sexual intercourse, when health does not make such refusal reasonably necessary, or the refusal of either party to dwell in the same house with the other, when there is no just cause for such refusal, is desertion. Held, that the qualifying clause, "when there is no just cause for such refusal," applied to both refusal to have sexual intercourse and refusal to dwell together in the same house; and hence a finding that plaintiff had refused to have reasonable sexual intercourse with defendant, but which failed to find whether there was just cause for such refusal, was insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

4. DIVORCE (§ 150*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION—"ACQUIESCENCE."

In an action for divorce, the court found that plaintiff had persistently refused to have reasonable sexual intercourse with defendant, but that defendant at all times acquiesced in such refusal. Held, that the term "acquiesced" as so used did not mean approval, but rather "submission."

5. DIVORCE (§ 231*)—ALIMONY—RIGHT ON DENIAL OF DIVORCE—DUTY TO SUPPORT.

Civ. Code, § 159, provides that a husband and wife cannot, by any contract with each other, alter their legal relations, except as to property and except that they may agree, in writing, to an immediate separation, and may make provision for the support of either of them and of their children during such separation. In a suit for divorce, the court found that nearly two years after plaintiff refused to have sexual intercourse with defendant he ceased to dwell in the same house with her, but that such separation was agreeable to plaintiff, and was consented to by her. The court also found that plaintiff did not at any time separate herself from the defendant with the intent to desert him, and that defendant did not at any time or place desert or abandon plaintiff; nor had he without cause, or at all, refused or neglected to live with plaintiff as her husband. Held, that such findings only showed a mutual agreement to live apart and abandon marital relations, after which defendant was not bound to support plaintiff during such separation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by Ann Etta Mayr against Walter Albert Mayr. From a decree denying defendant, as cross-complainant, a divorce from plaintiff, but awarding a judgment requiring him to pay $150 a month alimony for the support of plaintiff and her minor child, she also having been denied a divorce, defendant appeals. Amended and affirmed.

Stephens & Stephens, for appellant. Earl Rogers and Paul W. Schenck, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This appeal, founded on the judgment roll alone, is taken by defendant as cross-complainant from a judgment denying a divorce to him. As a part of the judgment, plaintiff and cross-defendant was awarded $150 a month for the support of herself and her minor child, although she also was denied a divorce upon her complaint and proof.

Appellant contends that the court below had no power to enter a decree for alimony under the facts of the case as found, and that upon the findings the cross-complainant was entitled to a decree of divorce on the grounds of cruelty and of desertion; the latter consisting in the refusal of plaintiff to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse with him. Respondent contends that the cross-complaint lacks the essential allegation of marriage; that the answer and its various amendments do not contain any prayer; and that there is no averment of the "wrongful" infliction of any of the alleged acts of cruelty. It appears, however, that after the filing of the written opinion of the judge who tried the case, but before the formal findings had been made, leave of court having been obtained, an amendment to the cross-complaint was filed, whereby the marriage of the parties and their status as husband and wife are sufficiently set forth.

[1] While the answer first filed contains no prayer for affirmative relief, one of the amendments thereto does contain such prayer. We think that the court was justified in treating the answer with its various amendments as one pleading. The cross-complaint contained allegations amounting to the assertion that the various acts of cruelty set forth therein were "wrongfully" inflicted. We find in the cross-complaint the averment: "That all of said acts of plaintiff as aforesaid were, as defendant is informed and believes, done by her with the express purpose and object of harassing defendant and inflicting upon him intense mental torture and suffering, and that such objects and purposes of plaintiff were fully accomplished." There is also the statement that, previous to the summer of 1904, "the plaintiff had resolved to so conduct herself towards the defendant as to compel a separation between them, to render his life miserable, and, if possible, to force him into the appearance of desertion of her." And, after setting forth the narration by plaintiff to defendant of certain alleged improprieties committed by her in South Dakota and elsewhere, the cross-complaint contains the assertion: "That the recitals by plaintiff to defendant of all the said facts as aforesaid caused the defendant, and were intended by the plaintiff to cause the defendant, great mental suffering and distress; that plaintiff has in almost every respect failed to conduct herself as a loving and dutiful wife should, but has done and said innumerable things, which cannot now be specifically recalled by the defendant, with the intention and purpose of continually harassing and annoying defendant, and that such was the general course of treatment of defendant by plaintiff." We think that in the absence of special demurrers the allegations of the answer and cross-complaint were sufficient. There were no demurrers of any kind to any of the pleadings.

[2] The complaint charged defendant with cruelty and desertion. The findings set forth the marriage of the parties, and the birth of their child on or about May 2, 1905. They also negative certain allegations respecting the sale of defendant's property and the concealment of the proceeds. Defendant's earning capacity is found to be $250 per month, and there is a further finding that since coming to California he has not earned enough within $7,000 to pay the expenses of himself, plaintiff, and their child, and to meet the costs of this litigation. There are further findings that there is no community property; that plaintiff has $4,000 worth of furniture left in her possession by defendant when he removed to California about April, 1906; that plaintiff is an educated musician, capable of earning her living as a teacher of music, but that her resources are insufficient for the support of herself and child, and that $150 per month is a proper sum to be paid her for that purpose. There are also findings against various allegations of cruelty in the complaint, and, while some of the acts charged against defendant are found to be true, the court finds that none of them was done with intent to inflict cruelty upon plaintiff, and that his acts did not cause her grievous bodily or mental suffering; and that these acts did affect plaintiff's peace of mind, but not to any grievous degree. The court also finds that defendant did not desert plaintiff, but that on April 1, 1906, he separated himself from plaintiff, and that they have not since that time dwelt in the same house. It is found, however, that this living apart was agreeable to plaintiff, and was with her consent. With reference to the averments of the cross-complaint, it may be said that most of them are found to be true. Among these findings were those to the effect that plaintiff was disinclined to domestic life; that against defendant's will she went with a company of professional musicians, remaining away from home about three months; that she abstracted a draft for $55 from defendant's mail, forged his indorsement thereon, cashed the draft, and used the money for a trip to the Adirondacks; that she refused to accompany defendant on a business trip to the Atlantic Coast, but went instead to South Dakota, remaining from a time in July, 1904, to September 12, 1904; that on her return to Chicago (then the home of the parties hereto) she told of a romantic acquaintance with one Joseph Gahm, whom she had met in South Dakota; that she had tried in various ways to induce defendant to divide his property with her, and had commenced suit against him in Illinois for maintenance and support; and that she had wrongfully taken certain letters and documents belonging to defendant, and intended for use as evidence in this case, and had refused to give them up until her own counsel had threatened to withdraw from the case unless she surrendered them. There is also this finding: "The conduct of the plaintiff herein found has for many years embittered the life of the defendant, and has destroyed his peace of mind, seriously impaired his health, and caused him grievous mental suffering and physical pain. But the conduct of the defendant toward the plaintiff has been censorious and not duly considerate, and of a kind calculated to cause such conduct on the part of plaintiff as is hereinbefore described." While plaintiff's conduct was highly reprehensible, and while the dates of her depature for and return from South Dakota, when compared with the birth of her child, might throw grave doubt upon its paternity (although the court found that defendant was the child's father), there are other findings which justify the court's conclusion that defendant's conduct was inconsiderate. He informed his wife that "he would regard her death with satisfaction," and the court also found that "for many years before the separation of said parties the defendant was very irascible, and often displayed great ill temper and ill feeling toward the plaintiff, and treated her with unkindness." Shortly before the birth of the child, after a quarrel in which his wife had asked him to divide the property, defendant went away from home, telling plaintiff on his departure that she had "pulled his leg" for the last time. While the findings, when examined in detail, would indicate that plaintiff's misconduct was much more serious than that of her husband, we cannot say that his acts were so venial as not to justify the court's denial of the divorce to him, as well as to her.

[3, 4] Appellant contends that the finding with reference to persistent refusal to have reasonable matrimonal intercourse is sufficient of itself to establish desertion, under section 96 of the Civil Code. That section provides that: "Persistent refusal to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse as husband and wife, when health or physical condition does not make such refusal reasonably necessary, or the refusal of either party to dwell in the same house with the other party, when there is no just cause for such refusal, is desertion." The finding on this subject in the case at bar is that the plaintiff did not "at any time separate herself from the defendant with the intent to desert him. Since a time on or about the 14th day of September, 1904, the plaintiff has persistently refused at all times to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse with the defendant as husband and wife, although the health and physical condition of either party did not make such refusal reasonable or necessary; but the defendant at all such times acquiesced in such refusal of the plaintiff." If this were a new question, we would be inclined to agree with appellant; but it will be noticed that there is no finding whether or not just cause for such refusal exists. Fink v. Fink, 137 Cal. 559, 70 Pac. 628, is authority for the insufficiency of such a finding. Personally the writer of this opinion would incline to an interpretation of the statute, whereby the words "when there is no just cause for such refusal" would apply only to the refusal of either party to live in the same house with the other. But Fink v. Fink, supra, seems to have settled the law the other way. The finding just quoted appears somewhat difficult at first glance to understand. Persistent refusal on the part of one spouse to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse with the other involves a continued willingness on the part of the one refused. "Acquiescence" to such refusal cannot therefore mean "approval." It can only be used in the sense of "submission." So employed, it is easily understood.

[5] The court found that in April, 1906 (nearly two years after the refusal of plaintiff to have matrimonial intercourse with him) defendant ceased to dwell in the same house with plaintiff, "but such separation was agreeable to plaintiff, and was consented to by her." There are findings, also, that plaintiff did not "at any time separate herself from the defendant with the intent to desert him," and that defendant did not "at any time or place desert or abandon the plaintiff; nor has he without cause, or at all, refused or neglected to live with the plaintiff as her husband." Taken altogether and construed in the light most favorable to respondent, these findings merely show a mutual agreement by plaintiff and defendant to live apart and abandon marital relations. Does such mutual agreement carry with it the implication that the husband will continue to provide for the wife, and may the court, in the face of such agreement, when a divorce is denied to both parties, compel the husband to support the wife? We think not. While a husband and wife may, in the absence of ground for divorce, agree to live apart, a mere verbal contract that they shall so reside will not place upon the man the duty of support. Section 159 of the Civil Code provides that: "A husband and wife cannot, by any contract with each other, alter their legal relations, except as to property, and except that they may agree, in writing, to an immediate separation, and may make provision for the support of either of them and of their children during such separation." In Volkmar v. Volkmar, 147 Cal. 175, 81 Pac. 413, the rule was thus expressed: "In no case should a court decree permanent alimony to the wife living separate and apart from her husband, in the absence of facts showing an obligation on the part of the husband to support her under such conditions. The effect of the decree here is to compel the husband to support the wife while she continues to live separate and apart from him. It is not intimated by the findings in this case that the original separation between these parties was due to any fault of the plaintiff's husband. The wife, it is true, is found, in response to the allegations of the complaint, not to have deserted the husband, but it was not found, nor was it claimed by the answer, that the husband had deserted the wife; nor was it found that he had been guilty of willful neglect, cruelty, or any other misconduct. So far as appears, they simply voluntarily separated on December 9, 1901, and have since been living separate and apart. Although it is found that she has been ready and willing at all times to live with him as his wife, it is not found that she ever communicated her readiness and wishes in this regard to him, or that he has ever refused to allow her to live with him. If the wife was not guilty of desertion, and was ready and willing to live with the husband, and in good faith offered so to do, and he refused her offer, there would have been some ground for a claim that he had been guilty of desertion, warranting the relief given. Civ. Code, § 101. But the findings present no such case, and we doubt whether the issues made by the pleadings were broad enough to warrant a finding of desertion on the part of the husband, had one been made. A wife, living separate and apart from her husband cannot, in the absence of special agreement therefor, compel him to support her while living so separate and apart, unless such separation is caused by misconduct on his part. The obligations arising from the contract of marriage are mutual. It is as much the duty of the wife to live with the husband, as it is his duty to support her; and the duty of support will not be enforced against the husband in favor of the wife, who, without cause, fails to perform the correlative duty of living with him. See McMullin v. McMullin, 123 Cal. 653, 56 Pac. 554; Civ. Code, § 175. What misconduct on the husband's part would justify a court in requiring him to support his wife while she continues to live apart from him, it is, as already said, not necessary here to consider, for no reason at all why the wife does not return to her husband appears in the facts found by the trial court. It may, however, be said that it has been held that under our statute an action for permanent maintenance, independent of any suit for divorce, can be maintained by a wife only where the husband has been guilty of acts constituting willful desertion on his part. Hardy v. Hardy, 97 Cal. 125, 127, 31 Pac. 906."

The facts in the case at bar are stronger in favor of appellant than those shown by the record in Volkmar v. Volkmar, supra. As in that case, there is no finding that the original separation was due to the husband's fault, but differing from that case we have here the persistent and unreasonable refusal of the wife to sustain proper marital relations with her husband, long preceding any change of domicile on his part; and, although the final breaking up of the home may have occurred through mutual assent, the only overt and unreasonable act, according to the findings, was hers.

From the foregoing it follows that the judgment should be amended by striking out that portion of it whereby Walter Albert Mayr is required to pay to the plaintiff, Ann Etta Mayr, on the 1st day of each month following the entry of the said judgment, the sum of $150 for the support and maintenance of the said plaintiff and of Josef Hardin Mayr, the minor child of the parties to this action, and it is so ordered.

WIDRIN v. SUPERIOR COURT FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 1,045.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 159*)—APPEAL—BOND—EXCEPTIONS—TIME FOR MAKING.

An appeal from a justice's judgment is perfected by appellee's failure to except to the bond within five days after its filing, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 978a; he not being entitled to five days after receiving notice of the filing.

2. MANDAMUS (§ 31*) — CERTIORARI (§ 28*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—COMPELLING ASSUMPTION OF JURISDICTION OF CAUSE.

The remedy against a superior court's refusal to hear an appeal from a justice's court under the erroneous assumption that the appeal was not perfected is by writ of mandate to compel assumption of jurisdiction, and not by writ of review.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 31;* Certiorari, Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

Petition by M. Widrin for writ of review against the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco and another. Mandate issued.

Charles S. Perry, for petitioner. Gerald C. Halsey, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is a petition for a writ of review.

The petitioner was the defendant in a certain action in the justices' court entitled, "L. Bingham versus M. Widrin." Such proceedings were had therein that a judgment was regularly entered in favor of plaintiff and against the petitioner. Within 30 days after the rendition and entry of the judgment, to wit, on November 30, 1910, the petitioner served and filed a notice of appeal, filed an undertaking in proper form, and on December 10th gave notice thereof. On December 12th the plaintiff served a notice of exception to the sureties, whereupon the petitioner gave notice that the sureties would justify on December 16th. At the time and place specified the sureties appeared, and were ready and willing to qualify, but on account of an order theretofore made by the justice of the peace before whom the case was tried, and before whom the justification was noticed to be made, all matters on his calendar for that day were postponed for one week; and by virtue of this order and by reason of the absence of the justice the examination of the sureties went over for one week, at which time other sureties appeared and qualified. Subsequently the papers in the case were transmitted to the superior court; and in the month of June, 1911, said court, upon a motion regularly made, dismissed the petitioner's appeal upon the ground that the sureties had not qualified within five days after exception to their sufficiency, as required by section 978a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The petitioner relies principally upon the doctrine laid down in the case of Dobson v. Dobson, 7 Neb. 296, which holds that, where a party has done all the law requires him to do, he shall not suffer because of the absence or fault of the court; but the view we have reached on another phase of the case renders a decision of this point unnecessary.

[1] The attorney for the plaintiff acted upon the assumption—not without plausible reason—that he had five days after receiving notice of the filing of the bond within which to except to the sureties, and, accordingly, did not except to their sufficiency until twelve days after the filing of the bond. This, according to several recent decisions, was seven days late, for those cases hold that the giving of notice of the filing of the bond is not jurisdictional, and that notice of exception to the sufficiency of sureties must, following the language of the Code, be given within five days from the filing of the bond. W. P. Jeffries Co. v. Sup. Ct., 13 Cal. App. 193, 109 Pac. 147; Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Sup. Ct., 114 Pac. 978; Blake v. Sup. Ct., 118 Pac. 448, decided by this court August 31, 1911. We hold, therefore, that the bond having been duly filed, and the sureties thereon not being excepted to within the time required by law, the appeal was properly perfected, and that the superior court, therefore, had jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal.

The petition in the present case is for a writ of review; but it has been recently held that, where an inferior court dismisses a cause upon the erroneous assumption that it has no jurisdiction to entertain the same, its action is tantamount to a refusal to hear and determine the cause, and that the aggrieved party's remedy is by a writ of mandate to compel the court to do so. Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Sup. Ct., supra.

It is therefore ordered that a writ of mandate issue from this court, directed to the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to Hon. John J. Van Nostrand, judge thereof, commanding said court and judge to proceed to hear and determine the said cause.

3. ELECTRICITY (§ 19*)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action against an electric company for the death of two children who, by moving a loose wire against one carrying a dangerous current, received a fatal shock, the questions whether the loose wire would be likely to attract children, whether it might be anticipated that the wire would be brought in contact with the electric wire, and whether the electric company might reasonably have ascertained the condition of the loose wire held, under the evidence, to be for the jury.

4. TRIAL (§ 194*)—NEGLIGENT INJURY—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the question whether an electric company exercised due care to discover defects was, under the evidence, one for the jury, an instruction that if it conducted a heavy current of electricity over certain wires and maintained a guy wire above them, which was loose, the end lying in the street, so that it might be drawn against the electric wires, it was liable, was, in an action against the company for the death of two children killed in that manner, erroneous as taking the question from the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 439–441, 446–454, 456–466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 139*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction directing a verdict for the plaintiff in case the jury find certain facts to be true must embrace all things necessary to show the legal liability of the defendant, and hence, in an action against an electric company for maintaining an attractive nuisance, such an instruction authorizing a recovery, without finding that the so-called nuisance was attractive, or that it might have been reasonably anticipated that injury would occur, was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 296*) — INSTRUCTIONS — ERROR CURED BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action against an electric company for the death of two children, an instruction authorizing a recovery upon the finding of certain facts omitted several elements necessary to show legal liability, the giving of instructions at defendant's request which stated the law correctly merely created a conflict of instructions, and did not cure the error; it being impossible to say which the jury followed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705–713; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

7. ELECTRICITY (§ 19*)—NEGLIGENT INJURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against an electric company for the death of two children, an instruction that, unless the children were both guilty of contributory negligence, there should be a verdict for plaintiff, was erroneous in authorizing a verdict for the death of both the children, even though one of the children was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 240*)—ARGUMENTATIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against an electric company for the death of boys who brought a loose guy wire in contact with a wire carrying a heavy current and thus received a fatal shock, an instruction that "boys can seldom be said to be negligent when they merely follow the irresistible impulses of their own nature, and instincts common to all boys," was erroneous, being argumentative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 561; Dec. Dig. § 240.*]

9. ELECTRICITY (§ 19*)—NEGLIGENT INJURY—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against an electric company for the death of boys who brought a loose guy wire in contact with one carrying a heavy current and thus received a fatal shock, an instruction "that if you find that the defendant in arranging its electric wires and permitting the existence of the guy wire in such dangerous proximity as to reasonably anticipate that children from the street might bring the same in contact with the electric wires, and that the wires were improperly insulated, you should find that defendant was negligent," was not only unintelligible, but erroneous in intimating that the defendant permitted the guy wire to hang in such dangerous proximity to the electric wire that it should have anticipated that children might bring it in contact with the electric wires.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

10. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*) — APPLIANCES ATTRACTIVE TO CHILDREN.

Where a boy 13 years of age, upon being dared by his companions, brought a loose guy wire in contact with an uninsulated electric wire, and was killed, he cannot as a matter of law be held to be without the protection of the attractive nuisance doctrine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

11. ELECTRICITY (§ 19*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CHILDREN.

In the above case, held, that the boy was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

12. NEGLIGENCE (§ 85*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CHILDREN—CARE REQUIRED.

An infant is only bound to exercise such care as children of his age ordinarily exercise.

13. NEGLIGENCE (§ 89*)—NEGLIGENT INJURY—DEFENSES.

The elder of two brothers, on being dared by his companions, pulled a loose guy wire into contact with an uninsulated electric wire, receiving a fatal shock. The younger brother, in his efforts to save the elder, was also killed. Held that, unless the owner of the electric wire was guilty of negligence in causing the death of the elder, there could be no recovery for the death of the younger, but that, if the owner was negligent, the mere fact that the older brother's negligence contributed would not bar recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 130–137; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

14. TRIAL (§ 108½*)—NEGLIGENCE (§ 124*)—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—REFERENCE TO INSURANCE OF DEFENDANT.

In an action for damages for personal injuries, evidence that the defendant is insured against loss is inadmissible, and, while counsel may ask jurors such questions as are reasonably necessary to determine their freedom from bias, a question by plaintiff's attorney merely for the purpose of getting such fact before the jury is improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 108½;* Negligence, Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by M. Pierce against the United Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying its motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Samuel Rosenheim and Bernard Silverstein, for appellant. Frank H. Gould and Beasly & Fry, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action by the mother of two minor children, Albert Pierce and Walter Pierce, the father being dead, to recover damages for the death of said children, which is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The jury gave a verdict in favor of plaintiff, fixing the damages for the death of Albert at $4,900, and for the death of Walter at $5,100. A motion for a new trial being made, the trial court ordered a new trial, unless plaintiff consented to a reduction of the judgment to $1,500 for the death of Albert and $2,500 for the death of Walter, an aggregate of $4,000. Plaintiff agreed to this reduction, and the court made an order denying the motion for a new trial. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying the motion for a new trial.

Albert and Walter were killed on February 12, 1907. At that time they were, respectively, 13 and 11 years of age. They were ordinarily bright and capable boys and obedient and industrious, and Albert, although attending school, assisted in a very small way in the support of the family, consisting of his mother, Walter, another younger brother, and himself. Defendant was a public service corporation engaged in furnishing electric light and power to the city of San Jose and its inhabitants. For the purposes of its business, it maintained a line of poles and electric wires along the northeasterly side of the Alameda, a public highway running between San Jose and Santa Clara. The accident occurred near one of these poles. The pole was 36 feet high. A cross-arm thereof, on which were strung four electric wires, was 18 feet from the ground. This cross-arm extended from the pole out into the street, all the portion used for wires being on the street side of the pole, and the first wire on the cross-arm being 6 feet from the pole. The voltage of the current carried on these wires was between 2,200 and 2,500. A guy wire reaching from the apex of this pole to a stump or tree in the field on the northeasterly side of the Alameda, 40 feet from the pole, where it was fastened, had been maintained by defendant for several years. Some time prior to the accident, two weeks or more according to the findings of the jury, this wire had by some means unknown become detached from the stump or tree. This had not been done by any officer, agent, or employé of defendant, or with its knowledge or consent, and up to the time of the accident defendant had no actual knowledge that it had been so detached. By reason of being so detached, it hung on February 12, 1907, in a natural perpendicular position from the top to the bottom of the pole, its surplus length lying on the ground at the foot of the pole in folds or curves in the manner of a wire which had been rolled. As long as it so hung it was without electricity, and was absolutely incapable of harm to any one touching it, and it could become dangerous only by being carried out some distance in the street and brought into contact with one of the electric wires. If so brought into contact with the electric wire next to the pole, it would at once become as dangerous to one touching it as would the electric wire itself. The insulation on such electric wire had become worn or disintegrated.

Late in the afternoon of February 12, 1907, six boys of the neighborhood, ranging from eight to thirteen years of age, were playing in the vicinity of this pole. Two of the boys, Albert Pierce and Marshall Prosser, were playing together in the field a short distance away, while Sylvester Pierce, an eight year old brother of the deceased boys, Stephen Valdez, aged eleven years, Clark McChesney, aged eight years, and Walter Pierce, were playing with the guy wire by swinging back and forth thereon. These boys had been in the habit of playing with this wire for at least several days. While so playing, Sylvester Pierce took the guy wire sufficiently far into the street to bring it lightly in contact with the electric wire, and received a slight shock. He told the other boys about it, encouraging them to try it. Stephen Valdez started to do so, but dropped the wire before making the contact, being evidently apprehensive. Then Clark McChesney took it and brought the guy wire into contact with the electric wire, and was knocked down by the consequent shock. Thereupon Albert and young Prosser were called over, and told about the discovery. Albert was then dared to try it, and, answering, "Who's afraid?" took hold of the guy wire and drew it taut against the electric wire, and thereby received an electric shock which killed him instantly. He fell to the ground with the guy wire in his hand. Walter, upon seeing his brother fall, at once jumped to his rescue, with the result that he was also killed by a shock of electricity from the wire. Although in answer to special inquiries the jury found that Albert did not know prior to taking hold of the guy wire that Sylvester and Clark had received shocks, or that he would receive a shock if he brought the two wires into contact, the evidence shows without conflict that he must have known both these things. The jury found that he had just been informed of the experience of Sylvester and Clark in that regard and had been dared to try it himself. Of course, he did not appreciate the extent of the danger. But the inference is irresistible that he knew his proposed act would cause him to receive an electric shock, and that he intentionally brought the guy wire into contact with the electric wire for the purpose of receiving a shock.

[1] While Walter also knew that electric shocks had been produced by bringing the wires together, the jury was entirely justified in concluding that it had not been shown that he was guilty of contributory negligence. If the facts detailed are not such as to compel the conclusion as matter of law that Albert was guilty of contributory negligence, we think that a sufficient case was made for the jury to sustain a verdict for plaintiff on account of his death.

It is true that the guy wire hanging suspended from the top of the pole was in no way dangerous as a conductor of electricity, unless put by some trespasser to an unwarranted use. It was devoid of electricity, and could not transmit the same to any one touching it, unless it was brought in contact with the electric wires 18 feet above the street. To accomplish this, it was necessary to carry the wire at least several feet out into the street. But by reason of its character it might reasonably be concluded that, when taken in connection with the proximity of the high power electric wires of defendant, and the ease with which contact between it and the electric wires could be made, it was a dangerous contrivance to children who might lawfully be on the public highway in the vicinity of the pole.

[3] It cannot be doubted, however, that the question whether this guy wire, hanging as it did, free from danger to any one who did not deliberately pick it up and carry it to a point where it would come in contact with the electric wire, would be likely to attract children and lead them to play with it, the question whether in such play it might reasonably be anticipated that it would be brought in contact with the electric wire, and the question whether the defendant by the exercise of reasonable care would have known of the condition of the guy wire, were, in the condition of the evidence, questions for the jury. The evidence was not such that these questions or any of them could be answered one way or the other as matter of law.

[4] Under the circumstances of this case and in view of what we have said, there can be no question that instruction 6 given at the request of plaintiff, was prejudicially erroneous. That instruction, after declaring the duty of a person or corporation using the public streets for its business to use due care toward the public, proceeded as follows: "If you find that electricity is a highly dangerous and subtle agency, giving no evidence of its existence in deadly quantities until the fatal stroke, if you find that defendant conducted a current of electricity of great intensity and power over wires running along the public street as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and also maintained a guy wire or rope without insulation attached above said electric wires so conveying said electric current, its lower end reaching to the public streets and lying thereon and such wire or rope hanging in such close proximity to said electric wires that children playing with such guy wire or rope might readily draw it against such electric wires, I instruct you that such act on the part of defendant constituted negligence, and, unless the two children of plaintiff were both guilty of contributory negligence, you should render a verdict for plaintiff." Manifestly this instruction directed a verdict for plaintiff on account of the death of Albert, upon the finding by the jury of the various facts specified therein.

Bearing in mind that there is no pretense that defendant actually knew of the condition of the guy wire, it is clear that the word "maintained" could not be taken by the jury as meaning anything more than a mere failure on its part to obviate the defects in such condition by reason of the end having become detached from the tree or stump, regardless entirely of whether or not its admitted ignorance of the condition was due to a failure on its part to exercise reasonable care in the matter of inspection. In other words, so far as this particular element is concerned, the jury was practically instructed that it was enough to convict defendant of negligence, that the guy wire was hanging from the top of the pole with one end on the ground, although defendant had originally fastened such ground end to a tree or stump, had no knowledge that the condition had been changed, and had exercised due care in the matter of inspection to see that its poles and wires continued in a condition free from danger to others. Whether or not the defendant exercised due care in the matter of inspection to discover defects was, upon the evidence given in this case, solely a question for a jury, and the court could not properly take that question from it. A similar error occurred in the giving of instruction 5, where the word "permitted" was used, instead of the word "maintained." It is barely possible that, in view of the finding of the jury that this guy wire had been detached from the stump or tree "for two weeks or more," these errors might be deemed nonprejudicial, for it may be that, considering the dangerous nature of the agency used by defendant, a failure to discover the change in condition for a period of "two weeks or more" could be held as matter of law to be negligence. But it is not necessary to decide this question, for instruction 6 was certainly in other respects to be noted prejudically erroneous, and on a new trial the errors above referred to may easily be obviated.

[5] This instruction takes entirely from the jury the question whether the guy wire in the locality where it was and hanging as it did would be likely to attract children and lead them to play with it, and the question whether in such play it might reasonably be anticipated that the guy wire would be brought into contact with the electric wire. Unless both of these questions are answered in the affirmative, defendant, under the circumstances shown by the evidence, was not guilty of negligence in any respect material in this case. By omitting these elements from a specification of the things that would warrant a verdict for plaintiff, in an instruction directing a verdict for plaintiff if the jury finds the specified things, the trial judge decided both of these questions against defendant, and directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff regardless of the views of the jury on such questions, and this in a case where clearly the evidence was not such as to compel answers against defendant as matter of law. It is clear that an instruction directing a verdict for the plaintiff in the event that the jury finds certain facts to be true must embrace all the things necessary to show the legal liability of the defendant and to warrant the direction or conclusion contained therein that plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, and such is the rule in this state. See Killelea v. California, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 602, 74 Pac. 157. This instruction practically directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff, although the jury might conclude, upon evidence sufficient to support their conclusion, that the guy wire hanging as it did was not of such a nature and so situated that it could reasonably have been anticipated that it would attract or induce children to employ it as a plaything, or that in such play it would be brought into contact with the electric wire.

[6] We have not been able to find anything in the record that would warrant us in holding that this instruction was not prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant, nothing to overcome the effect of this explicit direction for a verdict in favor of plaintiff it the jury finds the facts specified therein, and contributory negligence on the part of the children is not shown. It is true that other instructions were given at the request of defendant that stated the law in these respects as favorably to defendant as was warranted, if not more favorably. But the giving of these other instructions simply produced a clear conflict in the instructions given the jury by the court, and it is impossible for us to say which instruction the jury followed in arriving at a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Learned counsel for plaintiff make no reply to the claim of defendant in this behalf.

[7] There is some force in the further contention of defendant that this instruction directs a verdict for plaintiff for damages on account of the death of Albert, even if Albert was guilty of contributory negligence, provided Walter was not so guilty. Such a direction would, of course, be erroneous. In the event of a new trial, such an error will undoubtedly be avoided.

[8] We see nothing, in view of the facts of this case, in the points made by defendant against plaintiff's instructions 8 and 14. Plaintiff's instruction 15 was in part somewhat argumentative and the portion stating that "boys can seldom be said to be negligent when they merely follow the irresistible impulses of their own nature and instincts common to all boys" might well have been omitted, being altogether too uncertain for the purposes of an instruction, and partaking too strongly of the nature of argument.

[9] The concluding portion of plaintiff's instruction 16, the portion purporting to enumerate facts upon the finding of which it would be the duty of the jury to find the defendant guilty of negligence is, as set forth in the transcript, absolutely unintelligible. It is: "And if you therefore find that the defendant in arranging and maintaining its electric wires and in permitting the existence of the guy wire alleged in plaintiff's complaint in such dangerous proximity thereto as to reasonably anticipate that children upon the street might bring the same in contact with the said wires, and that said wires were improperly insulated, it is your duty to find that the defendant was negligent in so maintaining such a condition of affairs." The unintelligibility herein is doubtless the result of a clerical error. As the record shows this instruction, it is also open to the objection of intimating that the defendant did in fact permit the existence of the guy wire in such dangerous proximity to the electric wire that it should reasonably have anticipated that children upon the street might bring the same in contact with such electric wire.

[10, 11] Upon the question of contributory negligence upon the part of Albert, specific instructions given by the trial court were of such a nature as to absolutely preclude, in view of the evidence, a verdict on account of his death. By instruction 32 the jury was instructed that if the jury found that if the children had not carried the guy wire towards the center of the street for the express purpose of receiving electric shocks, but had simply played with it around the pole, they would not have been killed, and that the only reason for their deaths was their own act in expressly causing the wire rope to come into contact with the overhead electric power wire for the purpose of receiving electric shocks, the act of the children and not the negligence of the defendant, if any there was, was the proximate cause of their death, and its verdict must be for defendant. By instruction 33 the jury was instructed that if simply playing with the guy wire, in ordinary play, would not have caused a contact of the wires, but that they came in contact by reason of the direct and premeditated act of the deceased children, the act of the children was the proximate cause of their death, and verdict must go for the defendant. By instruction 44 the jury was instructed that if it found that the deceased children knew, before they carried the wire rope out toward the street car tracks, that by so doing they would bring it into contact with the live wire, and that they would then receive electric shocks, which might injure them, and that they would not have been killed if they had not committed this act, then it must find that the children came to their death through their own negligence and a verdict must be for the defendant. By instruction 45 the jury was instructed that if it found that neither the wire rope nor the electric wire placed as it was could alone have caused the death of plaintiff's children, and if it found that it was the act of the deceased children themselves that brought the other elements together, thus causing the result complained of, to wit, the charging of the wire rope with electricity so as to cause their deaths, then the proximate cause was the act of the children, and the verdict must be for the defendant. By instruction 57 the jury was instructed that if Albert was warned not to touch the wire rope, and did thereafter take hold of it upon being dared by one of the other boys, and if it further found that he knew that he would get shocked by so taking hold of said rope, but that he nevertheless did so with the result that he was killed, then Albert met his death through his own negligence, and the verdict must be for the defendant. Instruction 45 was practically a direction for a verdict for defendant, so far at least as Albert was concerned, for there never was even a pretense in the case that either the electric wire or the guy wire could cause injury so long as they were not brought in contact with each other, or that it was not the act of Albert that brought them together. While the instruction was too favorable to defendant, unless Albert was shown by the evidence to have been guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, it was one of those given to the jury. The other instructions referred to, with the possible exception of instruction 44, were practically, as we view the evidence, also instructions for a verdict in favor of defendant, for notwithstanding one or two answers of the jury to questions submitted, the evidence was such, as we view it, to compel a verdict for the defendant if these instructions were followed by the jury. These instructions, according to our opinion, were also too favorable for defendant, for we do not believe that it can be held as matter of law, either that Albert had attained such an age that he was not within the protection of the "attractive nuisance" doctrine, or that he was guilty of contributory negligence. We think that it was a question for the jury whether the defendant should reasonably have anticipated that the contrivance was of such a nature that it would naturally attract children as old as Albert to play with it, even to the extent of endeavoring to obtain electric shocks, without any realization whatever of the extent of the danger to which they were exposing themselves, and that it was also a question for the jury whether Albert did not exercise that degree of care to avoid injury that a child of his age should exercise under the circumstances shown in this case. It is, of course, apparent that as a matter of fact he had no idea of the extent of the danger to which he was subjecting himself, and it would be entirely reasonable to infer that he could have anticipated no serious bodily harm, nothing more serious than his predecessors, Sylvester and Clark McChesney, had suffered.

[12] He was bound to the exercise of such care as children of his age ordinarily exercise, and we think that the evidence was such as to make this question one for the jury to determine. We are not to be understood as declaring that the judgment against defendant should be reversed because instructions too favorable to defendant were given, but have deemed it proper to discuss these instructions for the purposes of a new trial.

For the same purposes, it is proper to say that the evidence as to Walter was such as to warrant a finding that he was not guilty of contributory negligence if, indeed, it did not compel such finding.

[13] Whether or not a recovery could be had on account of Walter's death, assuming that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, depends entirely, we think, upon the question whether or not there was any negligence on the part of defendant in so far as Albert was concerned, regardless entirely of whether Albert was guilty of contributory negligence. In other words, defendant cannot be liable for Walter's death, caused by his effort to save Albert from injury, however praiseworthy that effort was, unless Albert's dangerous condition was due, in part at least, to defendant's negligence. Unless defendant was guilty of negligence toward Albert, it could not be liable at all under the undisputed facts of this case. But if it was guilty of negligence toward Albert, in maintaining the condition of affairs shown by the evidence in this case, then the mere fact that Albert's negligence, if there was such negligence on his part, contributed to his death, would not free defendant from liability as to Walter, unless Walter was also guilty of contributory negligence.

[14] Evidence that a defendant in an action for damages is insured against loss by reason thereof is not admissible (Roche v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 140 Cal. 563, 74 Pac. 147), and it would undoubtedly be improper for counsel for plaintiff to endeavor to get such a fact before the jury by question designed solely for that purpose. While it is entirely proper for counsel to ask jurors such questions as may reasonably be necessary to ascertain whether they are free from bias or interest that may affect their verdict, we do not think that it is ordinarily essential to ask questions in such a way as to bring the fact of such insurance before the jurors. Counsel should be fair toward the court and the defendant in such matters, and unfairness on their part having the effect of bringing the fact of insurance to the attention of the jury might well be regarded as prejudicial misconduct. We are not to be understood as intimating that the attorneys for plaintiff were intentionally unfair in this respect, for the record does not so indicate to us.

As to the matter of the measure of damages in an action by a mother for the death of her minor child, it is unnecessary, for the purposes of a new trial to do more than to cite the recent case of Bond v. United Railroads, etc., 113 Pac. 366.

There is no other matter that appears to require discussion.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.; SHAW, J.

SLOSS, J., deems himself disqualified to participate herein and therefore declines to act.

LEGAULT v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF CITY OF ROSEVILLE et al.

(Sac. 1,859.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 154*)—REMOVAL—POWER.

A municipality has no common-law power to remove municipal officers in the absence of an express grant, either in the charter or by general law, so that, where the Legislature has provided a specific form of proceeding for the removal of officers, the power within the corporation ceased to be indispensable to corporate existence, and its exercise at most a mere convenience.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 350; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 154*)—OFFICERS—DISMISSAL—PROCEEDINGS—POWERS.

Pol. Code, § 4386, empowers the mayor of cities to suspend, and, with the common council, to remove, any nonelective officer, and Municipal Corporation Act (Gen. Laws 1910, Act 2348) § 852, empowers the board of trustees of a city to appoint an attorney, poundmaster, superintendent of streets, civil engineer, and such police and subordinate officers as they may deem necessary, and to fix their compensation, each of such officers holding at the pleasure of the board. Held, that Pen. Code, §§ 758–772, providing for the removal of civil officers otherwise than by impeachment, prescribes an exclusive method for the removal of elective officers of a city governed under the municipal corporation act, and hence the city's board of trustees had no power to remove its marshal for dereliction of duty on a hearing before the board.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 350; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Petition by Oscar L. Legault for writ of review against the Board of Trustees of the City of Roseville and others. From an order granting the relief prayed, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James D. Meredith, J. B. Landis, and P. H. Johnson, for appellants. Harris & Gibson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The city of Roseville is a city of the sixth class. Oscar L. Legault, petitioner, is or was the duly elected, qualified, and acting marshal of the city. The board of trustees preferred charges against the marshal for dereliction of duty, and cited him to show cause why he should not be removed from office. After a hearing, the board of trustees formally ordered the petitioner to be removed from the office of marshal of the city of Roseville. Legault then petitioned for a writ of review, seeking to have it declared that the action of the board of trustees in the premises was in excess of its powers and jurisdiction, and therefore void. The trustees interposed a general demurrer to this petition. This being overruled, the petition admittedly setting forth the facts, and, the trustees consequently being unable to join issue by denial, they filed no answer, and judgment passed for petitioner as prayed for.

[1] The trustees appeal, and the appeal presents for consideration a single question: Where the charter of a municipality is silent upon the matter, does the corporation, acting through its trustees, possess the power to remove an elective officer of the municipality?

It is not questioned but that the charter in terms confers no such power. But the argument for appellants is that at common law this power was regarded as a necessary incident to the functions of all municipal corporations; that, not having been prohibited to this corporation, it exists and is to be exercised with other powers by the board of trustees; and that the provisions of the Penal Code (§§ 758–772) must be considered as fixing an alternative, and not an exclusive, method for amotion of municipal officers.

Since the decision of Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Richardson, 1 Burr. 539, it has become an accepted doctrine that this power, based upon necessity, is a common-law incident to the powers of English municipal corporations. Considering the nature of the origin of such corporations, resting in some instances in a royal charter, in others on parliamentary grant, and in others in immemorial custom, with rights wrung through stubborn resistance to oppression, it must at once be recognized that the municipal powers of such corporations stand upon an entirely different plane from those of the state of California, where in every instance the municipal powers are measured by the express terms of written grants issued directly or indirectly from the state. This is pointed out in Herzo v. San Francisco, 33 Cal. 143, where it is said: "It should not fail to be noted that there is a clear distinction between most municipal corporations as they exist in Great Britain and those of more recent date in the United States. The former depend upon prescription for their existence and capacity; while the latter find every element of their jurisdiction within their respective charters." Full assent is given to the rule of necessity, upon which the English decisions rest, that rule being that it is necessary that a corporation shall have the power to purge itself of offending officers. But this language was addressed to conditions here nonexistent, to conditions where Parliament had never attempted to pass a law to meet the needs of such corporations, and where, therefore, if the power of amotion did not exist in the corporation itself, it did not exist at all excepting when a municipal officer might be guilty of an indictable crime and could be proceeded against accordingly. It was to this condition that the language of Lord Mansfield was addressed. But if Parliament had passed a law applicable to all municipal corporations, providing in terms a method for the removal of derelict or recalcitrant officials, only then would there have been any sort of parallel between the English condition and the condition of this state, and even in such a case the parallel by no means would have been perfect. Judge Dillon ventures the opinion that the common-law power of English municipal corporations is possessed by American corporations "in the absence of any express or implied restriction in the charter." Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 242. While Judge Dillon declares that the question is not judicially settled, support is found for his view in certain jurisdictions, and notably in such cases as Mayor of Savannah v. Grayson, 104 Ga. 114, 30 S. E. 693, and Richards v. Clarksburg, 30 W. Va. 491, 4 S. E. 774. These and the cases of their class go to the extent of declaring that such power exists in the corporation as a necessary incident to the objects and purposes for which it is created, in the absence of any prohibition in the law upon the exercise of such powers. But, so far as our investigations have disclosed, in no one of these cases has the state made provision, applicable to all municipal corporations, for the removal of officers by judicial proceeding. We are not in this to be understood as declaring that the removal of a municipal officer by the municipality is such a judicial proceeding as to require the action of formally organized courts of judicature, but indisputably such amotion is the exercise of a judicial function, and the Legislature may have thought that it could, therefore, with greater propriety be intrusted exclusively to the judicial branch of the government. Thus says Mechem (Pub. Offices and Officers, § 455), "proceedings for the removal of an officer for cause are judicial in their nature and must be had before tribunals clothed with judicial power. The fit and appropriate tribunal, therefore, in ordinary cases is the court of law, but the judicial power may be, and even is conferred on the Governor, the mayor, or other officer or board having power of removal." Undoubtedly the Legislature of this state has done this precise thing in the sections of the Penal Code above cited. The case presented then is not the case of necessity. It is not the case where a municipality must be declared to have the power to remove its officers, or it can never clean its house. It is the case where the law has provided general machinery, full and complete, to meet the case of any and all municipal officers, where the necessity for the exercise by the municipality of such power within itself is removed, and where the final question for determination is whether the Legislature in the enactment of laws vesting the general power of amotion in the courts nevertheless designed (by its mere silence) still to leave the full power of amotion with all municipalities, and by these positive enactments to declare only that the municipality could resort to the courts if it desired.

While the question here stated has never been formally presented for determination, this circumstance itself must be construed as in the nature of an admission that throughout the history of the state the power asserted was not supposed to exist. And indeed, the existence of such power is contrary to the whole trend of judicial decision and legislative enactment. Thus, in Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 151, 38 Pac. 682, it is declared by this court in bank, quoting from Dillon on Municipal Corporations that "it is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers and no others: (1) Those granted in express words. (2) Those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted. (3) Those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied." And to the same effect is Hyatt v. Williams, 148 Cal. 585, 84 Pac. 41. The necessary deduction to be drawn from this language is that where the Legislature, as in this state, has provided a specific form of proceeding for the amotion of officers, the power of amotion within the corporation ceases to be indispensable to the corporation, and its exercise by the corporation becomes at the most but a convenience.

Moreover, the decisions of this court will be found to rest upon the decided assumption at least that the power of removing municipal officers does not rest within the municipality, unless there be an express grant to this end either in the charter or by general law. Thus in Lorbeer v. Hutchinson, 111 Cal. 273, 43 Pac. 896, where the trustees of the city of Pomona declared the office of city marshal vacant and appointed to fill the vacancy, this court said: "If Lorbeer (the petitioner) was lawfully in office, the trustees could not by declaring the office vacant deprive him of his office. They have no power to remove from office or by any judicial inquiry to declare a vacancy." In Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 316, 74 Pac. 997, the whole discussion is based upon the power of removal granted by the charter. The same is true in the case of Coffey v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 525, 82 Pac. 75, where is found such language as this: "Provisions of the charter seem to apply only to some officers and the scheme for the removal of delinquent officers is to that extent incomplete. * * * There is nowhere in the charter any provision which in terms confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the board of trustees to proceed to remove municipal officers, nor is there apparent in any charter provision an intent that this provision should supersede the provisions of the general law found in the Penal Code relative to the removal of delinquent officials from office. * * * The power conferred under the charter is, strictly speaking, the power of expulsion or amotion of its municipal officers. * * * This power of expulsion, amotion or quasi impeachment of delinquent municipal officers has generally been considered, both at common law and in this country, as an incident of corporate existence, and is exercised by the municipality as an administrative duty springing from its political existence and as vital thereto. * * * It is, strictly speaking, this administrative power which is conferred upon the trustees of the city of Sacramento under the charter." In Craig v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 482, 108 Pac. 310, the provisions of an express grant of power in the charter to the city of Stockton are considered. The provisions of section 16 of article 20 of the Constitution are quoted to the effect that "in the case of any officer or employé of any municipality governed under a legally adopted charter the provisions of such charter with reference to the tenure of office or the dismissal from office of any such officer or employé shall control," and it is held touching the employment, retention, and dismissal of members of the police and fire departments of the city of Stockton that the charter provisions are controlling and exclusive. In Dinan v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 217, 91 Pac. 806, the same question arose touching the provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, and it was there held in conformity with the provision of the Constitution above quoted that the procedure prescribed by the charter was exclusive. In Croly v. City of Sacramento, 119 Cal. 229, 51 Pac. 323, this court considered the provisions of the charter of the city of Sacramento authorizing the board of trustees to try and remove appointees against whom charges had been preferred. Here the court refused to pass upon the question as to whether or not the city possessed the common-law power of amotion but placed its decision solely upon the charter provision.

It is inconceivable, if the power of amotion of its officers is inherent in a municipal corporation, even when its charter is silent on the subject, that this court would not long ago have so declared and thus have done away with a vast amount of the argumentative reasoning in which it has indulged, and which is and was entirely superfluous, if the contention of appellant herein is sound. Moreover, if the power here contended for was inherent in the municipality there would be little or no import to the language of section 16, art. 20, of the Constitution, which undertakes in express terms to make the provisions of a municipal charter controlling with reference to the tenure of office or the dismissal from office of officers and employés of a municipality, for, if the power exists as is here contended for, this solemn declaration of the Constitution accomplished nothing and at the most was but the recognition of a power already existent.

[2] And, finally, upon this proposition, the legislative enactments have their significance. Section 4386 of the Political Code empowers the mayor "to suspend and with the consent of the common council, to remove any nonelected officer, stating in the suspension or removal the cause thereof." Section 852 of the municipal corporation act (Gen. Laws 1910, Act 2348), which is the governing charter of the city of Roseville, empowers the board of trustees to appoint an "attorney, poundmaster, superintendent of streets, civil engineer and such police and such other and subordinate officers as in their judgment may be deemed necessary and fix their compensation and each of said officers shall hold office during the pleasure of the board." The significance of these legislative declarations is found in this: First, that they are made applicable to nonelected officers and not to elective officers; and, second, if the power contended for inherently exists, it would be stultification for the Legislature to provide with careful detail for the removal of nonelective officers when the city itself possesses the inherent power to remove nonelective as well as elective officers.

It is concluded, therefore, that as to municipal corporations within this state the general law touching the removal of its officers creates an implied restriction upon the exercise of what may be thought to be the inherent power of amotion. The necessity for the existence and exercise of that power being removed, it becomes at the best but a convenience. The power may be, notwithstanding the existence of the general laws, conferred by charter, and, when so conferred, will be construed, depending upon the nature of the language, as being either concurrent as in Coffey v. Superior Court, supra, or exclusive as in Craig v. Superior Court, supra. Const. art. 20, § 16.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

WERNER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 5,798.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 17, 1911.)

1. Justices of the Peace (§ 159*)—Appeal—Defective Bond—Effect.

Where plaintiff in a suit before a justice of the peace appealed from an adverse judgment, a bond by which he agreed to pay all costs and damages awarded against "the defendant," instead of against "plaintiff," was defective, but was not a nullity, so as to deprive the superior court of jurisdiction of the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 567, 576; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

2. Justices of the Peace (§ 159*)—Appeal—Bond—Justification.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 92, providing that sureties on appeal, or on any bond or undertaking, given in any cause or proceeding before a justice court, may justify before any one of the justices, where a cause in the justice court was assigned for trial to a particular justice, as authorized by section 90, the justification of the sureties on an appeal bond before another justice of the court was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 555; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

3. Justices of the Peace (§ 159*)—Appeal—Bond—Correction.

Where a bond on appeal from a justice of the peace was defective, in that it provided for the payment of costs and damages to the wrong party, appellant was entitled to correct the error by filing a corrected bond by leave of court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 573, 577; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

In Bank. Application by Charles Werner for a writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Frank J. Murasky, Judge thereof. Denied, and writ discharged.

F. J. Castelhun, for petitioner. L. Seidenberg, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from proceeding with the hearing and determination of a case appealed to it from the justices' court, upon the ground that the superior court had never acquired jurisdiction of the cause upon appeal.

[1] In support of his application petitioner contends that the undertaking given on appeal is so radically defective as to be a nullity, wherefore the superior court never acquired jurisdiction. McCracken v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 74, 24 Pac. 845. The defect in the undertaking, which it is contended thus completely destroys it, is this: The instrument provides that the sureties will pay all costs and damages awarded against "the defendant"; whereas, the plaintiff being the appellant, it should have read "plaintiff" or "appellant." That this palpable error is not sufficient to vitiate the undertaking and render it a nullity is decided in Swain v. Graves, 8 Cal. 549, under facts and circumstances well-nigh identical with those here presented. It follows, therefore, that the error rendered the undertaking merely defective, and not a nullity.

[2] Under section 90, Code of Civil Procedure, the case in the justices' court was assigned for trial to Justice A. B. Treadwell. Subsequently the sureties justified before Justice Isadore Golden, another justice of the same justices' court. This was after due notice to the defendant. It is contended that this justification was a nullity; but section 92 of the same Code expressly provides that "sureties on appeal or on any bond or undertaking given in any cause or proceeding in said court when required to justify may justify before any one of the justices." The justification, therefore, was not a nullity.

[3] It is made to appear that a corrected undertaking, by leave of the court first had, was filed in the superior court before which the appeal was pending. This was a permissible procedure, and cured the error complained of. Coulter v. Stark, 7 Cal. 245; McCracken v. Superior Court, supra.

Wherefore the relief prayed for is denied, and the writ discharged.

Ex parte SMITH. (Cr. 1691.)

HABEAS CORPUS (§ 92*)—ATTACK OF AFFIRMED JUDGMENT.

One, whose judgment of conviction has been affirmed on appeal, cannot on habeas corpus, claiming that his detention is unlawful for reasons affecting the judgment, urge grounds reviewable on that appeal, though not mentioned in the decision of the appellate court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. §§ 81–87; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

In Bank. Application of John Smith for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed against W. H. Reilly, Warden. Denied.

John Smith, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. Habeas corpus. The petitioner is detained by the warden of Folsom Prison under a commitment showing his conviction of the crime of robbery. He claims that his detention is unlawful, for reasons affecting the judgment of the superior court.

His petition, framed by himself, is very meager, but shows with sufficient certainty that he is the same John Smith who was convicted of robbery in June, 1906, in the superior court of San Francisco, and whose conviction was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal in October, 1908. 9 Cal. App. 224, 98 Pac. 546. Every ground of his present petition was reviewable on that appeal; but they were not mentioned in the decision, and they cannot now be urged in a collateral attack upon the judgment.

PEOPLE v. BENNETT. (Cr. 1,623.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 253*)—FIRST-DEGREE MURDER—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for homicide, evidence held to warrant a finding that defendant deliberately armed himself, sought out deceased when he was unarmed, and either provoked a quarrel, or, when the quarrel arose, drew his weapon and shot him with malicious deliberation, and was therefore guilty of first-degree murder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 523–532; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 22*)—MURDER—INTENT.

There need be no appreciable time between the formation of the deliberate intent to kill and the act of killing in order to establish first-degree murder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 35–38; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 230*)—FIRST-DEGREE MURDER—INTENT—INFERENCE.

An intent to kill may be inferred from the circumstances of the unlawful act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 478; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 938*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—REPUTATION OF DECEASED.

Where decedent's first assault was mere battery, not of a deadly character, and defendant thereupon immediately shot deceased, who was unarmed, and there was evidence that defendant knew deceased was unarmed, defendant was not entitled to a new trial for newly discovered evidence that the deceased's reputation for peace and quiet in the community was bad, under the rule that such testimony is admissible only when the evidence raises the issue of self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2306–2317; Dec. Dig. § 938.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Horace Bennett was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Warth and W. C. Shaw, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant, informed against for the crime of murder, was adjudged guilty of murder in the first degree and the death penalty was imposed. From this judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial he appeals.

Upon appeal the contention is most earnestly urged that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict of murder in the first degree, and that a verdict of manslaughter, at the most, is all that the evidence warrants.

[1] The prosecution showed that John D. Stirling, the deceased, was foreman on a stock ranch in Monterey county; that defendant previous to the homicide had been employed upon the same ranch; that the deceased, finding him asleep when he should have been at work, reported the fact, and defendant was discharged. From his expressions concerning the matter defendant entertained some feeling of bitterness toward deceased upon that account. Defendant obtained employment upon a neighboring ranch. The two met about 11 o'clock in the morning at the Brockman House bar in the town of Gonzales, and there spent their time until 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon. They drank together, played cards together, and several times the defendant borrowed small sums of money from the deceased. During this time the defendant accused Stirling of having caused him to be discharged. Stirling replied that he had done no more than his duty, and that the defendant had no occasion to harbor ill feeling against him on that account. The defendant replied: "Well, I have no personal feelings, but I know you are the cause of it." More than once the conversation turned upon the fencing of a gap in the hills, defendant declaring that he had been instructed to fence this particular gap, the deceased objecting to it, declaring that he used the gap in the "rodeoing" of his cattle, and, if he found the fence there, he would tear it down, and would tear it down as often as it was built up. The two men continued to drink and as the day wore on their conversation, always harking back to the fencing of the gap, grew more and more acrimonious, until the proprietor feared there would be a fight. He asked the deceased to leave the place to avoid trouble. At this time both men were angry. The deceased replied that he would make no trouble, and did promptly leave the place, going to a nearby saloon. Before he left, however, the deceased had asked a friend in the saloon to lend him his pistol to carry while he was rodeoing as he had broken his own. The friend assented. His pistol, with its belt and cartridges, was behind the bar, and the barkeeper put them on the counter for the deceased to take. Deceased said that he did not want the pistol at that time, but would take it before he left town, and the barkeeper replaced it. It is in this connection urged by the defense that defendant heard the deceased ask for the pistol, and assumed that he was armed. But, if he heard this part of the conversation, it is a fair inference that he heard the rest of it, and thus knew that the deceased did not take the pistol and was not armed. About 10 minutes after deceased's departure defendant left the saloon, went to a nearby store and purchased a revolver and some cartridges, loaded it, thrust it in his pocket, and went to Scattini's saloon where deceased was. Entering, he invited the deceased and the barkeeper to drink with him, and they did. After drinking, the two men engaged in conversation, and again that conversation turned upon the fencing of the gap. The barkeeper testifies: "Bennett and Stirling were standing by the barrel I should judge 15 or 20 minutes, and chewed the rag about that gap. They were talking in an angry voice and pretty loud, but I didn't hear any profane language used or curse words of any kind. I gathered from their conversation that there was a spring of water somewhere around that gap, where cattle went to drink. Bennett said that his boss requested him to close up that gap so people or cattle couldn't pass through. Stirling said if it was closed up he would tear it down. Bennett and Stirling were not drinking at this time. They were feeling pretty good. Finally Stirling stepped up to Bennett and said, 'Since you were up there and chopped wood, you have had it in for me.' Jack Stirling slapped Bennett like that (illustrating with his open palm), and says, 'Take this for that.' Stirling did not swear at Bennett. I am positive that Stirling's hand was open at the time he slapped Bennett's face. He struck Bennett on the left side of his face, but he didn't strike him hard. Stirling's left hand at that time was hanging down empty. As soon as Stirling slapped Bennett, Bennett stepped back about a step, I think, and pulled out his gun and shot. Stirling was standing with both his hands open and extended along down the side of his body. Bennett said nothing before he pulled his gun. He pulled it very quickly. I think it was in his pocket, but I had no time to look because it was very quick. As soon as the first shot sounded, Stirling covered his face with his hands and stepped over and turned to the left, and took three steps, seven or eight feet, and then he got another shot in his back, and he fell. He fell right in front of the slot machine on his stomach, and rolled over toward the bar. Bennett stepped forward after he fired the first shot." Bennett then came forward with his pistol in his hand pointing at Stirling, and said, "Who is the best man?" Stirling was on the floor at the time, and Stirling then said to Bennett, "You are." Bennett went outside and whistled and came back a second time, still with the pistol in his hand, approached within four or five feet of Stirling, pointing his weapon in Stirling's direction, and again asked Stirling who was the best man. Bennett was urged not to go into the saloon any more, that "Jack was down," and he replied, "All right, I won't go in. I have whistled to give myself up." The powder in the pistol was black powder and the first shot, while it missed, was close enough to sting and powder-mark Stirling's face, and probably temporarily to partially blind him. This accounts for the fact that after the first shot he put his hands over his face and turned half staggering away. The bullet in the back caused the wound which was mortal. Defendant surrendered himself, with various remarks: "Come up here. I have just shot a man to show what kind of a man I am. * * * I am sorry I didn't hit him the first shot." A few hours after his arrest he stated, his remarks being voluntary and taken down in shorthand: "And, when he hit me, I shot him like a man. I started to shoot him in the face, and the second shot I shot him in the back. I am sorry I ever shot a man in the back. There is only one thing I am sorry for, and that is that I shot him in the back." Such is the evidence of the prosecution. The story of the defendant, unsupported by other evidence, is this: That he believed Stirling to be a reckless and desperate man; that he thought he was armed; that Stirling struck him, not with his open palm, but a severe blow with his fist; that he staggered from the blow, and saw Stirling, as he thought, attempt to draw a pistol; that believing his life was in danger he drew his own weapon and fired suddenly; that the black powder smoke obscured his vision; and that he fired again through the smoke without being able to see that Stirling's back was toward him. He had for some time contemplated purchasing the pistol, and bought it at this time for no other reason than that he was going that evening back to the ranch. No doubt defendant's passions were somewhat inflamed and his judgment somewhat in abeyance by reason of the whisky which he had drunk. Nevertheless the testimony is that he was not intoxicated, and, even if he were, his voluntary intoxication would afford no excuse for his crime. It is manifest that the jury rejected his account of the homicide, and believed, as the evidence would warrant their believing, that he deliberately armed himself, sought out an unarmed man and either provoked the quarrel, or, when the quarrel arose, drew his weapon and shot him with malicious deliberation.

[2, 3] It is, of course, well settled that there need be no appreciable time between the formation of the deliberate intent and the act of killing, and the intent itself may be inferred from the circumstances of the unlawful act. People v. Hunt, 59 Cal. 430; People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 364, 75 Pac. 1093; People v. Machuca, 158 Cal. 62, 109 Pac. 886; People v. Mahatch, 148 Cal. 200, 82 Pac. 779. It is not, of course, for this court to declare that a lesser verdict would meet the ends of justice where the verdict actually rendered by a jury from the vicinage finds support in the evidence given.

[4] Defendant moved for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, supporting his motion with affidavits of diligence. This newly discovered evidence is embraced in the affidavits of two men which are to the same effect: That they knew the reputation of the deceased for peace and quiet in the community wherein he lived, and that that reputation was bad. Upon the trial defendant had attempted to establish the same fact by two witnesses. But, when the preliminary proof of knowledge was made as to one of these witnesses, the defense refused to ask the question touching deceased's reputation, and the other witness, when asked, testified that he "never knew anything bad about the deceased." Testimony of this character is admissible only when it tends in some way, in connection with the immediate circumstances of the homicide, to show that the defendant had sufficient grounds as a reasonable man to fear that he was himself about to receive at the hands of the deceased some great bodily injury, and that he acted as a reasonable man under the influence of this fear in slaying the deceased. People v. Lombard, 17 Cal. 316; People v. Edwards, 41 Cal. 640; People v. Lamar, 148 Cal. 564, 83 Pac. 993. Usually this kind of evidence finds proper place where there is doubt as to who was the first aggressor, where the immediate circumstances of the homicide make it questionable whether the act was justifiable or not. Here all the circumstances of the homicide were proven by the testimony of eyewitnesses, and the defendant's own account of it would not be strengthened by the evidence which he sought to introduce. Admittedly the deceased was the first aggressor. But this aggression took the form of a mere battery. The defendant himself does not say that the assault was of a deadly character. The defendant then immediately drew his weapon and fired. True, he says that he saw or believed he saw the deceased make a motion as if to draw his pistol, but this is discredited by the testimony of eyewitnesses by the fact that deceased was unarmed, and by the further inference of fact that defendant knew that he was unarmed. It is therefore not at all probable that a different result would be reached by the admission of the newly discovered evidence, and the court's judgment upon the matter will not be disturbed. People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 390, 77 Pac. 169; People v. Oppenheimer, 156 Cal. 745, 106 Pac. 74.

For these reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

STUART v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 5,471.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 18, 1911. Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1911.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 20*)—PUBLIC SCHOOLS—TEACHERS—REGULATIONS—VALIDITY.

A resolution by the board of education of San Francisco, requiring teachers and other school employés to reside within the city and county during their employment, is a reasonable exercise of power under San Francisco Charter, art. 7, c. 3, § 1, empowering the board of education to enforce necessary regulations for the government and efficiency of the schools.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Margaret M. Stuart against the Board of Education of the City and County of San Francisco and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and N. J. Manson, Asst. City Atty., for appellants. Mastick & Partridge, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was to enjoin the defendants, the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco and the superintendent of schools thereof, from enforcing a general resolution passed by the board, requiring teachers and other employés of the school department to reside within the city and county during their terms of office or employment. Upon defendants' refusal to answer after their demurrer was overruled, judgment passed for plaintiff as prayed for, and defendants appeal.

[1] A part of the argument of the appellants is directed to the provisions of the charter of the city and county (article 16, § 2), which declares that "all deputies, clerks, assistants and other employés of the city and county must be citizens of the United States and must during their respective terms of office or employment, actually reside in the city and county and must have so resided for one year preceding their appointment." In this connection, it is argued that school teachers are officers of the city within the contemplation of this provision. Respondent makes answer that the school system is a state, and not a municipal, affair; that school teachers are not officers or employés of the city and county at all, but are employés of the board of education, and that to hold that a teacher is a municipal officer would work incalculable confusion and hardship, and would immediately result in forfeiting the positions of many such teachers under the provision of section 996, subd. 5, of the Political Code, which declares "that an office becomes vacant upon the incumbent ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, city or township of which he was chosen or appointed or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged." Into these considerations, however, we think it unnecessary to enter, for, aside from them, the charter confers full power upon the board of education (if such a grant of power be needed) to pass the resolution here under review. It declares (article 7, c. 3, § 1), that "in addition to the powers conferred by the general laws of the state, the board of education shall have power: 4. To establish and enforce all necessary rules and regulations for the government and efficiency of the schools and for carrying into effect the school system." In this connection, section 1616 of the Political Code provides that "boards of education are elected in cities under the provisions of the law governing such cities and their powers and duties are as prescribed in such laws except as otherwise in this chapter provided."

In view of the fact that the charter of the city and county of San Francisco requires all of its officers, deputies, clerks, assistants, and other employés, including the members of the board of education itself, to be residents of the city and county, and in view of the further fact that the state law contemplates a like residence of officials within the territory where their duties are to be performed (Pol. Code, § 996), it will not be said that the resolution of the board of education, requiring a residence of teachers within the municipality, is unreasonable. To the contrary, in contemplation of the fact that the teacher stands in loco parentis, that it may become her duty to devote her time to the welfare of individual pupils, even outside of school hours, that the hurrying for boats or trains cannot be regarded as conducive to the highest efficiency on the part of the teacher, that tardiness may result from delays or obstructions in the transportation which a nonresident teacher must use, and, finally, as has been said, that the "benefit of pupils and resulting benefits to their parents, and to the community at large, and not the benefit of teachers, is the reason for the creation and support of the public schools" (Bates v. Board of Education, 139 Cal. 145, 72 Pac. 907), all these, and many more considerations not necessary to detail, certainly make the resolution in question a reasonable exercise of the power of the board of education. Nor can the matters pleaded, namely, that the residence of the plaintiff in the city of Berkeley "does not interfere in any manner with the performance of her duties," be given any weight in such a consideration. It is a conclusion which cannot affect the validity or invalidity of the resolution.

[2] Nor can we agree with respondent that the resolution in question is the imposition of an additional "qualification" which a teacher must possess, which qualification is not within the power of the board of education to exact. True section 1793 of the Political Code, in conjunction with 1791 thereof, does prescribe certain qualifications and give a list of causes and reasons for which teachers may be dismissed or removed, but a regulation concerning residence is not an added "qualification," within the contemplation of this law, any more than would a resolution that a teacher should be free from contagious disease; and it would scarcely be said that if the board of education passed a resolution to that effect that it would add another and an unlawful "qualification" to those prescribed by the Political Code. Nor does it matter in this case, as respondent argues, that the board of education has no power to dismiss a teacher, except for the reasons prescribed by section 1793 of the Political Code. That section itself contemplates dismissal for insubordination, and clearly a refusal of a teacher to comply with a reasonable regulation of the board would be such insubordination.

For these reasons, the judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain defendants' demurrer.

Ex parte QUONG WO. (Cr. 1,690.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 208*) — CLASS LEGISLATION.

An ordinance divided the business section of a city into seven "industrial districts," and declared the remainder to be a "residence district," and made it unlawful to carry on certain kinds of occupations, including laundries and washhouses, within the residence district. The ordinance was amended, so as to make it unlawful to maintain within the residence district any "stone crusher, rolling-mill, * * * soap factory, or any other works or factory where power other than animal power is used to operate or in the operation of the same, or any haybarn, woodyard, lumber yard, public laundry, or washhouse; provided, that the board of fire commissioners may grant a permit to install an electric motor in any such place in a residence district in which a permit to install a steam boiler has been granted prior to the ordinance." Held, that the ordinance on its face did not discriminate against Chinese, or any other race.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-677; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 208*) — CLASS LEGISLATION.

The ordinance absolutely prohibits the maintenance of any "* * * public laundry or washhouse" within the residence district, regardless of the kind of power used therein, or whether they existed when the amendment was enacted; and hence there is no discrimination against hand laundries in favor of laundries run by mechanical power, by reason of the permission to substitute electricity for steam power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-677; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 208*)—OPERATION AND EFFECT—PROOF OF DISCRIMINATION.

A stipulation merely that several steam laundries operate within the residence district of a city does not show unjust discrimination in the enforcement of an ordinance prohibiting the maintenance of public laundries or washhouses within such district, when petitioner was prosecuted for maintaining a hand laundry therein; it not appearing that they are operating with the city's consent, or that prosecutions have not been instituted against them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-677; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 603*)—FIRE LIMITS—ORDINANCES—REASONABLENESS.

An ordinance, defining the residence district of a city as such parts as are not included in the territory constituting the industrial district, as established from time to time by ordinance, does not give the city council power to arbitrarily except from the residence district parts to be added to the industrial district, but requires that the boundaries of any sections added to the industrial district be not unreasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1334; Dec. Dig. § 603.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 47*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

The Supreme Court cannot take judicial notice that there has been unjust discrimination in excepting small parcels from the residence district of a city as established by ordinance, and adding them to the industrial district; the presumption being in favor of the legality of the action of a legislative body.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 208*) — CLASS LEGISLATION.

That small parcels, consisting of only one city lot, were excepted by the city council from the "residence district" of a city as fixed by ordinance, within which district certain occupations could not be followed, and added to the "industrial district," when such parcels were surrounded on all sides by parts of the "residence district," does not of itself show unjust discrimination in excepting territory from the residence district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-677; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 295*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—POLICE POWER.

Since all property is held subject to the lawful exercise of the state's police power, an ordinance prohibiting laundries within a certain district of a city, denominated the "residence district," would not be invalid, as affecting petitioner, because it prohibited the continuation of his laundry business in premises in which he had an unexpired leasehold interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 841; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

8. NUISANCE (§ 61*)—NUISANCE PER SE—PUBLIC LAUNDRY.

A public laundry is a lawful occupation, and not a nuisance per se, though reasonable regulations may be prescribed for its operation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 142-151; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

9. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 613, 625*)—ORDINANCES—REASONABLENESS.

Lawful occupations, such as laundry business, may be confined to certain limits in the city wherever such restrictions may reasonably be found necessary to protect the public health, morals, and comfort; and an ordinance prohibiting the maintenance of public laundries and washhouses in the part of a city designated as the "residence district" cannot be said to be unreasonable and invalid, though large parts of such district are sparsely built up, in the absence of facts showing unjust discrimination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1378, 1379; Dec. Dig. §§ 613, 625.*]

10. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 63*)—ORDINANCES — REGULATION OF BUSINESSES — REASONABLENESS.

Whether restrictions upon the operation of a business in certain portions of a city are reasonably necessary for the protection of health, etc., is primarily for the determination of the city council, and its action will not be disturbed by the courts, unless the regulation has no relation to health, etc., but clearly invades personal or property rights under the guise of police regulation.

In Bank. Original application for habeas corpus by Quong Wo against C. E. Sebastian, Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Geo. S. Hupp, for petitioner. Guy Eddie, City Prosecutor, and Ray E. Nimmo, Deputy City Prosecutor, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. By ordinance No. 19,500 (new series), adopted by the city council on December 28, 1909, and approved by the mayor December 30, 1909, seven "industrial districts," numbered from 1 to 7, respectively, were established in the city of Los Angeles. By ordinance No. 19,563 (new series), approved January 10, 1910, all of the city of Los Angeles, except those portions of the said city included within the boundaries of such industrial districts, and such fire districts as are now or may be hereafter established and designated as such by ordinance, and also excepting that portion of the said city lying south of Manchester avenue, and also except such portions of the said city as have heretofore been or may hereafter be excepted by ordinance from the said residence district, was established and declared to be a "residence district." By this ordinance, it was declared to be unlawful to maintain or carry on certain kinds of occupation within such residence district. By ordinance No. 21,996 (new series), approved March 8, 1911, the only section of said ordinance No. 19,563 referring to public laundries and washhouses (section 2) was amended to read as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to erect, establish, maintain or carry on within the residence district described in section 1 hereof, any stone crusher, rolling-mill, carpet-beating establishment, fireworks factory, soap factory, or any other works or factory where power other than animal power is used to operate, or in the operation of the same, or any haybarn, woodyard, lumber yard, public laundry or washhouse; provided, that the board of fire commissioners may grant a permit to install and maintain an electric motor in any such place in such residence district in which a permit to install a steam boiler has been granted prior to the adoption of this ordinance; but in no case shall a permit be granted to install an electric motor in any such place except to take the place of a steam boiler in such place, and such permit shall be granted only upon condition that such steam boiler shall be removed from such place and the use thereof discontinued and abandoned immediately upon the installation of such electric motor; and in no case shall a permit be granted to install an electric motor of greater horsepower than the steam boiler so to be removed and abandoned." The substantial change made by the amendment in the original section 2 was to take the term "public laundry or washhouse" from the occupations named prior to the clause, "or any other works or factory where power other than animal power," etc., and to place it in conjunction with the sentence, "or any haybarn, woodyard or lumber yard." By sections 3, 4, and 5 of said ordinance No. 19,563, it was made unlawful to maintain within the residence district certain specified occupations, viz., any hospital, or any asylum for the feeble-minded, or any place where wine or brandy is manufactured, or any blacksmith shop; it being provided that the prohibition should not apply to any such place being lawfully maintained at the time of the adoption of the ordinance. Since the arrest of petitioner upon the charge under which he is held in custody, which was on April 13, 1911, his alleged offense being charge to have been committed on the day of his arrest, an ordinance has been adopted, making, it may be conceded, materially different provision as to the subject-matter of ordinance No. 19,563, and all ordinances amendatory thereto or thereof, and repealing such ordinances, providing, however, that such repeal shall not affect the prosecution and punishment of any one for violation of any of said repealed ordinances, or affect any pending proceeding or action for violation of any such ordinances. Ordinance No. 22,798 (new series), approved June 17, 1911. This case, of course, must be determined upon the law as it stood at the date of petitioner's alleged offense, and without regard to the provisions of the new ordinance.

The petitioner was charged with having, on April 13, 1911, maintained and carried on "a public laundry and washhouse at number 721 South Flower street, in said city, within the residence district of said city of Los Angeles described in section 1 of ordinance No. 19,563 (new series) of said city," etc. He was convicted of this offense, and is held in custody under the judgment pronounced upon such conviction. By this proceeding, he seeks his discharge from such custody.

The petitioner, who is a native and citizen of the empire of China, has been engaged for several years in conducting such laundry and washhouse at said location, occupying the premises under a lease which has two years yet to run. He has paid the customary license required by the city to conduct such business, up to and including the month of June, 1911. As we understand the stipulated facts, no power, other than animal power, was used in the operation of this laundry; it being a hand laundry, as distinguished from a steam, electric, or other power laundry.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The city of Los Angeles contains about 94 square miles. Large portions of the established residence district are sparsely built up, while large portions are closely built up and thickly populated. The established industrial districts are in some places not thickly or closely built up, but some portions are, and where so built up there are large quantities of smoke and soot, and such district "is situate a great distance from petitioner's laundry and his customers." Petitioner's laundry is within the established residence district and in a portion thereof that is apparently closely built up, and not sparsely populated.

Since the adoption of said ordinance No. 19,563, the city council has by ordinance excepted from the residence district and included within the industrial district in excess of 40 small parcels of land. These exceptions are scattered throughout the residence district, and in many instances consist of a single lot in a tract. Ten of these exceptions are specified; one having an area of about 400 feet square, at the corner of Tenth and Main streets, upon which is now in operation an automobile factory, employing steam as the motive power, and having about 200 employés. Other exceptions specified are small parcels of land having a frontage of about 300 feet and a depth of about 125 feet, at the corner of Washington and Arlington streets, at the corner of Washington and Hoover streets, at the corner of Washington and Figueroa streets, on Pico street between Georgia and Sentous streets, etc., and some "ordinary sized city lots." There is, however, nothing to indicate that any of these exceptions was arbitrarily made, or that the situation of the land thus taken from the residence district and placed in industrial territory was not such, with reference to all the circumstances, as to reasonably warrant the action of the city authorities.

The laundry of petitioner is no more dangerous and unsafe to the residents of the locality in which it is situate than any other laundry. Seven persons residing in the vicinity thereof testify that they have not noticed any offensive odors, or loud or unusual noises from its operation, that no sickness has been caused to any of their respective families thereby, and that the operation of the laundry has not in any way affected their safety, comfort, or welfare, or, to their knowledge, that of any resident in the neighborhood. There are several steam laundries operating within said residence district. The foregoing facts are established, for all the purposes of this case, by the stipulation of the parties.

[1] There is absolutely nothing to indicate that the ordinance was intended in any of its features to operate peculiarly against the Chinese, or any other particular race. So far as any contention of unlawful discrimination between persons or classes of persons is concerned, it is certainly fair on its face, applying equally and uniformly to all engaged in the kinds of business enumerated.

[2] It is claimed that the ordinance discriminates without reason against the existing hand laundry and in favor of the existing steam laundry, in that it permits an existing steam laundry to continue upon installing an "electric motor" in lieu of the "steam boiler," while an existing hand laundry is compelled to cease operations altogether. It might be difficult to sustain any such distinction, but we do not think that section 2 of the ordinance, as amended March 8, 1911, can reasonably be construed as meaning what is claimed for it by petitioner. While the intent of the framers is perhaps not as clearly expressed as it might have been, we are of the opinion that the only reasonable construction of the section is that the kinds of places enumerated after the clause, "or any other works or factory where power other than animal power is used to operate," viz., "any haybarn, woodyard, lumber yard, public laundry or washhouse," are all absolutely prohibited within the residence district, whether existing at the time of the amendment or not, and regardless of the kind of power used therein, and that the proviso as to substitution of electric for steam power has no application to any such prohibited place.

[3] There is no foundation for any claim of discrimination in the enforcement of the ordinance. The mere fact that there are several steam laundries operating within the residence district, which is the whole of the stipulation in this regard, is not sufficient to show such discrimination. It does not appear that they are operating with the consent of the city authorities, or that criminal prosecutions have not been instituted against those carrying them on.

[4] We do not construe the ordinance as intended to confer upon the council any arbitrary power in the matter of excepting by ordinance from the residence district such portions of such district as originally established as it sees fit to except. Section 1 of the ordinance simply defines the residence district to be such portions of the city as are not included in the territory constituting the industrial district, as such territory is established or may be established from time to time by ordinance. If the city council has the power to confine an occupation within prescribed limits, it must have the power to make changes in the limits so prescribed; the only limitation being, as in the case of the original fixing of the limits, that the boundaries fixed must not be unreasonable.

[5, 6] We cannot judicially say that there has been any unreasonable discrimination in any of the changes made by excepting from the original residence district certain comparatively small parcels of land. The presumption is always in favor of the action of the legislative body in such matters, and there is absolutely nothing to indicate that the property so excepted was not so situated, with reference to all the circumstances, as to make it reasonably proper that it should constitute a part of the industrial district, or that there was anything arbitrary in the action of the council in regard thereto. That some of the parcels so excepted were small in area, consisting of only one city lot, and were surrounded on all sides by portions of what was, under the ordinance, "residence district," does not in itself warrant a contrary conclusion.

In this connection, the case of Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 24 Sup. Ct. 673, 48 L. Ed. 1018, is in point. An ordinance of the city of St. Louis prohibited the maintenance within the city, without permission from the municipal assembly, of any dairy and cow stable, not in operation at the time of the approval of the ordinance. The Supreme Court of Missouri had upheld the ordinance against the claim that it was void, because of the power given to the municipal assembly to grant permission to maintain such a dairy as it saw fit, and because, therefore, the assembly might discriminate against one applicant and favor another. Disposing of this claim, the court said: "We cannot and shall not indulge any such presumption against the integrity of the municipal assembly, but shall * * * assume that the municipal assembly, upon granting permission, will inquire and determine whether the place and neighborhood is a proper one in which to allow a dairy to be maintained, and will act impartially." City of St. Louis v. Fischer, 167 Mo. 654, 663, 67 S. W. 872, 875 (64 L. R. A. 679, 99 Am. St. Rep. 614). The United States Supreme Court said: "We do not regard the fact that permission to keep cattle may be granted by the municipal assembly as impairing in any degree the validity of the ordinance, or as denying to the disfavored dairy keepers the equal protection of the laws. Such discrimination might well be made where one person desired to keep two cows and another fifty; where one desired to establish a stable in the heart of the city and another in the suburbs; or where one was known to keep his stable in a filthy condition, and another had established a reputation for good order and cleanliness. * * * The question in each case is whether the establishing of a dairy and cow stable is likely, in the hands of the applicant, to be a nuisance or not to the neighborhood, and to imperil or conduce to the health of its customers. As the dispensing power must be vested in some one, it is not easy to see why it may not properly be delegated to the municipal assembly which enacted the ordinance. Of course, cases may be imagined where the power to issue permits may be abused, and the permission accorded to social or political favorites and denied to others, who, for reasons totally disconnected with the merits of the case, are distasteful to the licensing power. No such complaint, however, is made to the practical application of the law in this case, and we are led to infer that none such exists. We have no criticism to make of the principle of granting a license to one and denying it to another, and are bound to assume that the discrimination is made in the interest of the public, and upon conditions applying to the health and comfort of the neighborhood. [Citing cases.] * * * We see no difficulty in vesting in some body of men, presumed to be acquainted with the business and its conditions, the power to grant permits in special cases. It has been held in some of the state courts to be contrary to the spirit of American institutions to vest this dispensing power in the hands of a single individual [citing authorities], and in others that such an authority cannot be delegated to the adjoining lot owners. [Citing authorities.] But the authority to delegate that discretion to a board appointed for that purpose is sustained by the great weight of authority [citing authorities], and by this court the delegation of such power, even to a single individual, was sustained in Wilson v. Eureka City, 173 U. S. 32 [19 Sup. Ct. 317, 43 L. Ed. 603], and Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183 [20 Sup. Ct. 633, 44 L. Ed. 725]."

[7] Nothing is better settled than the proposition that property is held subject to the lawful exercise of the police power; and the fact that petitioner has an unexpired leasehold interest in the premises upon which he conducts his laundry is therefore of no consequence in determining the question of the validity of the ordinance. See Grumbach v. Lelande, 154 Cal. 684, 98 Pac. 1059, and cases there cited.

This brings us to what we deem the main contention in this proceeding. Is the business of operating a public laundry or washhouse of such a nature that it may be confined, in the lawful exercise of the public power, within defined limits in a city or town?

[8] It must be admitted, of course, that the business of conducting a public laundry is a lawful and necessary occupation, and that such a laundry is not necessarily a nuisance per se. But this fact alone does not prevent the enactment of such regulations regarding it as may be reasonably found necessary for the safety, health, and comfort of society at large. There are many lawful and necessary occupations, not constituting nuisances per se, as to which such regulations by a city have been found necessary. It was said in Ex parte Lacey, 108 Cal. 326, 41 Pac. 411, 38 L. R. A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93, involving the question of the validity of an ordinance prohibiting the operation of any steam shoddy machine, or steam carpet-beating machine, within 100 feet of any church, schoolhouse, or dwelling house: "Indeed, as to nuisances per se, the general laws of the state are ample to deal with them. But the business here involved may properly be classed with livery stables, laundries, soap and glue factories, etc., a class of business undertakings in the conduct of which police and sanitary regulations are made, to a greater or less degree by every city in the country."

Cases in which municipal regulations as to the carrying on the laundry business have been upheld as constituting a reasonable exercise of the police power are numerous. While the cases usually involved simply regulations as to the manner of carrying on the business, without prohibiting it in any particular locality, it has been held in this state that an ordinance prohibiting the carrying on of the business within a prescribed portion of a town is a lawful exercise of the police power. See In re Hang Kie, 69 Cal. 149, 10 Pac. 327. The correctness of this decision has never, so far as we can ascertain, been questioned by this court or the United States Supreme Court. Nothing said in Ex parte Sing Lee, 96 Cal. 354, 31 Pac. 245, 24 L. R. A. 195, 31 Am. St. Rep. 218, can reasonably be held to disapprove it. In the latter case the ordinance held invalid prohibited the carrying on of such business in all but two blocks of Chico, without a permit from the board of trustees of the town, and it was made a prerequisite to the obtaining of such permit that the person applying should have first obtained the written consent of a majority of the real property owners within the block in which it was proposed to carry on such business, and also of the four blocks immediately surrounding such block. It was simply held that the effect of this provision was to commit the right to carry on such business at all, in all but two blocks of the town, to the unrestricted will and caprice of a majority of the real property owners of the block upon which it was proposed to establish such laundry, and of the four blocks immediately surrounding the same, and that this constituted an unauthorized interference with the right of a person to engage in a lawful occupation, and the right of the owner of property to devote it to a lawful purpose. Nor do we think that the Hang Kie Case is overruled or questioned by Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 83, 32 Pac. 870, 873 (19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152). The rule declared in the last-mentioned case that "a law or ordinance, the effect of which is to deny to the owner of property the right to conduct thereon a lawful business, is invalid, unless the business to which it relates is of such a noxious or offensive character that the health, safety, or comfort of the surrounding community requires its exclusion from that particular locality," is not necessarily opposed to such decision. In Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220, the ordinances involved were held unenforceable against the plaintiff in error, because they not only seemed intended to confer, not a discretion to be exercised upon a consideration of the circumstances of each case, but a naked and arbitrary power to give or withhold consent, not only as to places, but as to persons; but that their practical administration had been directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion that, whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted, they were applied with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the state of that equal protection of the laws which is guaranteed.

[9, 10] There can be no question that the power to reguate the carrying on of certain lawful occupations in a city includes the power to confine the carrying on of the same to certain limits, whenever such restrictions may reasonably be found necessary to subserve the ends for which the police power exists, viz., to protect the public health, morals, safety, and comfort. It is, of course, primarily for the legislative body clothed with this power to determine when such regulations are essential, and its determination in this regard, in view of its better knowedge of all the circumstances, and the presumption that it is acting with a due regard for the rights of all parties, will not be disturbed in the courts, unless it can plainly be seen that the regulation has no relation to the ends above stated, but is a clear invasion of personal or property rights under the guise of police regulation. In the case of Grumbach v. Lelande, 154 Cal. 679, 98 Pac. 1059, in which this court declared the well-settled rule last stated, it is said: "It is well settled that it is entirely within the police power to limit the conduct of the liquor or other businesses coming within its regulatory scope or to exclude such businesses from specified districts"—citing cases. The limitation in the case last cited was in regard to the business of selling intoxicating liquors, but the power is by no means confined to occupations of that character, and, whatever be the business or occupation to which it is attempted to be applied, the question of the validity of the limitation depends on whether it has some relation to the ends for which the police power is conferred. The necessity of such regulation in the case of necessary and lawful occupations carried on in cities and towns was recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 90, 11 Sup. Ct. 15, 34 L. Ed. 620, where it is said: "Some occupations by the noise made in their pursuit, some by the odors they engender, and some by the dangers accompanying them require regulation as to the locality in which they shall be conducted." That the power to regulate includes the power to confine certain occupations within prescribed limits in a city has been held in many cases, of which the following are examples: Ex parte Byrd, 84 Ala. 17, 4 South. 397, 5 Am. St. Rep. 328; In re Wilson, 32 Minn. 145, 19 N. W. 723; Shea v. City of Muncie, 148 Ind. 14, 46 N. E. 138; Cronin v. People, 82 N. Y. 318, 37 Am. Rep. 564; City of Newton v. Joyce, 166 Mass. 83, 44 N. E. 116; State v. Beattie, 16 Mo. App. 131; Ex parte Lacey, 108 Cal. 326, 41 Pac. 411, 38 L. R. A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93. In the last-mentioned case, the limitation was, as we have seen, regarding the operation of a steam shoddy or steam carpet-beating machine; in State v. Beattie, supra, a livery stable; in City of Newton v. Joyce, supra, a livery stable for more than four horses; in Cronin v. People, supra, the slaughtering of cattle; in Ex parte Byrd, supra, the selling of fresh meat; and in the other cases the sale of intoxicating liquor. Warrant for this character of regulation in regard to all these occupations and many others that might be named is to be found in the fact that it may reasonably be determined necessary to the health, morals, safety, or comfort of the people of a city. It was said by this court, in the Matter of Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 297, 9 Pac. 141, 58 Am. Rep. 12, quoting from Chancellor Kent: "Unwholesome trades, slaughterhouses, operations offensive to the senses, the deposit of powder, the application of steam power to propel cars, the building with combustible materials, and burial of the dead may all be interdicted by law, in the midst of dense masses of population, on the general and rational principle that every person ought to so use his property as not to injure his neighbor; and that private interests must be made subservient to the general interests of the community. 2 Kent, Com. 340."

In the San Chung Case, 11 Cal. App. 511, 105 Pac. 609, an ordinance prohibiting the carrying on of a public laundry or washhouse in the city of Sacramento, in any building that shall be occupied as a store, restaurant, or saloon, or that is frequented or occupied by many persons, or that is occupied as a stopping place by transient guests, etc., or in any annex or outhouse of such a building, was sustained as being a warrantable exercise of the police power in the matter of the protection of the health of the people. It was recognized by the court, in accord with the claim of the city, "that the conditions under which laundries are operated are favorable for the propagation of disease, that the soiled garments received and handled in such places are liable to communicate deleterious germs to the circumambient atmosphere, giving rise to danger of infection to persons coming into close proximity to these surroundings." It was said: "Formerly such legislation would have been regarded as an unwarranted encroachment upon the rights of the individual; but, in view of the progress of the medical profession, the better understanding of the nature of disease and its transmission, and the broader conception of the duty of the municipality in regard to the preservation and protection of the public health characteristic of the present age, it seems upon its face to embody a sensible and reasonable restriction, bearing a direct and efficacious relation to the accomplishment of a legitimate purpose of police and sanitary legislation. At least, in the absence of any evidence to that effect, we cannot say that the public health is not thereby promoted, or that the method adopted is unreasonable and unnecessarily oppressive." This court subsequently refused to issue a writ of habeas corpus in this matter, thus practically sustaining the ordinance as a proper exercise of the police power.

Doubtless the same considerations of public health would warrant a court in sustaining the action of a municipality in prohibiting the operation of public laundries in a densely populated neighborhood devoted to residence purposes; that is, the court, in such a case, in the absence of any evidence to that effect, could not say that the public health is not promoted by such a regulation, or that the same is "unreasonable and unnecessarily oppressive." The design of the ordinance here involved undoubtedly was to protect such portions of the city of Los Angeles as are devoted principally to residence purposes from the dangers and discomfort attendant upon the operation of certain kinds of business which, while not necessarily nuisances per se, have always been recognized as proper subjects of police regulation. We do not feel warranted in saying that, as to public laundries and washhouses, the conclusion of the city council was clearly unreasonable. As was said in Re Smith, 143 Cal. 372, 77 Pac. 182: "As has been said, there must always be left a large discretion in the legislative body, with the exercise of which the courts will not and have no desire to interfere. Nor will they in any event interfere, except where the case is plain that needless oppression is worked and constitutional rights invaded. * * * In city ordinances, as distinguished from county ordinances, the interest and requirements for protection of a thickly settled and growing community will often be widely different from those of sparsely settled and thinly inhabited rural districts. An ordinance limiting, regulating, or even prohibiting, in a certain district within the corporate limits of a city, may be perfectly reasonable, where like limitations, restrictions, and prohibitions as to some district within the county, arbitrarily carved out, would be oppressive and unreasonable in the extreme. Owing to the peculiar conditions existing in cities, courts are not keen to question the wisdom of the legislative exercise of their police power in these respects." It is enough for the courts in such cases that "there may have been reasons actuating the council, good and sufficient in themselves though not clearly appearing from a mere reading of the ordinance itself." Grumbach v. Lelande, supra, 154 Cal. 685, 98 Pac. 1059. We cannot say that the contrary so clearly appears from what is shown in this case, as to warrant us in holding the regulation void.

The mere fact that "large portions of the residence district are sparsely built up" cannot affect the determination of this proceeding. Doubtless it was assumed by the city council that such portions would not be "sparsely populated" for any great length of time, an assumption probably warranted by the growth and population of the city during the last few years. So there is nothing in the action of the council in including such portions to indicate any improper design on its part. But the answer to petitioner's claim in this behalf is that his laundry is not situated within any portion of the district that is "sparsely populated," and that it does not appear that any place prohibited by the ordinance is maintained, or is desired to be maintained, within any portion of the district that is "sparsely populated." It follows that it does not appear that the constitutional rights of any one are invaded by the inclusion of such "sparsely populated" territory.

We do not see how the facts shown by the affidavits of parties living near petitioner's laundry affect the question of the validity of the regulations.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. WESTERN UNION OIL CO. (L. A. 2,584.)

1. Taxation (§ 376*)—Corporate Franchises—Method of Assessment.

A proper method of ascertaining the value of a corporate franchise is to deduct from the aggregate market value of its shares the assessed value of its tangible property, the difference being the assessable value of the franchise; such method not contravening Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 15, requiring each franchise to be entered in the assessment book without combining it with other property or the valuation thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 625, 629–631; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

2. Taxation (§ 376*)—Corporate Sureties—Excessive Valuation—"Cash Value"—"Full Cash Value"—"Market Value"—"Value."

"Market value" is synonymous with the terms "value" and "full cash value," defined by Pol. Code, § 3617, as the amount at which the property would be taken in payment of a just debt from a solvent debtor, and the market value of stock, fairly represents its full cash value in absence of exceptional circumstances giving it an abnormal value, so that any inference of fraud by the placing of an excessive valuation on stock, taken as a basis for assessing a corporate franchise, is rebutted by a showing that the value of the franchise was ascertained by the approved method of deducting from the aggregate market value of its stock, the value of its tangible property, and taking the difference as the franchise value.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 998, 999; vol. 4, p. 2997; vol. 5, pp. 4383–4388; vol. 8, pp. 7717, 7597, 7826.]

3. Taxation (§ 117*)—Corporate Franchises—Assessment—Defenses.

The fact that the franchise of other corporations escaped assessment on the same basis as defendant's franchise would not excuse defendant from paying its franchise assessment properly made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

4. Taxation (§ 117*)—Corporate Franchises—Discrimination.

The fact that a franchise tax is not assessed against the franchise of a foreign corporation is not a discrimination making the assessment of a franchise tax on a domestic corporation invalid; the franchise being assessed at the principal place of business.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against the Western Union Oil Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher (E. E. Bacon and Henry M. Young, of counsel), for appellant. Leslie R. Hewitt, City Atty., and John W. Shenk, Asst. City Atty., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was instituted to recover from the defendant $16,654.24 taxes, with 10 per cent. penalty added thereto for nonpayment thereof and interest. This represented the tax upon defendant's "franchise to be a corporation" assessed for $1,423,555. The value of this franchise was arrived at by multiplying the amount which the shares of defendant corporation were selling for upon the stock exchange in the city of Los Angeles on the first Monday in March, 1907 ($303 per share), by the total number of shares of the capital stock of the corporation and deducting therefrom the assessed value of all the other property of the corporation, namely, its leasehold interest in lands in Santa Barbara county, together with derricks, oil-boring machinery, tanks, reservoirs, and oil assessed at $82,580 and money in hand amounting to $8,865. The sum so reached as the value of the franchise of the corporation was by the assessor divided in two and 50 per cent. of it, the sum above given, fixed as the assessment value of the franchise. Upon these facts the trial court gave judgment for plaintiff, and from that judgment defendant appeals.

The trial court found as follows: "In the opinion of the court the value placed thereon, to wit, the sum of $1,323,555, was grossly excessive, but the court holds that it has no jurisdiction to review the action of the board of equalization of said city of Los Angeles in fixing the value of said franchise to be a corporation at the sum of $1,323,555, and also that the method pursued by the assessor in arriving at the value of the franchise was in accordance with the rule established by the Supreme Court."

[1] The trial court truly declares that the method adopted by the assessor in this instance is in accordance with the rule established by the decisions of this court. In Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 592, 87 Pac. 102, 109, it is said: "It is settled law in this state that a proper method for ascertaining the value of the franchise of a corporation is by deducting from the aggregate market value of its shares the value of its tangible property, and taking the difference as the value of the franchise. See San Jose Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; Spring Valley Waterworks v. Barber, 99 Cal. 36, 38 [33 Pac. 735, 21 L. R. A. 416]; Bank of California v. San Francisco, 142 Cal. 276, 287 [75 Pac. 832, 64 L. R. A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130]."

[2] To the argument of the appellant that the assessment in this instance is so grossly excessive as to compel the belief that it was made without the exercise of judgment and therefore carries upon it the impress of constructive fraud (Postal T. Co. v. Dalton, 119 Cal. 604, 51 Pac. 1072; Whatcom County v. Land Co., 7 Wash. 101, 34 Pac. 563; Arosin v. Mortgage Co., 80 Minn. 277, 83 N. W. 339; Southern Oregon Co. v. Coos County, 39 Or. 185, 64 Pac. 646; Merrill v. Humphrey, 24 Mich. 170), the complete answer is that an excessive valuation by itself alone is not evidence of fraud (Templeton v. Pierce Co., 25 Wash. 377, 65 Pac. 553; East St. Louis Ry. Co. v. People, 119 Ill. 182, 10 N. E. 397; Burton Stock Car Co. v. Traeger, 187 Ill. 9, 58 N. E. 418), and any inference or presumption of fraud arising from merely excessive valuation is at once repelled in this case by proof that the method adopted of fixing that valuation was the method sanctioned and directed by the highest court of the state. The assessor took the market value of the stock on a given day, and that market value is synonymous with "value" and "full cash value" defined by section 3617 of the Political Code. It is not contended that there were exceptional or extraordinary conditions giving an abnormal value to the stock at the moment of time fixed by the assessor for the taking of its market value, and, in the absence of such abnormal or extraordinary circumstances, the market value fairly represents the full cash value. Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 87 Pac. 102.

[3, 4] The fact, if it be a fact, that the franchises of other corporations escaped a like assessment would not relieve appellant from the duty of paying the assessment upon its franchise properly levied, nor can the payment of the tax be avoided under appellant's last contention that the tax is discriminatory against domestic corporations, in that it is not levied against the franchises of foreign corporations. The corporate franchise is to be assessed at the principal place of business of the corporation and, as the principal place of business of a foreign corporation is without the state, its franchise cannot be assessed herein. Foreign corporations and domestic corporations alike are required to pay taxes upon all the property owned by such corporations and within the state.

We have not discussed at length the proposition urged that under the Code "each franchise must be entered in the assessment book without combining the same with other property or the valation thereof" (Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 15), and that in this instance under the guise and name of assessing franchise there has been assessed the good will, the prospective dividends, and the speculative value of the stock, for the reason that these questions must be deemed concluded by the language of Crocker v. Scott above quoted.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

WESTERN UNION OIL CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (L. A. 2,578.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 17, 1911. Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1911.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by the Western Union Oil Company against the County of Los Angeles. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher (Ward Chapman and Edward E. Bacon, of counsel), for appellant. J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., and Hartley Shaw, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was instituted by the plaintiff to have an assessment of its franchise for the fiscal year 1907–08 declared illegal and void. The case presents precisely the questions considered and decided in City of Los Angeles v. Western Union Oil Company, 118 Pac. 720 (L. A. No. 2,584), and for the reasons therein given the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte LEE JOHN. (Cr. 350.)

1. DEAD BODIES (§ 5*)—DISINTERMENT—COUNTY ORDINANCE—VALIDITY.

A county ordinance, prohibiting disinterment of dead bodies without permission of the county health officer, and imposing a fee of $10 for permits unless the body is to be reinterred in the county, is not invalid as conflicting with Act 1878, as amended in 1889 (Gen. Laws 1909, Act 545), regulating disinterment of remains and transportation thereof in cities, towns, and cities and counties, nor does it conflict with Act March 18, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 115), providing for registration of deaths, nor with St. 1907, p. 893, providing for preservation of the public health by regulating transportation, etc., of dead bodies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dead Bodies, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. DEAD BODIES (§ 5*)—DISINTERMENT—COUNTY ORDINANCE—VALIDITY.

Nor is the ordinance void as being designed to raise revenue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dead Bodies, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Application by Lee John for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Wm. Hoff Cook, Charles Steward, and Jas. A. Cooper, for petitioner. Franklin Sward, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

HALL, J. Petitioner was held in custody by the sheriff of the county of San Mateo, under a judgment rendered upon his conviction of having violated the provisions of an ordinance, No. 176, relating to the disinterment and removal of remains of deceased persons, interred within the limits of San Mateo County, and adopted by the board of supervisors of said county in the month of July, 1901. In this proceeding the petitioner attacks the validity of the ordinance itself, and makes no point as to the sufficiency of the complaint as stating an offense under the ordinance, if the ordinance be valid. It is substantially charged in the complaint upon which petitioner was convicted that he disinterred a dead body without first making application for, and obtaining a permit so to do, from the health officer of San Mateo county, as required by said ordinance. We also understand that the district attorney of San Mateo county, who appeared in opposition to the writ, concedes that the only offense charged against petitioner is that of violating said ordinance. The only question presented to this court for decision is thus the question as to the validity of the ordinance.

[1] The first and principal contention of petitioner is that the ordinance in question is in conflict with an act entitled "An act to protect public health from infection caused by exhumation and removal of the remains of deceased persons," adopted in 1878, and amended in 1889 (Gen. Laws 1909, Act 545). This act was certainly in force at the time of the passage of the ordinance, and if the ordinance is in conflict with the statute the ordinance never had any validity. Banaz v. Smith, 133 Cal. 102, 65 Pac. 309. The question is thus presented: Are the provisions of the ordinance in question in conflict with the provisions of the statute? For it is not denied that the board of supervisors may make and enforce within the county all such police and sanitary regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. Pol. Code, § 4041, subd. 28; Const. art. 11, § 11.

The first section of the ordinance provides that: "It shall be unlawful to disinter or exhume from any grave, vault or other burial place the body or remains of any deceased person interred within the limits of said county of san Mateo, state of California, unless the person or persons so doing shall have first complied with all the requirements of this ordinance."

The second section provides that: "Before the body or remains of any deceased person which shall have been buried or interred in any grave, vault or other burial place within the limits of said county of San Mateo, shall be disinterred, exhumed or removed, the person or persons so desiring to disinter, exhume or remove such body or remains shall make application to the health officer of said county of San Mateo." The section proceeds further to set forth the matters that must be stated in the application.

The third section provides that: "Upon the receipt of the application mentioned in section two of this ordinance, it is made the duty of the health officer of said county of San Mateo to investigate said application, and ascertain whether the disinterment or removal of the remains of the person in said application mentioned can be made without danger to the public health, and if satisfied thereof said health officer shall grant said application, and shall issue therefor a permit to be executed in triplicate." The section further provides for the form of the permit, and provides that the health officer may, if deemed necessary for the safety of the public health, require such body or remains when exhumed to be immediately placed in a zinc-lined box hermetically sealed. Further provisions are made in said section for the collection of a fee of $10 and the disposition thereof by the health officer.

Section 4 prohibits the keeper of cemeteries from allowing remains of deceased persons buried in such cemetery from being disinterred or removed without first receiving and taking up the permit of the health officer, and requires such keeper of the cemetery to file and keep the permit, and make certain records pertaining to the removal of the remains.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Section 5 provides that no fee shall be collected where the body is to be interred in another place in the county of San Mateo.

Section 6 fixes the penalty for the violation of any of the provisions of the ordinance, and section 7 provides for the taking effect of the ordinance.

The ordinance, it is thus seen, contains quite complete regulations concerning the disinterment of the remains of deceased persons, wherever buried within the limits of the county of San Mateo, and regulates and requires a permit for such disinterment in all cases, though no fee is required for such permit where the body is to be reinterred in the county of San Mateo.

On the other hand, a careful examination of the statute in force when the ordinance was passed (Act 545, p. 81, Deering's Gen. St. [Edition of 1909]) discloses that the act relates only to the disinterring of the remains of deceased persons buried within the limits of some city, town, or city and county, and the transportation of such disinterred remains through the streets of some city, town, or city and county, and has no application to the removal of remains of deceased persons from one place of interment to another place of interment within this state, except where the body has not been buried for more than one year.

The first section of the act in question provides that: "It shall be unlawful to disinter or exhume from a grave, vault, or other burial place, the body or remains of any deceased person, unless the person or persons so doing shall first obtain from the board of health, health officer, mayor, or other head of the municipal government of the city, town, or city and county where the same are deposited, a permit for said purpose." The grammatical construction of this sentence requires that the permit shall be issued by one or other of the designated officers of the city, town, or city and county where the remains are deposited. Under this sentence no permit is required unless the remains are deposited or buried in some city, town, or city and county. The remaining part of the section provides: "Nor shall such body or remains disinterred, exhumed or taken from any grave * * * be removed or transported through the streets or highways of any city, town, or city and county, unless the person or persons removing or transporting such body or remains shall first obtain from the board of health or health officer (if such board or officer there be) and from the mayor or other head of the municipal government of the city or town, or city and county, a permit in writing so to remove or transport such body or remains in and through such streets and highways." Here again the permit is issued only by an officer of the city, town, or city and county through whose streets it is desired to transport the body. No attempt in this section seems to be made to regulate the exhumation of bodies except from places of burial or deposit within municipalities, nor to require a permit for the transportation of such exhumed bodies except through the streets of such municipalities.

That this construction of the section is correct is strengthened by the wording of the next section. After providing for the conditions upon which permits may be issued and the contents thereof, it proceeds as follows: "The officer of the municipal government of the city or town or city and county, granting such permit shall require to be paid for each permit the sum of ten dollars," etc.

Section 3 provides a penalty for disinterring, exhuming, or removing from a grave, vault, or burial place the body of a deceased person without a permit therefor. While this language is more general than the language of the two preceding sections, it must be read in connection therewith, and thus read only penalizes those who have violated the preceding sections.

Section 4 fixes the penalty for transporting the disinterred remains of deceased persons through the streets or highways of any city or town, or city and county, without a permit, as described in section two.

Thus far the provisions of the act seem aimed in the main only at protecting the inhabitants of the more thickly populated portions of the state, to wit, the inhabitants of cities, towns, and cities and counties, from the dangers to be feared from the exhumation and transportation of disinterred bodies of deceased persons.

Section 5 provides a reward for informers of violations of the act.

Section 6 still further restricts the operation of the act, and sounds the keynote to the purpose and object of its enactment. It provides: "Nothing in this act contained shall be taken to apply to the removal of the remains of deceased persons from one place of interment to another cemetery or place of interment within this state; provided that no permit shall be issued for the disinterment of any body unless such body has been buried for one year or more, without the written consent of the mayor, chairman of the board of supervisors, or city council of any municipality of the state." In other words, the provisions of this act only apply where the body is to be removed to some place without the state, except where the body has been buried for not more than one year.

A comparison of the provisions of the ordinance with the provisions of the statute discloses that both deal with the same general subject, to wit, the disinterment of the remains of deceased persons. The ordinance contains requirements not contained in the statute, and is much more extensive in its scope, and operates over the entire territory of the county alike, while the statute, if we are correct in our reading of it, operates only within cities, towns, and cities and counties, at least so far as the disinterring of bodies is concerned, which is the only matter regulated by the ordinance.

These conditions as to the scope of the statute and of the ordinance bring this case within the rule approved in Ex parte Hong Shen, 98 Cal. 681, 33 Pac. 799; In re Murphy, 128 Cal. 29, 60 Pac. 465; and In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 115, 99 Pac. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75.

In the Hong Shen Case it was held that an ordinance is not in conflict with a state law simply because it makes other and different regulations for the sale of an article of commerce than those provided by a statute of the state.

In the Murphy Case it was held that it was competent for an ordinance to prohibit all games played for money, though such general language included games prohibited by the statute; that in such case the ordinance would not be void and would be given operation as to the games not prohibited by the statute. Murphy was charged under the ordinance with playing keno, which it was claimed was a banking game and thus included within the games prohibited by the statute. The court declined to take judicial notice of the fact that keno was a banking game. Under the doctrine of this case the ordinance under which petitioner was charged should be given operation as to disinterments of remains not buried in a city, town, or city and county, even though it should be held inoperative as to disinterments in such municipalities.

In the Hoffman Case it was held that an ordinance that made another, different, and more onerous regulation for the sale of milk than that prescribed by the statute was not for that reason in conflict with such statute or void. The state law prohibited the sale of milk unless it was of a certain standard. The ordinance required a different and higher standard. The court said: "Nor is it any objection to the validity of the ordinance that its regulatory provisions and the penalty for its violation differ from those of the state law."

Counsel for the petitioner attacks the soundness of the doctrine approved in the Hoffman Case, and urges that it is in conflict with other cases decided in this state. It is sufficient for us to say that it is the very latest decision of the highest court of this state upon the subject, and is of binding authority upon this court.

In re Desanta, 8 Cal. App. 295, 96 Pac. 1027, cited by petitioner, and decided by this court, cannot, since the decision in the Hoffman Case, be considered as authority.

In re Sic, 73 Cal. 142, 14 Pac. 405, simply holds "that there is a conflict where the ordinance and the general law punish precisely the same acts." The concluding sentence of the opinion is: "We do not wish to be understood as holding that the sections of the ordinance which make criminal other acts not punishable under the general law are void because the Legislature has seen fit to legislate upon the same subject."

The gist of the decision in Ex parte Keeney, 84 Cal. 304, 24 Pac. 34, also cited by petitioner, is to the effect that the general law required the health officer of the city and county of San Francisco to issue burial permits under certain conditions, and that an ordinance that attempted to punish him for doing what the general law not only authorized but required him to do was void.

In Ex parte Grey, 11 Cal. App. 125, 104 Pac. 476, this court simply held that an ordinance that attempted to require plumbers to obtain a license to carry on the plumbing business, from a special board created under the ordinance, was in direct conflict with an act entitled "An act to grant to boards of health or health officers in cities and cities and counties the power to regulate the plumbing and drainage of buildings, and provide for the registration of plumbers," and which provided that a license to carry on the plumbing business shall be issued only after a satisfactory examination by the board of health.

The case of People v. Newman, 96 Cal. 605, 31 pac. 564, also cited by petitioner, presented a case of a direct conflict between an ordinance of the board of supervisors, attempting to establish a fire department and to provide for the appointment of fire commissioners, with an act that was a constituent part of the charter and established a fire department, and provided for the appointment of the fire commissioners.

We do not think that any of the California cases cited by petitioner are in point save the Desanta Case, which can no longer be considered as authority.

The ordinance in question cannot be held void, or in conflict with the act of 1878 as amended in 1889.

It is also claimed that the ordinance is in conflict with an act approved March 18, 1905, and entitled "An act for the registration of deaths. * * *" St. 1905, p. 115.

This act consists of 19 sections, and is manifestly an act intended to promote and provide for the gathering and preservation of vital statistics. The case between the ordinance and this statute is very similar to the case between an ordinance and a statute considered in Borough of Yeadon v. White, 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 367, where the ordinance was sustained as not in conflict with the general law. No attempt is made to point out any particulars in which the act of 1905 conflicts with the ordinance, and we have found none.

Neither do we find anything in the act of 1907 relating to the preservation of the public health (St. 1907, p. 893) that is in conflict with the ordinance in question. This act consists of 22 sections dealing with a great number of sanitary matters. One subdivision of one of these sections provides that disinterred bodies shall be treated as infectious or dangerous to the public health, and requires the approval for the removal or transportation of such to be obtained from the state board of health. The subdivision in question, however, concludes with a proviso to the effect that "the consent of the local health authorities shall be first obtained, and all local health regulations strictly observed." It is thus perfectly clear that the Legislature, in enacting the statute of 1907, did not intend to repeal or interfere with local ordinances concerning the disinterment of the remains of deceased persons, and we find no such conflict as would work an abrogation of the ordinance. The mere fact that a license or permit is required from two different authorities does not create a conflict. Brazier v. Philadelphia, 215 Pa. 297, 64 Atl. 508.

We are of the opinion that the ordinance in question cannot be held void as in conflict with the general law of the state.

[2] It is also claimed that the ordinance in question is one for the purpose of raising revenue, and for that reason void.

Little need be said, we apprehend, upon this subject. The matter of the disinterring and removal of dead bodies is clearly one calling for sanitary regulations. The ordinance in question requires the health officer, in every case where application is made for a permit to disinter or remove the remains of a buried body, to investigate said application, and ascertain whether the disinterment or removal can be made without danger to the public health, and if so satisfied to grant the application. While the fee of $10 exacted for such permit is somewhat large, we cannot say that it is so disproportionate to the services necessary to be performed in the faithful safeguarding of the public health as to warrant us in holding that the purpose of the ordinance is revenue and not sanitary regulation.

No other point is urged for the discharge of the petitioner.

The writ is therefore discharged, and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of San Mateo county.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

NIELSON v. GROSS et al. (Civ. 867.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 8, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 6, 1911.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 99*)—OPERATION OF MINES—MINING PARTNERSHIP—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

The complaint, in an action for services rendered, alleged that defendants were a mining partnership, working and operating as such quartz mines, mining claims, and other property. Civ. Code, § 2511, provides that a mining partnership exists when two or more persons, owning a mining claim for the purpose of working it, actually engage in work. Held, that the complaint was not defective in failing to allege that the mine was being operated for the purpose of extracting minerals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 100*)—OPERATION —MINING PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION.

Where the members of a statutory mining partnership suspend the operation of the mine, intending to permanently abandon it, the partnership itself is dissolved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 100*)—OPERATION —MINING PARTNERSHIP—ACTIONS—DISSOLUTION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

One claiming the dissolution of a statutory mining partnership has the burden of rebutting the presumption of continuance arising from the original existence of the partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

4. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 100*)—OPERATION —MINING PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION.

Proof that the members of a statutory mining partnership ceased operation with the intention of resuming work may be made either by direct or indirect evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

5. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 99*)—OPERATION — MINING PARTNERSHIP — DISSOLUTION — EVIDENCE.

In an action where it was sought to charge defendant as a member of a mining partnership, evidence held to support a finding that the partnership had not been dissolved by abandoning the operation of the mine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 171*)—REVIEW—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURT BELOW.

In an action against a mining partnership, there could be no complaint on appeal because of the admission of certain evidence, even though not admissible under the complaint, where the case was tried upon the theory that such evidence was within the issues.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Fred Searls and E. W. McGraw, for appellant. J. M. Fulweiler, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The complaint is in two counts, and it is made the basis for the recovery from defendants Gross and McGraw, as mining partners, for work and labor performed as a miner by plaintiff for the partnership, for a period extending from the 10th day of February, 1908, to the 28th day of September 1909. It was also sought to foreclose a laborer's lien on the property, alleged to belong to L. D. Butt, but the court held that no lien existed, and the correctness of that decision is not questioned on the present appeal. A demurrer was interposed to the amended complaint, but it was overruled.

E. W. McGraw is the only defendant that answered. He admitted that the services were performed, and were of the value alleged, and that by virtue of the statutes of the state Gross and he were mining partners, prior to October 26, 1908, and he offered to pay plaintiff for the amount due for his work to that date, but he denied that at any time subsequent to said October 26th defendant Gross and he were mining or other partners. He averred that on October 26, 1908, all work on the mines was definitely abandoned, and the mining partnership ended; that thereafter no mining work was done on the property by Gross and McGraw, and that from and after October 26, 1908, plaintiff did no work as a miner, but was employed by defendant Gross as a caretaker, except that from June 29, 1909, to and including July 30, 1909, defendant McGraw employed men, and among them the plaintiff in prospecting the mine in question, and that defendant McGraw paid plaintiff in full for said labor, and that Gross had nothing whatever to do with that work. The court found in favor of plaintiff, and the appeal is from the judgment on a bill of exceptions.

[1] The objection to the complaint is that the facts are insufficient to show the existence of a mining partnership. The following is the allegation in that respect: "That during all the times hereinafter mentioned the defendants L. A. Gross and E. W. McGraw were a mining partnership, working and operating as such certain quartz mines, mining claims, and properties hereinafter more particularly described as one mine, near Carlisle, in Meadow Lake mining district, in the county of Nevada state of California." The statute defines a mining partnership as follows: "A mining partnership exists when two or more persons, who own or acquire a mining claim for the purpose of working it and extracting the mineral therefrom, actually engage in working the same." Civ. Code, § 2511. The point is that a mining partnership is the "creation of the statute"; that when reliance is had upon "a right or status created by the statute" "the pleader must state all the facts necessary to bring the case within the statute" (Dye v. Dye, 11 Cal. 163); and that this requirement has not been observed, by reason of the failure to allege that the defendants were working the mine for the purpose of "extracting the mineral therefrom." We feel confident, however, that appellant had no difficulty in understanding, from the allegations of the complaint that the foregoing was the identical purpose for which the mine was being operated. The complaint might have been more specific in this respect, but the pleader could safely indulge the presumption that the defendants would use common sense in the construction of the complaint, and would therefore easily reach the conclusion that the mine was being operated for the ordinary and general purpose for which such mines are developed.

[2] There is another objection of appellant that is entitled to more serious consideration. It relates to the finding that the plaintiff was employed by the partnership. It is contended that, "on October 26 or 28, 1908, the mining operations ceased, and there was no agreement to resume them in the future. By such cessation of work without any agreement for resumption, the mining partnership between Gross and McGraw was ipso facto dissolved, and thereafter they were merely tenants in common, and as such had no power to bind each other by contract. Wagoner v. Silva, 139 Cal. 562 [73 Pac. 433]." Many authorities are cited in support of the principle. Among these, the following quotations are made from Chancellor Kent, and note 7, p. 228, vol. 22, Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law: "If a partnership is formed for a single purpose or transaction it ceases as soon as the business is completed, and nothing can be more natural or reasonable than the rule of the civil law that the partnership in any business should cease when there was an end put to the business itself." 3 Kent's Com. (14th Ed.) p. 71. Said note is as follows: "Where the actual working of the mine has ceased, the relation of the co-owners is that of tenants in common, and not that of partners, and there is no longer any confidential relation between them. Harris v. Lloyd, 11 Mont. 390 [28 Pac. 736] 28 Am. St. Rep. 475."

[3] But, granting that appellant has stated the rule with substantial accuracy, it does not apply, as we view it, to a temporary suspension of the operation of the mine. There must be an abandonment of the work, before it can be said that the partnership is at an end. If there was an understanding, express or implied, to resume at a later date, the mere cessation of labor would not result as a dissolution. This, as we understand it, is conceded by appellant. While he speaks of an agreement as necessary to continue the partnership, he does not contend that it may not be implied, as well as executed. And, whatever may be required to prevent dissolution on the cessation of labor, the burden of proof, it would seem, must be borne by appellant to show that the partnership was terminated. This follows from the presumption arising from the admitted fact that the partnership existed prior to October 26, 1908. It would be presumed to continue, unless the contrary were shown. While it may be said that there was some evidence that the work of joint operation of the mine was at an end, the court was not bound to hold that this evidence overcame the said presumption.

[4, 5] But, conceding that plaintiff was required to prove that the parties intended to resume operations, then, of course, this could be proven by direct or indirect evidence, or both, and it cannot be said that such inference finds no valid support in the record. Indeed, some of the circumstances detailed by the witnesses are inconsistent with the view that the work of development had been abandoned by the partnership. It is at least a fair inference that for a long time subsequent to October 28, 1908, appellant and Gross intended to go on with the work as before. We shall not undertake a recital of all the evidence tending to show a continuance of the partnership, but will refer to some of the circumstances seemingly justifying the court's conclusion. In the first place, it is perfectly clear that they had not abandoned the mine. Appellant admits that in the spring and summer of 1909 he spent $1,000 for work and prospecting in the mine. This is entirely inconsistent with the theory of a previous abandonment of the property. There is no direct evidence why they discontinued operations on October 26 or 28, 1908, but it is fair to infer that it was on account of the approach of winter. There is nothing to show that the partnership operation was not profitable and agreeable to both parties. It was therefor a reasonable conclusion that they intended to continue the work as they had begun it.

Again, no notice was given of any dissolution of partnership. This is a circumstance of some importance, especially in view of the probability of such claims as the one before us. The evidence shows that appellant had notice of the work being done by plaintiff, and, upon the theory that the partnership had been dissolved, appellant's silence is hardly consistent with fair dealing and ordinary business prudence. The fact of the employment of plaintiff to take care of the mine, also as already indicated, signified a purpose to resume operations. What was done may have been for the purpose, it is true, of effecting a sale of the property; but these circumstances undoubtedly lend support to the view of the trial court that the cessation of operations by the partnership was not intended to be final.

Some additional evidence that the parties intended to resume is also found in the testimony of plaintiff and of Mr. Gross. The former testified that "when Mr. Gross left [October 28, 1908] he wanted me to take care of the property. He told me I would get my money inside of 10 days; they will settle everything up, and he will come back next spring; he left me to take care of the mine. I thought all the time Gross would be back in 1909 to resume work." Prior to said October 28th, it may be said, the mine was in charge of said Gross. Furthermore, he testified that Mahon, when he shut down on the 1st of August, said to him: "Chris, you are on Mr. McGraw's pay roll now." Gross testified that at the time he employed plaintiff, after they had suspended operations, "McGraw was still concerned with me in the operation and control of the properties," and that there was no dissolution of the partnership arrangement. Without further consideration, we think it must be held that there is substantial evidence to support the said finding.

[6] It is true that the work done by plaintiff for which he seeks recovery was not directly for the purpose of extracting mineral from the mine, but it seems so closely connected therewith as to bring it within "the scope of the objects" of the partnership. Gross testified: "When I left Nielson in charge, my instruction to him was to take charge of the property and protect it, see to the shoveling off of the roofs and preserving of the buildings in winter, and protect the general personal property around camp, and keep people from carrying them off; that was absolutely necessary." He states that these buildings were necessary for the development of the property, and he explained how important it was that this work should be done. The plaintiff's testimony shows that he carried out his instructions fully, and also cut a large quantity of wood for the camp. Strictly speaking, this work was probably not that of a miner, and in this respect there was a variance between the proof and the allegations of the complaint; but no objection was made on that ground in the court below, and it must be held that the case was tried upon the theory that the evidence was within the issues, and it is now too late to question it.

The foregoing seem to be the only points requiring specific attention. We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Petition for mandamus by Carl Rhodes against B. V. Sargent, as Judge of the Superior Court of Monterey County. Petition dismissed.

B. A. Herrington, for petitioner. Attorney General Webb, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus. The petitioner herein, charged with murder, was tried and found guilty of murder in the second degree. On June 5, 1911, a motion for a new trial was denied, and a judgment of conviction was entered, from which judgment and order petitioner, in open court, on said 5th day of June, announced and took an appeal. At the same time the court, upon petitioner's motion, directed the phonographic reporter to transcribe all the testimony and proceedings had and taken at the trial, for the purpose of said appeal. In compliance with that order, the proceedings were transcribed and filed with the clerk, and presented to the judge within the time prescribed by law; but the judge, on July 5th, refused to certify thereto, canceled the certificate of probable cause, and ordered and decreed that the judgment be forthwith enforced, upon the ground that petitioner's appeal was ineffectual for any purpose, for the reason that he had not filed and presented a proper application within five days after the entry of the judgment, stating the ground of the appeal, the points upon which he relied, and designating what portions of the reporter's notes it would be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points of the appeal. Whereupon this proceeding was instituted to compel the court to certify to the reporter's transcript, in order that petitioner might perfect his appeal.

The action of the court in this regard was based upon section 1247 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1911, which amendment was passed April 6th of that year, and went into operation 60 days thereafter, to wit, June 5th (Santa Cruz Water Co. v. Kron, 74 Cal. 222, 15 Pac. 772), the day the appeal herein was taken. That section as amended reads as follows: "Upon an appeal being taken from any judgment or order of the superior court to the Supreme Court, or to a district court of appeal, in any criminal action or proceeding, where such an appeal is allowed by law, the defendant, or the district attorney when the people appeal, must within five days file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed, and the judgment or order may be enforced as if no appeal had been taken. * * *" St. 1911, p. 692.

[1] There is no escape from the order of the court questioned in this proceeding. The section is plainly mandatory. Prior to its amendment, it directed, as it does now, that the appellant should file with the clerk an application to the court, stating generally "the ground of the appeal, and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portion of the phonographic reporter's notes it would be necessary to have transcribed" to fairly present the appeal; but it did not, as it does now, prescribe that "if such application is not filed within said time the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed, and the judgment or order may be enforced as if no appeal had been taken." As this section stood originally, it was deemed directory only; and, as is too often the case where a law is thus regarded, it was "more honored in the breach than the observance," and invariably, whether necessary or not, the entire record was written up, resulting in a great and needless waste of public funds. One of the purposes of this amendment, if not the only purpose, was to remedy that evil. The history of the section, therefore, as well as its language, clearly indicates that it was intended to be mandatory. Another reason for so holding is that, where a statute imposes a penalty for noncompliance with its directions, as does this one, it is as a rule to be regarded as imperative. Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Const. (2d Ed.) § 610; Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes (4th Ed.) 554; Corbett v. Bradley, 7 Nev. 106; Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, 607, 608, 616; Cran's Statute Law, 236; Black on Interpretation of Laws, 334; McCrea v. Haraszthy, 51 Cal. 150; Perine v. Forbush, 97 Cal. 308, 32 Pac. 226.

In the last case it is pertinently said: "Where the statute attaches a consequence to the failure to perform the act within the time limited, the consequence can be avoided only by a compliance with the statute." Here the defendant was ignorant of the amendment, which went into effect on the day he took his appeal, the testimony was transcribed, and any expense to the county which an observance of the law would have saved has been already incurred; therefore, counsel for petitioner argues, the appeal should be allowed. If the defendant had done the things to perfect his appeal required by the law as it stood for two years prior to the amendment, he would not now be here complaining of the action of the trial court. He omitted to do those things; and, as the amendment peremptorily requires them to be done, we cannot, whatever the hardship of the case may be, afford him any relief. To place upon this statute a construction which would extricate the defendant from his difficulty would establish a precedent, and encourage further infringements of the law, and the mandatory effect thereof would be impaired, if not wholly destroyed. Summarized, the defendant's position amounts to a request to be excused on account of his ignorance of the law, which is, of course, no excuse. In neither a criminal nor civil cause, in any circumstances, can one justify his act by the naked showing that he did not know of the existence of the law. "Ignorantia juris non excusat" is therefore a rule in our jurisprudence, as in the Roman, whence it is derived. 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 294.

[2] And when a statute takes effect it is operative, even in localities so remote as to render any knowledge of its existence impossible. Id., § 1296. The reason of the rule was well stated in Matthews v. Zane, 7 Wheat. 179, 5 L. Ed. 425, where it is said: "It being practically impossible actually to notify every person in the community of the passage of a law, whatever day might be appointed for its taking effect, no general rule could be adopted less exceptionable. The general rule may, in some instances, produce hardship; but, if ignorance of the law was admitted as an excuse, too wide a door would be left open for the breach of it."

For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the petition be dismissed.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant was convicted, after indictment, of the crime of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and the order denying her motion for a new trial.

[1] In support of her claim that the defendant's motion to set aside the indictment was improperly denied, the point is presented that no oath was especially administered to the person who acted as stenographic reporter for the grand jury, before he entered upon the duty of reporting the testimony taken in the particular case of this defendant. The record of the proceedings had in the lower court upon the hearing of the motion to set aside the indictment discloses that when the grand jury was first impaneled and organized Howard Vernon was appointed as the official reporter, and that, before entering upon his duties, there was administered to him by the foreman a general oath to correctly take in shorthand and transcribe all of the testimony given by any witness testifying before the grand jury. It is the contention of the defendant that the statute does not authorize such a general oath, and that, where the services of a reporter are required by the grand jury, he should be repeatedly sworn to report each particular case under investigation. It is further claimed that the foreman of the grand jury was authorized by statute to swear only the witnesses who might be called to testify, and that nowhere in the law is there to be found any authority for the foreman administering an oath to the reporter who may be called upon to serve the grand jury. From this it is argued that, unless an oath be administered in each particular case, and by some one with power to administer oaths, other than the foreman of the grand jury, the reporter is not qualified to act; and that if, under such circumstances, he is permitted to be present at the session of the grand jury at which a defendant is indicted he must be considered as a person other than those permitted to be present by the provisions of section 925 of the Penal Code. This section, as we read and understand it, does not require that the reporter of the grand jury must be especially sworn in each and every case that may be under investigation. The language of the section is broad enough to warrant the interpretation that the reporter who is appointed and, in the first instance, sworn to serve the grand jury is to continue in that capacity at the pleasure of the grand jury until its labors are completed. We are of the opinion that when the reporter is once sworn to faithfully perform the duties of his office this is a substantial and sufficient compliance with the statute, and it is not necessary that he be repeatedly and specifically sworn to act in each individual case that may be called to the attention of the grand jury.

[2] It is true that section 925 of the Penal Code does not authorize the foreman of the grand jury to administer the oath to the person appointed to act as its reporter, and that the Legislature has omitted to designate in express terms who shall administer such oath. However, section 2093 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "* * * Every officer or person authorized to take testimony in any action or proceeding, or to decide upon evidence, has power to administer oaths." The foreman of the grand jury is an officer of the court, and he, in conjunction with his fellow grand jurors, is certainly empowered to take testimony and to decide upon evidence. It would seem, therefore, that under the general provisions of the section last quoted the foreman of the grand jury was authorized to administer the oath in question.

[3, 4] Defendant makes the further point in support of her motion to set aside the indictment that Howard Vernon, the official reporter of the grand jury, was called as a witness for the people upon the investigation of the crime charged against her, and that he was permitted and required to report and transcribe his own testimony. In this behalf the record shows that Vernon, who was also the official reporter of the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, was called as a witness to identify and certify to the correctness of the deposition of one E. C. Miles, who, as a witness for the people, had given testimony in a proceeding previously instituted against the defendant in the police court, which was relevant and material to the charge then being investigated by the grand jury. Ordinarily it would have been the safer and better method to have appointed another reporter, if one was available, to take the testimony of the witness. It was conceded, however, in the lower court that Vernon correctly reported and transcribed his own testimony, and no suggestion was then or is now made that the defendant was in any manner prejudiced by the procedure adopted in this instance. Moreover, the supposed irregularity is not one of the statutory grounds of a motion to set aside an indictment, and it was therefore properly ignored by the trial court upon the hearing of the motion to set aside the indictment in the case at bar.

The record does not sustain the assertion of counsel for the defendant that a deputy district attorney was called as a witness before the grand jury, and gave testimony against the defendant without being sworn. The record shows that during the course of the examination of the witness Vernon a deputy district attorney read the deposition hereinbefore referred to. This apparently was done in aid of an intelligent development of the testimony sought to be introduced upon the hearing, and it was a necessary incident to the right of the district attorney, conferred by section 925 of the Penal Code, to be present at the sessions of the grand jury for the purpose of interrogating witnesses.

[5] Counsel for the defendant claims that the evidence adduced at the trial does not support the verdict of the jury, finding the defendant guilty of the crime of grand larceny. It is insisted that the crime, if any, committed by the defendant was that of obtaining money by false pretenses. This claim is based upon the assumption that the evidence affirmatively shows that the complaining witness parted with the title to, as well as the possession of, the money charged to have been feloniously taken by the defendant. We cannot agree with this interpretation of the testimony. The undisputed facts upon which the defendant was indicted and convicted are in substance and effect these:

The defendant claimed to be a spiritualist, and posed as clairvoyant. The complaining witness, Mrs. Francis Shaw, attended a number of séances given by the defendant, and eventually became a pupil of the defendant in the study of spiritualism. At one of these séances Mrs. Shaw was induced, by false and fraudulent pretenses and the deceit and artifice commonly employed in cases of larceny by trick and device, to give the defendant the sum of $150, with which to purchase for the complaining witness certain mining stock. When the defendant received this money, she said to the complaining witness: "Now, don't be uneasy about your money; you will get it back again, I guarantee, with good interest. * * * I will get a certificate in a couple of weeks." The certificate of stock did not materialize at the end of two weeks, and upon several occasions thereafter the complaining witness demanded of the defendant the promised certificate of stock, or the return of the money. For several months the defendant evaded doing either, upon the pretext, made from time to time, that she was unable to purchase the stock. Finally, and without any explanation of her conduct, the defendant flatly refused to return the money or produce the certificate of stock. However, after a civil suit to recover the money had been instituted, the defendant tendered a paper writing, which she said was a certificate of stock. This the complaining witness refused to accept, saying: "I don't want the certificate. I want my money."

From all the facts in the case, the jury was justified in finding, as implied by the verdict, that the complaining witness never intended to vest in the defendant the title to the money in question, and that it was at all times the defendant's intent and purpose, by trick and device, to get possession of the money, and then appropriate it to her own use. It is undisputed that the money was intrusted to the defendant for the sole purpose of purchasing mining stock, and until this purpose was executed the title to the money, in the eyes of the law, remained in the complaining witness. It was therefore the subject of larceny, and its misappropriation by the defendant, coupled with a preexisting design to defraud the complaining witness, constituted the crime of larceny. People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 737, 81 Pac. 131.

[6] The trial court did not err in its ruling permitting the district attorney, over the objection of the defendant, to show that, prior to the crime here charged against her, the defendant had systematically tricked and defrauded several other persons under like circumstances, and by methods and means similar to those employed by the defendant upon the complaining witness in this case. This evidence was admitted for the single purpose of showing the felonious intent of the defendant prior to and at the time she obtained possession of the money of the complaining witness, and for that limited purpose it was clearly admissible. The intent of the defendant at the time she obtained possession of the money determined the character of her offense; and, while it is true generally that the intent with which a person does an act may be inferred from all of the surrounding circumstances, the prosecution, nevertheless, is not limited in its efforts to establish that intent to mere proof of the bald facts of the transaction. It was therefore the right and duty of the district attorney to show affirmatively, if he could, a felonious intent, or failing in that, to negative an innocent intent on the part of the defendant. The doing of the acts charged agaist the defendant was not disputed. Her intent, which was a material ingredient of the crime charged, was the only controverted point in the case; and it is clear that evidence of previous similar and systematic frauds would have a legitimate tendency to show that the defendant, in her dealings with the complaining witness, was prompted by a specific intent to deceive and defraud. For this purpose the evidence complained of was competent, relevant, and material, and therefore it was clearly admissible, notwithstanding it may have also tended to show the commission of other crimes, not charged in the indictment against the defendant. People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 271, 5 Pac. 240; People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 473, 98 Pac. 194; Makin et ux. v. Atty. Gen., 63 Law Journal Rep. (N. S.) 41; Reg. v. Heesom, 14 Cox's Crim. Law Cases, 40.

[7] Complaint is made of one instruction given by the trial court in its charge to the jury. This particular instruction does not appear to be in conflict with the balance of the court's charge, and as it was given at the request of the defendant the error, if any, in the giving of it cannot now be considered or reviewed. People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 240, 63 Pac. 351.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

LINDER HARDWARE CO. v. PACIFIC SUGAR CORPORATION. (Civ. 806.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 8, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Nov. 7, 1911.)

1. NOVATION (§ 4*)—REQUISITES.

A novation presupposes a previous obligation for which the new one is substituted.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4848–4851; vol. 8, p. 7733.]

2. NOVATION (§ 12*)—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden is on defendant to establish a novation pleaded in defense of suit on a debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Novation, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. NOVATION (§ 12*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence, in an action on debts, held insufficient to show a novation pleaded by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Novation, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

4. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 135*)—ACTION ON ACCOUNT —EVIDENCE.

In an action on an account for labor, brought by the assignee thereof, evidence as to the order under which the assignment was made and the order itself were admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Dec. Dig. § 135.*]

5. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 523*)—EVIDENCE.

In a suit on a note, assignment thereof to plaintiff was sufficiently shown to make the note admissible in evidence, where it appeared that it was given by defendant in adjustment of defendant's account with the payee and delivered by defendant to plaintiff, that it was sent to the payee and returned thereafter with the assignment indorsed upon it, signed by the payee corporation by its treasurer, and that it was in plaintiff's possession at the trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Linder Hardware Company against the Pacific Sugar Corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied, 118 Pac. 789.

Bradley & Bradley and Gray, Barker, Bowen, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, for appellant. G. W. Zartman and Power & McFadzean, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff seeks to recover from defendant on three separate counts: For goods sold and delivered, $3,407.47; on an account for labor, alleged to have been assigned to plaintiff, $2,000; on a promissory note, alleged to have been executed by defendant to Studebaker Bros. Company, and assigned to plaintiff, $2,370.15. A fourth, based on a promissory note, was dismissed as not then due.

The defendant did not deny the purchase of the goods, the performance of the labor, or the execution of the note, but, by amended answer, set up certain separate defenses: (1) That a new contract of novation was entered into between plaintiff and defendant, whereby payment of the obligation sued upon was postponed, and payment was to be made in sugar, thereafter, to be manufactured by defendant, instead of in cash, and that performance under the new contract was not due when the action was commenced. (2) That plaintiff acquired ownership of the claim for labor only as a result of the contract of novation; that said claim was part of a larger claim owing at the time to one Hibama, and, as matter of law, this demand could not be split up without defendant's consent, to which it did not consent, except by novation. (3) The assignment of the Studebaker promissory note is denied.

The findings of the trial court were in favor of plaintiff, and judgment was entered for the several items, aggregating, with attorney's fees and interest, $8,179.29. Defendant appeals from the order denying its motion for a new trial, and from the judgment.

[1, 2] The principal proposition discussed in appellant's brief is thus stated: "The evidence established a contract of novation which entirely changed the rights and relations of the parties as to all the items embraced in the action." In short, the claim is that plaintiff agreed that defendant might pay its obligations in sugar, instead of in money. Novation presupposes a previous obligation for which the new one is substituted. It is made by contract, and is subject to all the rules concerning contracts in general. Civ. Code, §§ 1530, 1532. In the present case, it is pleaded in defense, and the burden of establishing it was on the defendant. The soundness of appellant's contention can only be tested by an examination of the evidence adduced at the trial, and this involves the necessity of stating it with some fullness.

[3] It appears that plaintiff is a mercantile house, doing business at the city of Tulare, and defendant was one of its customers. Defendant is engaged in growing sugar beets and manufacturing them into sugar, having one factory at Visalia, Tulare county, and another at Corcoran, in Kern county. At the time the action was commenced, defendant was indebted to plaintiff on an open account for merchandise, amounting to $3,407.47. Defendant was also indebted to one Hibama for work and labor done in the field, in the year 1908, in the sum of over $2,000. Hibama was also indebted to plaintiff for an amount in excess of this sum. He gave plaintiff an order on defendant for $2,000, which plaintiff credited to Hibama's account and charged it to defendant's account. On March 29, 1909, defendant executed its promissory note to the Studebaker Bros. Company for the sum of $2,370.16, which it is alleged was assigned to plaintiff prior to the commencement of the action. These three demands constituted the basis of the action.

There were but three witnesses called in the case: Mr. Linder, of plaintiff company; Mr. Cole, of defendant company, each concededly authorized to speak and act for his respective corporation; and Mr. Hibama, witness for plaintiff, with whom defendant contracted for certain labor. Mr. Cole's testimony was taken by deposition.

Witness Linder testified to the amount of the open account of his company against defendant for the year 1909 up to the commencement of the action, which was July 26, 1909, and that the statement as shown was presented to defendant and was correct, amounting to $3,407.47, no part of which has been paid. We do not understand that the amount of this indebtedness is questioned by defendant, nor, for that matter, either of the other demands. The witness next testified that he received the following order from Mr. Hibama on the sugar company:

"$2,000.00. Tulare, Cal., April 30, 1909.

"At three days' sight pay to the order of Linder Hardware Co. two thousand and no/100 dollars and exchange value received and charge the same to account of "Henry Hibama.

"To Pacific Sugar Corporation, Corcoran, Cal."

The instrument was received in evidence over defendant's objection that no proper foundation had been laid, and that it was irrelevant and immaterial. The witness testified that the order was afterwards presented to defendant—"sent through the bank"—the response being, "No funds." He testified: "I had a conversation with Mr. Cole with reference to this order. At that time, or shortly afterwards, Mr. Cole expected to make arrangements with the Crocker National Bank to pay all outstanding indebtedness, and that was one of the first things to be taken care of after they had made the arrangement. That was what Mr. Cole said. At the time plaintiff received this order from Henry Hibama, he was indebted to the plaintiff in a sum considerably over $2,000." Over defendant's objection, witness testified that "plaintiff gave Mr. Hibama credit for that, and charged it up to the sugar company," and that no part of it has been paid. A promissory note, dated March 29, 1909, for $2,370.16, payable to the Studebaker Bros. Company, signed: "Pacific Sugar Corporation, by Jacob Adloff, President. Attest: W. C. Petchner, Secretary," to which the corporate seal was affixed, "indorsed on the back thereof as follows: 'Studebaker Brothers Company of California, by Chester W. Weaver, Treasurer' "—was shown the witness, being the note set out in the complaint. Witness testified: That prior to this the indebtedness between the Studebaker Bros. Company and defendant was an open account, and the matter was turned over to witness for adjustment. He "took the note from the Pacific Sugar Corporation for the Studebaker people." He testified: "The note was first taken from the sugar people and sent to San Francisco, and they made the indorsement on it and mailed it to me, and returned it to me, perhaps within two or three days. Just made the assignment and returned it to me. Q. Was the indorsement on the back of the note at the time it was turned over to you? A. Yes, sir." The note was admitted in evidence, over defendant's objection that it was "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, no proper foundation laid, no proof of assignment." Witness testified further: "I afterwards notified the Pacific Sugar Corporation that plaintiff was the holder of that note by verbal notice to Mr. Cole, and I think to Mr. Petchner, too, at one time prior to filing the suit. Mr. Petchner, I think, was secretary of the defendant company. No part of that indebtedness has been paid." On cross-examination, the witness testified: "The officer of the defendant with whom I conducted these negotiations leading up to the first transaction about which I testified—the Hibama transaction—was Mr. Cole. I did not have any talk with Mr. Cole at that time about the payment of the $2,000 obligation of Hibama in sugar. The first real conversation had about sugar was after we brought suit. There was no discussion, except in a casual way, before we brought suit; nothing definite; no agreement at all."

Witness Hibama testified: That he did certain work for defendant in 1908, for which he presented a statement, given in the record and admitted by defendant to be correct. It showed an indebtedness of defendant to witness, on October 15, 1908, of $6,678.14. To this was added a further indebtedness, subsequently incurred in that year, of $751.09 for chopping wood, making in all $7,429.23, all of which he testified was owing to him shortly after October 15, 1908. A payment of $500 was made December 28, 1908, and another of $250 on January 15, 1909; that, on April 30, 1909, he gave the order in question to plaintiff, and credited it to defendant's account, and plaintiff credited it on the account of witness. He testified further that, on April 30, 1909, defendant gave him a draft for $500, and that the balance of $2,179.23, due for 1908, was paid in July, 1909. The statement of account also included an unpaid balance for labor in 1907. Upon cross-examination, he testified: "In my testimony I said I had given credit to the Pacific Sugar Corporation for $2,000 on the Linder Hardware Company. I got nothing in writing from the defendant to show that credit. I simply gave that credit on my own books. I asked Mr. Cole for payment at that time. He told me he made some arrangement with the Linder Hardware Company, so he wanted me to make $2,000 order on the Linder Hardware Company; so I did. Mr. Cole was the vice president of the sugar company. * * * Mr. Cole told me at the time the subject of this $2,000 order was discussed between him and me that he had arranged with the Linder Hardware Company to pay the amount in sugar. He told me that he made arrangement with the plaintiff to sell the sugar, so he wanted me to make something, do something, an order. I did not talk about that transaction with Mr. Linder. I just made out an order. Mr. Cole was the one who first asked me to make out the order. I then took it to Mr. Linder, and he accepted the order. I told Mr. Linder Mr. Cole wanted me to do that way. Q. Did you tell him that Mr. Cole said that arrangements were made, so that payment would be made in sugar? A. Well, I didn't say; just didn't say it. Q. You didn't say it? A. No, sir. Q. What did you say about the sugar? A. Mr. Cole told me, he told me he made arrangement to sell his sugar to the Linder Hardware Company." On redirect, he testified: That he had previously asked Mr. Cole for money, and was told he had no money, and that the statement of the account he had presented referred to the year 1908. "Q. And this order that you gave to Mr. Linder was for part of the money that was due you for 1908?" To which objection was made as immaterial, and that the order is the best evidence. The witness answered: "Yes, sir; 1908, on the old account."

Witness Linder was recalled for cross-examination, and testified: As to the item of $203.50 each for Studebaker wagons, in plaintiff's bill of particulars, that the wagons were ordered from the San Francisco house of Studebaker Bros. Company, and were received by them May 17, 1909; that the wagons were shipped from the factory on May 29th, and arrived at Tulare June 14th; that they were not shipped from the East, but came from San Francisco; that they have a factory in South Bend, Ind., and a house in San Francisco. "It was from the San Francisco house the wagons were ordered." He further testified that the wagons were delivered to defendant, and went into use.

Witness Cole testified at considerable length; much of his testimony being upon matters not necessary to be stated. In substance his testimony was: That he had a conference with Mr. Linder in April, 1909, about the purchase of Studebaker wagons, which resulted in the purchase, after about a month, during which interval he and Mr. Linder had several interviews. At these meetings Mr. Linder explained to him that he owned an account held by the Studebakers against defendant, and the account of plaintiff against defendant was also spoken of, as also was the Hibama account against defendant; that witness proposed that all these claims be paid in sugar, including the Studebaker and Hibama indebtedness, of which latter $2,000 was to be assigned to plaintiff and paid in sugar. "The sugar was to be purchased in the regular way through some jobber; Mr. Linder fully understood the reason for that. We manufacturers could not sell direct to retailers without disturbing trade conditions, but we could deliver this sugar to him through any wholesale dealer whom he might select. I explained this fully to Mr. Linder. The sugar was to be sold at the San Francisco wholesale prices, plus the freight to Tulare, * * * and enough sugar was to be delivered in this way to the plaintiff to pay these accounts; that is, the Linder Hardware Company and the Hibama account, and also the account for the purchase of the new wagons. * * * Delivery of the sugar was to be made during the manufacturing season, at the convenience of both parties." He testified that he explained to Mr. Linder that certain creditors had prior claims on the sugar to be produced that season (naming them), in amounts aggregating about $280,000; that at that time they "were very hopeful of having a large crop"; that there was no other discussion between witness and Mr. Linder "with reference to the purchase of these wagons, or any arrangement, other than the payment in sugar in that way. I think I told Mr. Linder we had no money, and would have to pay those bills out of our crop," and that the agreement was not reduced to writing during these negotiations. He testified: "I considered that the agreement was made orally and Mr. Linder sent for me one day and wanted me to enter into a written contract. I am not able to say definitely when that took place, but it was subsequent to the arrangement;" that the transaction was fully understood and fully completed before the contract was drawn up; that Mr. Linder was to prepare the contract, "and if his draft was not satisfactory he would amend it, or change it. This was either after the factory had started, or about the time it started." It elsewhere appeared that the factory at Corcoran started up about July 15, 1909. He testified further that Mr. Linder's attorney prepared a draft of the contract, which was presented to defendant. A copy of this contract was introduced, and, as originally drawn, bore date July 19, 1909, but there was a clause "seeking to bind Mr. Poindexter, the trustee, to the delivery of the sugar, which defendant informed Mr. Linder would prevent the ratification by defendant." (Mr. Poindexter, apparently, was in charge of the factories for creditors.)

Certain changes were made by interlineation by Mr. Petchner. It appears that the directors of defendant did not sign this contract until after the present suit was brought, and also that the defendant never communicated to plaintiff its willingness to sign it. (The action was commenced July 26, 1909.) Witness testified further: That after the suit was begun he offered to return the wagons. "Q. On the assumption that a mistake might have been made as to the terms of this agreement, was it, or what was the purpose of making such tender? A. My idea was that if we disagreed, the best thing to do was to try and straighten the matter out, and that seemed to be the way to do it—to give him back his property."

On cross-examination, he testified: That this offer was after the wagons had been in use, and after suit brought on these claims; that "the only offer of sugar was made after the suit was begun," and that Mr. Linder was not satisfied with the samples; that "they were not up to standard"; that other samples were offered, and Mr. Linder went to his bins and brought out a sample of such sugar as he was selling, and pointed out the difference between the two samples "as to color." Mr. Linder also stated that if defendant "would give him such sugar as the customers would take he was ready to take the sugar. Q. Did you ever offer him any sugar before or after the trial that he would accept as being merchantable? A. I never presented any further samples, because the conclusion was the matter was in the courts, and the bond had been given for the attachment, and the members of our board were not willing for me to do anything further in the matter." It appeared that defendant did not produce enough sugar during the season to meet the preferred claims; that defendant had some sugar of the 1908 run which was not subject to the lien of preferred creditors, and the samples offered to plaintiff were of this sugar, which Mr. Linder said was not merchantable. "The sample of sugar that defendant expected to be able to deliver was not acceptable to him by reason of the color. That is the only time defendant ever offered him sugar, and that was after the suit was brought."

On redirect, Mr. Linder testified: "I think I recollect the circumstance of a conversation between myself and Mr. Cole and Mr. Zartman [defendant's attorney], as detailed, as taking place some time along during the middle of the month of July. The conversation, as far as I remember now, was this: They were to pay up last year's account, and all current business was to be paid out of the money coming from the Crocker National Bank. After the mortgage went on record, and we didn't get anything, of course I was willing to take anything else. That led up to the sugar proposition. Then it was that defendant proposed to give plaintiff sugar. I instructed Mr. Zartman to draw up a memorandum of agreement as to furnishing plaintiff sugar from that time on. I never heard anything more of that agreement. Nobody ever offered any sugar to me, or gave me any sugar. I requested sugar a number of times. Q. And never received any? There never was any compliance with those requests? A. Not in merchantable goods."

It is urged that the testimony of Mr. Cole shows beyond controversy the establishment of a novation, and that there is no substantial conflict between his testimony and that of Mr. Linder; that "Mr. Linder does not directly contradict any statement made by Mr. Cole, and there is not necessarily any indirect contradiction, as the testimony of Mr. Linder may all be true in its material features, and yet not necessarily inconsistent with the material statements of Mr. Cole."

After all is said of this testimony, the one dominant question of fact is, Did the parties mutually agree that all the items of indebtedness should be paid for in sugar and not in money? As to this vital fact, did the minds of the parties meet in May, as testified to by Mr. Cole, and was that mutually conceded to be the fact governing the parties in their subsequent dealings with each other? Is there, indeed, no substantial conflict in the testimony given by these witnesses, and must we conclude that "the testimony of Mr. Linder may all be true in its material features, and yet not necessarily inconsistent with the material statements of Mr. Cole?"

Mr. Cole testified that he had several interviews with Mr. Linder "stretching over nearly a month * * * before the arrangement was fully completed. I think it was some time in May when I gave the orders for the wagons." It is shown that the order was given May 17th, but the wagons were not delivered until June 14, 1909. The Hibama order was given April 30, 1909, and when returned, "no funds," Mr. Linder testified that he had a conversation with Mr. Cole with reference to it, and that at that time "Mr. Cole expected to make arrangements with the Crocker National Bank to pay all outstanding indebtedness, and that was one of the things to be taken care of after they had made the arrangement. That was what Mr. Cole said." This was after the date Mr. Cole says he explained fully to Mr. Linder that the defendant had no money, and could only pay in sugar. This was also after the date fixed by Mr. Cole when he commenced negotiations with plaintiff for the purchase of the wagons, which he said was in April. With reference to the Hibama transaction, as to which Mr. Cole testified that it was included in the contract to pay in sugar, Mr. Linder testified: "I did not have any talk with Mr. Cole at that time about the payment of the $2,000 obligation of Hibama in sugar. The first real conversation we had about sugar was after we brought suit. There was no discussion, except in a casual way, before we brought suit, nothing definite, no agreement at all." This was brought out on cross-examination, and it seems to us to be in sharp conflict with the testimony of Mr. Cole on a very substantial issue in the case—indeed, the vital issue.

As late as the middle of July, a conversation took place between Mr. Linder and Mr. Cole. Of this Mr. Linder testified: "They were to pay up last year's account, and all current business was to be paid out of the money coming from the Crocker National Bank. After the mortgage went on record [the Crocker mortgage], and we didn't get anything, of course, I was willing to take anything else. That led up to the sugar proposition. Then it was that defendant proposed to give plaintiff sugar. I instructed Mr. Zartman, I believe, to draw up a memorandum of agreement as to furnishing plaintiff sugar from that time on. I never heard anything more of that agreement. Nobody ever offered any sugar to me, or gave me any sugar."

It is true that Mr. Linder was not called upon, while on the witness stand, to admit or deny specifically and definitely the various facts testified to by Mr. Cole; but we find it impossible to say, as defendant says we may, that Mr. Linder's testimony "may all be true in its material features, and yet not necessarily inconsistent with the material statements of Mr. Cole." A legitimate inference may be drawn from Mr. Linder's testimony that there was no agreement that these claims should be paid in sugar up to the middle of July, and that the agreement then reached was to be put in writing, which was, by Mr. Linder's direction, so done; but it was not ratified by defendant as submitted, but was changed in some material respects, and, after this suit was brought, was signed by defendant as thus changed, but plaintiff was not notified, nor was a copy sent plaintiff, though submitted in duplicate. In fact, as Mr. Cole testified, the bringing of the suit terminated the negotiations. We do not feel called upon to analyze the testimony further or examine into other features which might lend support to the findings. Suffice it to say, that a substantial conflict is shown as to facts material to the issues, and that it cannot be said that defendant has sustained the issues presented in its special defense without substantial conflict.

[4] 2. As to the Hibama order, the evidence is that it was made by Mr. Cole's direction and with his consent, and, as defendant failed to establish its point that this indebtedness was the subject of the novation claimed, the discussion as to the law governing the splitting of demands need not be noticed. The evidence as to this order and the order itself were admissible.

[5, 6] 3. We de not think defendant can escape its liability on the Studebaker note on the only ground urged, that there was no proof of its assignment. The evidence is that this note was given in adjustment of defendant's account with the San Francisco house, and it was by defendant delivered to plaintiff; it was sent to San Francisco, and came back in two or three days with the assignment indorsed on it. This assignment was by the corporation named as payee, by its treasurer; it was in plaintiff's possession at the trial, and put in evidence. Defendant knew that plaintiff held this obligation, and it was part of the indebtedness made the subject of negotiations between plaintiff and defendant, as testified by Mr. Cole. We think it was rightly admitted in evidence. Possession of commercial paper with indorsement makes a prima facie case of delivery by the indorser to the holder, and of ownership of the latter. In Pastene v. Pardini, 135 Cal. 431, 67 Pac. 681, the court said: "The delivery was prima facie established by plaintiff's production and proffer of the note." See note to Bedell v. Herring, 77 Cal. 572, 20 Pac. 129, 11 Am. St. Rep. 323, where the cases are collected. The proposition there laid down and supported by numerous cases is thus stated: "It is well established that the mere possession of a negotiable instrument by the indorsee, or by the transferee, where no indorsement is necessary, imports prima facie that he is the lawful owner, and that he has acquired it before maturity, bona fide, for value, in the usual course of business, and without any circumstances impeaching its validity."

No other questions call for notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

LINDER HARDWARE CO. v. PACIFIC SUGAR CORPORATION.

(Sac. 1,865.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 8, 1911.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Linder Hardware Company against the Pacific Sugar Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and, an order denying a new trial having been affirmed (118 Pac. 785), defendant moves for rehearing. Rehearing denied.

Bradley & Bradley and Gray, Barker, Bowen, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, for appellant. G. W. Zartman and Power & McFadzean, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing. There was a plain and direct issue as to the assignment of the note given by defendant to Studebaker Bros. Company, and the plaintiff was bound to make proof of that fact. In my opinion, the proof was wholly insufficient. According to the weight of authority, the treasurer of a trading corporation has no power as such to indorse the negotiable paper of the corporation for sale or discount, and here was no evidence of a special authority—no evidence even that Weaver was treasurer—no evidence of the genuineness of his signature. To hold that the assignment was proved in this case is, in my opinion, to establish a dangerous precedent.

1. Intoxicating Liquors (§ 71*)—Licenses—Issuance—Discretion.

San Jose city ordinance July 7, 1908, established the limits within which retail and wholesale liquor licenses would be granted, and forbade the issuance of licenses without the territory, and provided that it should not prevent the renewal of any license to conduct a bar in any bona fide hotel then existing within the limits fixed. Held, that the issuance of a license by the board of health, permitting petitioner to conduct a hotel, merely amounted to a declaration that the premises were sufficiently sanitary to justify the issuance of a hotel license, and was not a conclusive finding against the municipal authorities that the place was or would be conducted as a hotel, and did not prevent the city treasurer, in his discretion, from finding that the building was not a bona fide hotel existing at the date of the adoption of the ordinance, or at all, and from refusing for that reason to issue a license for sale of liquors therein.

2. Intoxicating Liquors (§ 59*)—Licenses—Nature of Place—"Hotel."

Where a building consisted of a barroom, grocery store, six bedrooms, two dining rooms, and a kitchen, and was occupied continuously by a family consisting of a husband and wife and five children, and two others, guests being accommodated at night only occasionally, it was not a bona fide hotel within San Jose city ordinance July 1, 1908, regulating the issuance of liquor licenses.

3. Intoxicating Liquors (§ 130*)—Regulations—Prohibition District.

Where a city ordinance restricting the location of saloons embraced within its boundaries the center or business part of the city, the fact that the district was irregular in shape, and that there were certain streets radiating from and extending beyond the district, in which the saloons were permitted, did not show that the boundaries of the district were unreasonably established.

4. Intoxicating Liquors (§ 130*)—Regulation — Ordinances — "Bar" — "Barroom" —"Saloon."

San Jose city ordinance July 1, 1908, is entitled "An ordinance establishing the limits within which retail and wholesale licenses and transfers thereof will be granted," and provides that no license for any bar, barroom or saloon, or other public drinking place should be granted, etc. Held, that the words "bar," "barroom," and "saloon" were used, according to their commonly accepted definition, to mean rooms or places where intoxicating liquors were sold, and that the ordinance was therefore not objectionable because the body thereof did not in terms mention intoxicating liquors.

5. Intoxicating Liquors (§ 130*)—Prohibition District—Regulatory Ordinance.

San Jose city ordinance July 1, 1908, establishing a district within which sales of liquor should be limited, and providing against the issuance of licenses for the sale thereof outside such district, was not objectionable as an attempted police regulation fixing no penalty for its violation.

San Jose city charter July 1, 1908, establishing a limited district within which licenses for the sale of liquor might be granted, is not in conflict with Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Application by Kate Richter for a writ of mandamus against James Louis Lightston, as Treasurer of the City of San Jose, to compel the granting of a license to maintain a saloon on plaintiff's premises. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John B. Kerwin, for appellant. H. L. Partridge, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action is for mandate against the treasurer of the city of San Jose to compel him to issue a quarterly license to maintain a saloon for the sale of intoxicating liquors on plaintiff's premises. Judgment passed for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff had been conducting the business of a saloon keeper under a quarterly license issued by the city of San Jose. In December, 1907, the city passed an ordinance "establishing the limits within which retail and wholesale liquor licenses and transfers thereof will be granted." This license ordinance fixed the district and streets within which and upon which such licenses could be issued and forbade the issuance of licenses without this territory and provided "that nothing herein contained shall prevent the renewal of any license to conduct a bar in any bona fide hotel at present existing within said limits." This license ordinance by its terms was to take effect after the 1st day of July, 1908.

Plaintiff pleaded and the court found that on the 14th day of July, 1908, plaintiff procured from the treasurer of the city of San Jose a license to conduct a hotel upon the premises of plaintiff for the six months beginning July 1, 1908, and ending on December 31, 1908; that also on the 14th day of July, 1908, the board of health of the city of San Jose granted plaintiff a permit to conduct and maintain a hotel upon said premises; and that this permit has not been revoked—all in conformity with the ordinances of the city. Plaintiff thereupon made demand upon the treasurer of the city to issue the license for the conducting of a liquor saloon in connection with the hotel, and upon the treasurer's refusal to do so this action in mandate was brought.

[1] It is first contended that mandate should issue against the treasurer as of right, since the treasurer is vested with no discretionary power to issue or to refuse to issue such a license, and that the question of petitioner's right thereto is settled by the issuance by the board of health of the permit to conduct the hotel and by the issuance following thereon of the license to conduct the hotel. The issuance of a license permitting one to conduct a hotel is in no sense a binding finding against municipal authorities that the place is, or is to be conducted as, a hotel. Still less does it estop them from declaring, if the facts shall warrant, that a hotel is not actually being conducted. For the same reasons no more force attaches to the permit of the board of health to conduct a hotel, which amounts to nothing other than a declaration that the premises are sufficiently sanitary to justify the issuance of a license for the indicated purposes. Municipalities may well provide for a method by which such disputed questions of fact may be determined. If such a method is not provided, it does not become the imperative duty of the license officer to issue a license on demand. He must as the agent of the city be vested with certain discretionary powers, and upon his refusal to issue a license appeal may be made to the council itself, or, as here, to a court.

[2] The court found that "the building wherein such bar and saloon were kept is not and was not a bona fide hotel existing at the date of the adoption of such ordinance or existing at any other time or at all." It is contended that this is but a misplaced conclusion and is at variance with a specific finding, No. 16, which declares: "(16) That plaintiff has invested large sums of money in her business conducted at No. 575 Keyes street, which consists of a picnic park or pleasure ground, a saloon or barroom, a grocery store, a house having six bedrooms, one small and one large dining room, and a kitchen which is kept as a boarding house and eating house, at which the daily boarders varied from 4 to 40; that said boarding house and eating house was on and before December 18, 1907, and ever since has been, open to the public as a place where meals and lodgings could be had; and that occasionally persons were accommodated over night. All of said property is of a total value of $14,000." But, unless it can be said that finding 16 conclusively establishes that plaintiff was conducting a hotel business, it is not in conflict with the ultimate finding above quoted; and this cannot be said when the sole circumstance pointing to a hotel business is that "occasionally persons were accommodated over night." This is far from establishing that the business of conducting a hotel was there carried on. A consideration of the evidence confirms this conclusion and justifies the finding of the court. There are in this "hotel" six bedrooms; three bedrooms upstairs which are in reality but two rooms, the third being made by dividing one by portières. In the house there are three double beds, three three-quarter beds, and one single bed. There are five children in the family, and the husband and the wife and the five children occupy the upstairs bedrooms. The bedrooms of the lower floor alone would be available as guest chambers of this hotel; but one of these is occupied by John Cavanaugh and has been so occupied for a year. The remaining two rooms have a concrete floor, and one had been used as a kitchen and a kitchen cookstove left therein. One of them is occupied by Meyer, and the other small bedroom downstairs is occupied by another person whose name is not disclosed by the record. It may be by the barkeeper, as it is in evidence that the barkeeper sleeps in the house. Thus, there are 10 persons in all who continuously occupy the limited accommodations afforded by these six rooms. We think it requires no further elaboration of the evidence to support the finding that this is not a hotel.

[3] Against the validity of the ordinance it is contended that it does not describe a district. But by the stipulation of the parties it appears that the territory "embraced within the exterior boundaries set forth describes the center or business part of the city of San Jose." If, as appellant contends, the district is irregular in shape, and there are certain streets radiating from and extending beyond this district upon which saloons are permitted, these facts do not of themselves establish the unreasonableness of the district, and appellant does not show any additional fact to support his contention.

[4] The fact that the body of the ordinance does not in terms mention intoxicating liquors is immaterial. The title of the ordinance is above given and the body of the ordinance declares that "no licenses for any bar, barroom, saloon or other public drinking place * * * shall be granted," etc. In connection with the title no doubt can be entertained but that the ordinance was designed to prohibit the granting of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors at retail. The words "bar," "barroom," and "saloon," whatever their primary significance, have come to have accepted definitions even by the lexicographers as being rooms or places where intoxicants are sold.

[5] There is no force to the argument that the ordinance as an attempted police regulation is futile in that it fixes no penalty for a violation of its terms. Its terms, it will be noted, are prohibitory. It forbids the issuance of a license within the inhibited district. It is the province of other ordinances to impose fines and penalties for the conduct of the prohibited business without a license, and in the case of the city of San Jose the charter itself makes such provision. Article 3, c. 2, § 1, subd. 16.

[6] It is finally urged that the ordinance is in conflict with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923, is cited in support of this proposition. We fail to perceive its applicability, and counsel does not enlighten us upon the point. Recognition is made of the matter, however, in conformity with the practice of this court that where a federal question is advanced notice will be taken of it in the opinion to serve as the foundation for an application for a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied. The recent amendment of sections 1, 11, and 15 of article 6 of the Constitution does not abolish the justices' courts and other inferior courts which had been previously established by acts of the Legislature. They remain in existence with the jurisdiction vested in them by the acts creating them, until the Legislature shall, in the exercise of the power given by the section as amended, otherwise provide.

GOFF v. LADD. (S. F. 5,304.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 187*)—PARTIES—AGREEMENT FOR BENEFIT OF THIRD PERSONS—PAYMENT OF ANOTHER'S OBLIGATION.

Civ. Code, § 1559, permits a contract, made expressly for the benefit of a third person, to be enforced by him before rescission; and section 2854 entitles a creditor to the benefit of everything which his surety has received from the debtor by way of security for the performance of the obligation, and, upon maturity of the obligation, to compel application of such security to its satisfaction. Plaintiff procured a judgment against T., from which T. appealed, giving an undertaking to stay execution with a surety company, to induce it to execute which, T. and defendant's testator executed a several agreement with the surety company to "pay such judgment as the court on appeal may award to said plaintiff," and the judgment was affirmed on appeal. The surety company became insolvent, and T. died, leaving no estate. Held that, construing the statutes in view of the analogous rule entitling a creditor in equity to the benefit of all security received by the surety from the debtor, undertaking to pay the original debt, and not merely to indemnify the surety for any sum paid by him because of his obligation, the undertaking between testator and the surety company was for plaintiff's benefit, within section 1559, being in effect a promise to pay plaintiff the amount of the judgment upon affirmance, so that he could enforce it thereunder, as well as under section 2854; it being security for the performance of the surety company's obligation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Almon B. Goff, Jr., against W. Ladd, executor of Benjamin Healey, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. W. Sawyer, for appellant. W. A. S. Nicholson and D. I. Mahoney, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. When this case was in department, it was decided upon the record then before this court that this action upon a rejected claim presented against the estate of Benjamin Healey, deceased, was not commenced within three months after its rejection, and was therefore barred by the provisions of section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon petition for a rehearing and the presentation of a supplemental record, it was shown that the action upon the claim was in fact commenced within the time limited by the Code provision. The rehearing was therefore granted that the appeal might be considered on the merits.

In the court below, judgment was given for the defendant after sustaining a demurrer to the second amended complaint. The material facts alleged are as follows: In an action against William Tardiff, this plaintiff obtained a judgment for $462.55. Tardiff appealed from the judgment, giving an undertaking to stay execution with the Union Surety & Guaranty Company as surety thereon. To induce the surety company to execute the undertaking, Tardiff and Benjamin Healey, defendant's testator, entered into a written contract with the surety company, whereby they severally agreed to "pay such judgment as the court on appeal might award to the said plaintiff." On the appeal, the judgment was affirmed. The Union Surety & Guaranty Company became and is insolvent. The judgment has not been paid. Tardiff died, and Healey became the executor of his estate. Tardiff left no property. Healey died, and Ladd (defendant herein) became the executor of his estate. Plaintiff in due time presented to Ladd, as such executor, his duly verified claim against the estate of Healey, as set forth in the complaint, and the same was rejected. The contention is that plaintiff is entitled to avail himself of the benefit of the undertaking taken by the surety company for its indemnity.

[1] The right of a creditor in such cases is determined by the rules stated in sections 1559 and 2854 of the Civil Code, which are as follows: "Sec. 1559. A contract, made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it." "Sec. 2854. A creditor is entitled to the benefit of everything which a surety has received from the debtor by way of security for the performance of the obligation, and may, upon the maturity of the obligation, compel the application of such security to its satisfaction." The principle is thus stated in Van Orden v. Durham, 35 Cal. 145: "If a surety has a counterbond, or security from the principal, the creditor will be entitled to the benefit of it, and may, in equity, subject such security to the satisfaction of his debt." To the same effect are Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 136, 41 Pac. 868; Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 440, 37 Pac. 411; Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 622, 10 Sup. Ct. 494, 33 L. Ed. 667; Crowell v. Currier, 27 N. J. Eq. 154; King v. Harman's Heirs, 6 La. 607, 26 Am. Dec. 485; 1 Brandt on Suretyship, § 357; 1 Jones on Mortg. § 755; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1206.

A distinction is made in the decisions between the case where the indemnity bond to the surety consists of an undertaking to pay the original debt, or is "for the performance of the obligation," as section 2854 of the Civil Code expresses it, and the case where it is simply an undertaking to repay to the surety such sum as he may be compelled to pay of the debt by reason of his obligation as surety therefor. In the latter class of cases, it is said there can be no breach of the counterbond until the surety has paid something on the debt, and as it runs to the surety alone, and is solely for his benefit, the creditor is not entitled to sue on it, or to subject it to the payment of his debt, in equity. The following decisions so hold: Osborn v. Noble, 46 Miss. 449; Taylor v. Farmers' Bank, 87 Ky. 398, 9 S. W. 240; Macklin v. Northern Bank, 83 Ky. 314; Hampton v. Phipps, 108 U. S. 260, 2 Sup. Ct. 622, 27 L. Ed. 719; Ohio Life Ins. Co. v. Reeder, 18 Ohio, 46; Leggett v. McClelland, 39 Ohio St. 624; Henderson v. Shillito, 64 Ohio St. 252, 60 N. E. 295, 83 Am. St. Rep. 745; Michigan Bank v. Hastings, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 258, 41 Am. Dec. 549; 1 Brandt, Suretyship, §§ 360, 361.

According to the allegation of the complaint, the undertaking of Healey to the surety company was not simply to indemnify it against loss from such sum as it might be compelled to pay on the judgment, but was a direct undertaking to pay the judgment. The judgment could not be paid, except to some person authorized to receive payment; that is, to the plaintiff alone. Hence it was, in effect, a promise to pay the judgment to the plaintiff, if it was affirmed, and, although made to a third person, it was expressly for plaintiff's benefit and, under section 1559 aforesaid, it may be enforced by him. Also, as it was security "for the performance of the obligation" on which the surety company was bound (the judgment), it comes within the terms of section 2854, and the plaintiff may compel its application to the satisfaction of the judgment.

[2] There does not seem to be any misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties. The alleged obligation of Healey and Tardiff was joint and several in form. Healey alone could be sued separately upon it. Tardiff's personal representative is not a party defendant. It appears from what we have said that the demurrer was improperly sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

JONES et al. v. ALLERT et al. (Sac. 1,828.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 20, 1911.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 55*)—VENDOR'S LIEN—WAIVER—SECURITY.

Plaintiffs agreed to sell mining claims to E. and his assigns; it being understood that he would forthwith organize a corporation to develop the mines. Plaintiffs executed a deed to E. and placed it in escrow. A corporation having been organized, plaintiffs surrendered possession to the corporation, which thereafter continued in possession and made all the payments on the purchase price, except the last. Prior to the accrual of this payment, the corporation's officers induced plaintiffs to make another deed directly to the corporation, and had instructed the escrow holder to deliver the first deed to E., which was done; plaintiffs receiving the note of the individual defendants for the balance of the purchase price under the contract. Held, that the reception of the note was the taking of security, which worked an absolute waiver of plaintiffs' vendor's lien on the property, as prescribed by Civ. Code, § 3046.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 448*)—OBLIGATIONS—PERSONAL LIABILITY.

Where, a contract was made to convey mining claims to E. and his assigns, it was contemplated that he should organize defendant corporation to take over and operate the claims, as he subsequently did, and the corporation entered under a deed from the vendors directly to it, and later secured other deeds from the vendors of amended locations, E. was a mere intermediary, and the corporation, having knowledge of his agreement in taking over the property, assumed his obligations for the price.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; John E. Raker and John L. Childs, Judges.

Action by B. L. Jones and another against H. D. Allert and others. From a decree for plaintiff Annie E. Jones against the Continental Mining Company, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed in part.

L. N. Peter (H. W. Ballantine, of counsel), for appellants. U. S. Webb and J. A. Boyle, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a decree in favor of plaintiff Annie E. Jones, wife of plaintiff B. L. Jones, against one of the defendants the Continental Mining Company, awarding a personal judgment against the corporation for the balance of the purchase price of certain mining claims, and declaring the amount of the judgment to be a vendor's lien upon the property. There is also an appeal from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

[1] The complaint alleged that the plaintiff Annie E. Jones was the owner, and that she and her husband, plaintiff B. L. Jones, were in the possession and operation of certain mining claims and ditch and water locations; that the plaintiffs entered into an agreement in writing with defendant Engle (who made default) to sell and convey this property to Engle or his assigns. It was understood and agreed that Engle would forthwith incorporate a mining company to develop and work the properties. Pursuant to their agreement, the plaintiffs executed a deed to the property, conveying it to defendant Engle, and placed it in escrow, with directions to the escrowee to deliver the deed to Engle or his assigns upon performance of the agreement. Defendant Engle was at that time associated with defendants Allert and McLean and others, and they incorporated and organized the Continental Mining Company in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The plaintiffs then surrendered possession to the defendants, including the defendant Continental Mining Company, who entered, took possession, and have continued in possession of the property ever since. By the terms of the agreement, payments of the money were to be made on account of the purchase price from time to time, and these payments were made. In addition thereto, plaintiffs were to receive and did receive a certain amount of the stock of the defendant corporation. Defendants' agreement was in all respects complied with, saving that they failed to make the last payment of $4,500. Prior to the time when this payment became due, the defendants, officers of the defendant corporation, induced plaintiffs, upon the representation of the convenience to the defendant corporation in promoting sales of its stock and in the management of the property, to make another deed directly to said corporation, and to instruct the escrowee to deliver their first deed to the defendant Engle, all of which was done. Subsequently, at the request of Engle and of the corporation, the plaintiffs made amended locations to the lands, and for a further assurance of the title of the corporation made new deeds to the corporation under these amended locations. After these subsequent acquisitions of title by the corporation, defendants Allert and McLean, who had always been stockholders, officers, and managers of the mining business of the corporation, at the instance of the corporation, "and for and on its behalf, and for and in consideration of the purchase money for said property still unpaid as aforesaid, at the town of Langdon, North Dakota, did make" their promissory note to the plaintiff B. L. Jones for $4,500, the amount of the last payment on the purchase price of the property; "that plaintiffs received said promissory note, and have since and do now hold said promissory note, and the defendants have promised plaintiffs that the said corporation defendant would pay said sum of money to these plaintiffs, but the said sum of money, or any part thereof, has not been paid, and the whole thereof is now long past due and wholly unpaid." It is upon this pleading that the plaintiff sought a personal judgment against the corporation defendant and a vendor's lien upon the property for the amount of the judgment. This was awarded by the court. The answer of the defendant corporation set up that the plaintiffs "received and accepted the note from the defendants Allert and McLean in consideration of and as security for the unpaid portion of the purchase price of said property, and do now hold said promissory note as security for the unpaid portion of the purchase price for said properties, and that said plaintiffs have thereby waived and abandoned any lien they might claim upon said property, or any part thereof, as security for said purchase price thereof." The finding upon this is "that said note was not accepted by said plaintiffs, nor by either of them, as payment of the balance due on the purchase price of said mine, or any part thereof, or at all." This by respondent is construed as a finding that neither of the plaintiffs received the note for any purpose or at all, and that it thus negatives the averment of the defendants' answer. If such be the purport of the finding, then it is in absolute conflict with the testimony of the plaintiff Mrs. Jones, the owner of the property. Interrogated as to the note, she makes answer as follows: "Q. Haven't you kept it now for a little over four years? A. Yes, sir. Q. Haven't you been to town a great many times since the note was received by you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Didn't you and your husband place it in the hand of Judge Goodwin for collection in July, 1904? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you not, you and your husband, authorize Judge Goodwin to take action for the collection of the note, if necessary? A. Yes, sir. Q. You and Mr. Jones have considered all the time since you received that note, considered it belongs to you, and have a right to retain it, do you not? A. Yes, sir."

The finding is also at variance with the allegations of the complaint itself, which are to the effect that the makers of the note gave it to the plaintiffs at the instance of the corporation "for and on its behalf, and for and in consideration of the purchase money of said property still unpaid," and that "plaintiffs received said promissory note, and have since and do now hold said promissory note, and the defendants have promised plaintiffs that the said corporation defendant would pay the said sum of money to these plaintiffs." That the reception of this note under these circumstances was the taking of security, working an absolute waiver of the vendor's lien, there can be no doubt. Section 3046 of the Civil Code so provides, and leaves no room for the consideration of cases arising in the absence of such statutory provision, where the question turns upon the intent of the vendor to waive his lien. Upon the taking of security, the law of this state fixes the intent as an absolute waiver. Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 175; Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 619, 25 Pac. 919; Finnell v. Finnell, 156 Cal. 589, 105 Pac. 740, 134 Am. St. Rep. 143; Royal Consolidated Mining Co. v. Royal Consolidated Mines, 157 Cal. 737, 110 Pac. 123, 137 Am. St. Rep. 165. It follows herefrom that such part of the judgment as decrees a vendor's lien cannot be sustained.

[2] Appellants further urge that there is no evidence justifying a personal judgment against the corporation defendant; their contention in this respect being that they merely took from Engle and did not assume the obligations of his contract. Lisenby v. Newton, 120 Cal. 571, 52 Pac. 813, 65 Am. St. Rep. 203. But, without elaborating upon the facts which justified the court's judgment in this regard, suffice it to say that the agreement and course of conduct of the parties give evidence that Engle was a mere intermediary, and that the real party in interest was the corporation; that the officers of this corporation solicited and obtained from plaintiffs a deed to the property directly to it; that they entered into possession of the property under the deed, and secured later deeds from the plaintiffs of amended locations; that they proposed to the plaintiffs to accept for the last payment the note of the corporation; that they delivered to plaintiffs, on behalf of the corporation, the security note above discussed; that the corporation had knowledge throughout of the Engle agreement; that it did not consider it necessary to secure or record a deed from Engle, but rested upon the title obtained from plaintiffs, and in many ways, through its officers, made recognition of its personal obligation to make the money payments in accordance with the terms of the Engle contract. The findings and the judgment in this respect are therefore sufficiently sustained.

It follows from the foregoing that so much of the judgment as awards a vendor's lien to the plaintiffs must be reversed, and that in all other respects the judgment should be affirmed, and it is ordered accordingly.

2. Commerce (§ 28*)—Telephone Companies—Interstate Business—Rights in Streets.

That a telephone company was engaged in interstate commerce did not give it the right to permanently occupy portions of the public streets of a city to the exclusion of the public without permission to do so from the proper authority.

3. Telegraphs and Telephones (§ 10*)—Rights in Streets—Statutes.

Act March 22, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 777) § 1, provides that every franchise or privilege to erect or lay telegraph or telephone wires, to construct or operate street or suburban railways on any street or highway, or to exercise any privilege hereafter proposed to be granted by any boards of supervisors, boards of trustees, common councils, or other governing or legislative bodies, or any county, city and county, city, or town within the state, except steam railroads and except telegraph or telephone lines doing an interstate business, shall be granted on the conditions provided by the act and not otherwise. Held, that such act did not grant any rights in public highways to a telephone company doing an interstate business; the whole purpose of the act being to prescribe the method and conditions under which franchises included within its terms might be granted by the legislative body authorized by law to make the grant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. Telegraphs and Telephones (§ 10*)—Construction of Lines—Rights in City—Statutes—"Telegraph Corporations."

The words "telegraph corporations," as used in Civ. Code, § 536, prior to its repeal and re-enactment by St. 1905, p. 492, authorizing telegraph corporations to construct lines along or on any public road or highway, etc., could not be construed to include telephone companies, under the rule that grants contained in public statutes must be strictly construed in favor of the public.

5. Statutes (§ 209*)—Construction—Words.

There is no rule that requires the same meaning to be given to the same word used in different places in the same statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 286; Dec. Dig. § 209.*]

6. Telegraphs and Telephones (§ 10*)—Construction—Rights in Streets—"Municipal Affair."

The construction and maintenance of telephone wires along the streets of a city, and the terms and conditions under which they shall be constructed and maintained, is a municipal affair within Const. art. 11, § 6, as amended in 1896, making the provisions of a freeholders' charter, adopted by a city, paramount to general laws enacted by the State Legislature in municipal affairs.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4619; vol. 8, p. 7726.]

7. Municipal Corporations (§ 661*)—Rights in Streets—State Jurisdiction—Surrender.

The state may surrender to any municipality full control of its streets and highways, as regards the appropriation and use thereof for telephone lines.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1432; Dec. Dig. § 661.*]

8. Municipal Corporations (§ 661*)—Streets—Control—City Charter—Constitutional Provisions.

That the provisions of a freeholders' charter, purporting to give to a city full control as to the use of its streets for pipes and conduits for furnishing water, light, etc., were ineffective because of a subsequent direct grant of power with reference to such uses made by Const. art. 11, § 19, did not indicate an intention not to vest such control in the city; such provisions not being limited to authorization to prescribe regulations only within the domain of the police power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1432, 1434–1437; Dec. Dig. § 661.*]

9. Telegraphs and Telephones (§ 10*)—Rights in Streets—Statutes.

Since the rights of a telephone company to maintain and operate a telephone line on the streets of a city is a municipal affair within Const. art. 11, § 6, making the provisions of a freeholders' charter paramount to general statutes in municipal affairs, the rights of a telephone company, using the streets of a city governed by a freeholders' charter, were not extended by Civ. Code, § 536, as re-enacted by St. 1905, p. 492, authorizing telegraph or telephone corporations to construct lines along and on any public road or highway, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

10. Constitutional Law (§ 230*)—Use of Streets—Ordinances—Discrimination.

Pasadena city ordinance No. 841 makes it unlawful to erect or maintain on any of the streets of the city any telephone poles or wires for use in doing local or intrastate business, without a franchise or privilege therefor from the city, and declares that any person, maintaining or operating on the streets any telephone line or poles doing an interstate business, shall pay to the city, semiannually in advance, for the use of the streets the sum of 75 cents for each pole so maintained, unless the person shall have secured a franchise or privilege therefor. Held, that such ordinance was not discriminatory against telephone companies doing an interstate business, they being entitled to use the streets on paying the fee prescribed without a franchise, while local companies were not entitled to use the streets at all without a franchise.

11. Telegraphs and Telephones (§ 30*)—Use of Streets—License—Fee—Reasonableness.

Where a city had power to withhold from telephone companies the right to exclusively occupy portions of the streets for poles and wires, or to permit such occupation on terms satisfactory to it, a telephone company could not be heard to claim that a license fee per pole, required to be paid by companies using the streets, was unreasonable.

In Bank. Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Suit by the Sunset Telephone & Telegraph Company and the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company against the City of Pasadena and others. From an order dissolving a temporary injunction, from a judgment denying an injunction, and from an order denying a new trial, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro (E. S. Pillsbury and Alfred Sutro, of counsel), for appellants. J. P. Wood, City Atty., and Wm. J. Carr, Asst. City Atty. (John W. Shenk, City Atty. for City of Los Angeles, on the brief, by permission of court, and Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Jesse H. Steinhart, Asst. City Atty., for City and County of San Francisco, by permission of court), for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. These are appeals from an order dissolving a temporary injunction, and from a judgment denying an injunction and an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought by plaintiffs against the city of Pasadena and certain officers of said city to obtain a decree restraining the defendants from in any manner interfering with the maintenance or operation of plaintiffs' telephone and telegraph system so far as the same is located on public streets in said city.

There is no conflict in the evidence as to what we consider the material facts in this case. Some of our statements in regard thereto are taken from the opinion of the trial court. The city of Pasadena was organized in the year 1886 under the general laws of the state as a city of the sixth class, and in the year 1901 reorganized under a freeholders' charter, pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution. Prior to its organization as a city in 1886, viz., in the year 1883, the Sunset Telephone-Telegraph Company established a telephone system therein, using the roads and streets thereof for its poles and wires. Plaintiff Sunset Telephone & Telegraph Company was incorporated in April, 1889, and immediately acquired by assignment all of the property of the Sunset Telephone-Telegraph Company, including its lines in Pasadena, and whatever rights it had acquired in that city. The other plaintiff, the Pacific, etc., Company, was incorporated in 1906, and is the lessee of its coplaintiff of its entire telephone and telegraph system. The interests of the two plaintiffs in the matters involved are so close that they may be here treated as one person, and for convenience will be so treated and referred to in the singular number. As originally installed there were a local exchange and long distance connections. "The system has been extended, and has now about 4,000 regular subscribers. Throughout the state of California, and in its various cities and towns, the said plaintiff has installed a similar system for both local and long distance use, serving its subscribers with about 195,000 telephones. It has likewise installed in the states of Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, and Nevada, a system for local and long distance service, having in those states an aggregate of about 135,000 telephones for its subscribers. The entire system in California and the other states is connected, forming a homogeneous whole." It may be assumed for the purposes of this case that plaintiff's lines in Pasadena have always been used in the conduct of an interstate telephone business. Although plaintiff's charter describes it as a telephone and telegraph company, it is clear that it has always been primarily and principally engaged in purely a "telephone" as distinguished from a "telegraph" business, and that, while it has occasionally telegraphed some messages over its main telephone wires, such transmission of messages, to use the language of the finding of the trial court, "is not usual or customary, and the number of them transmitted is insignificant, and too insignificant to characterize the lines of plaintiffs or any of the lines of either of plaintiffs, situated in the city of Pasadena, as telegraph lines." Of course, its lines connecting its offices or exchanges with the houses and places of business of its subscribers, constituting the great bulk of its system in the city of Pasadena, have never been used at all for the transmission of telegraphic messages. The trial court found that, until the year 1901, neither of plaintiffs transmitted any telegraph messages at all, over or by the aid or use of lines situated in the city of Pasadena, and that their lines situated in said city were not used at all for telegraphic purposes, and that the only lines or wires of plaintiff over which any telegraph messages have been or are at any time transmitted are telephone wires, used usually for telephone purposes, placed upon poles running on Fair Oaks avenue south of Colorado street to the south limits of said city. The findings of the trial court in this connection are sufficiently sustained by the evidence. It is manifest from the record that what plaintiff is seeking is to restrain action on the part of the local authorities in regard to a "telephone" as distinguished from a "telegraph" system.

On August 6, 1887, an ordinance was adopted by the board of trustees of the city on the application of the Sunset Telephone-Telegraph Company, being ordinance No. 75, entitled "An ordinance granting to the Sunset Telephone-Telegraph Company the right to erect poles and run telephone wires along the public streets." This ordinance purported to grant to the applicant the privilege for the period of 20 years from its date to erect and maintain telephone poles upon, and to run wires over and along, the public highways and thoroughfares of the city of Pasadena, subject to certain conditions. These conditions reserved to the board of trustees of the city certain supervision and control in the matter of the location, construction, and maintenance of the poles and wires for the purpose of preventing undue interference with the use of the streets by the public. After the expiration of the term prescribed by this ordinance, viz., on February 4, 1908, there was duly enacted an ordinance, known as ordinance No. 841, providing that it shall be unlawful to erect or maintain on any of the streets of the city any telegraph or telephone poles or wires for use in "doing local or intrastate business without a franchise or privilege therefor from the city of Pasadena," and that any person, etc., maintaining or operating upon the streets any telegraph or telephone lines or poles "doing an interstate business," shall pay to the city, semiannually in advance, "for the use of the streets, alleys, and public places by the poles, wires and appliances of such lines," the sum of 75 cents for each and every pole so maintained and operated, unless such person, etc., shall "have or secure a franchise or privilege" therefor. Poles and wires maintained in violation of the provisions of this ordinance are declared thereby to be public nuisances, and it is made the duty of certain officers of the city to summarily abate and remove any poles, wires, or appliances so maintained. Plaintiff having failed to apply for or secure from the city any franchise for the use of the streets for its poles and wires, and having refused to pay any of the charges imposed by the ordinance for the use of the streets for its poles and wires, the city authorities were proceeding with the work of summarily removing such poles and wires from the streets, with the result that this action was commenced to obtain an injunction restraining any such action by the city authorities; the claim of plaintiff being that as to it ordinance 841 is void and without force.

It is to be borne in mind that the only interference with plaintiff threatened by the city authorities is that of preventing the exclusive occupation by it with poles and wires of portions of the public streets of the city except upon compliance with the terms of the ordinance. To warrant such exclusive use of any portion of a public highway by any person or corporation, there must be, as was said by the trial judge, a "grant of right from a competent authority."

[1] It was claimed by plaintiff in the lower court that such a grant was to be found in the provisions of the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal and military purposes"; the plaintiff being a telegraph as well as a telephone company and having accepted the provisions of said act in the year 1897. For all the purposes of this appeal, this claim has been expressly abandoned by plaintiff. It may properly be noted, in passing, that such a claim is without force under the views expressed in the recent case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hopkins, 116 Pac. 557.

[2] Plaintiff relies upon the claim that all its lines in Pasadena are interstate telephone and telegraph lines doing an interstate telephone and telegraph business, as giving it the right to occupy the public streets thereof without permission of the city. We may assume purely for the purposes of this decision that the claim of the plaintiff as to the interstate character of its business in Pasadena is sustained by the evidence, although the trial court found otherwise. It is, of course, not claimed, and could not well be claimed, that the mere fact that one is engaged in interstate commerce gives him the right to permanently occupy, to the exclusion of the public, portions of public highways of a state, either within or without cities, in the absence of permission to do so from proper state authority.

[3] But it is urged that the right has been granted to plaintiff by the state by section 1 of the act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved March 22, 1905, entitled "An act providing for the sale of street railroad and other franchises in counties and municipalities," etc. Stat. 1905, p. 777. That section, so far as material, simply provides that "every franchise or privilege to erect or lay telegraph or telephone wires, to construct or operate street or suburban railroads upon any public street or highway, * * * or to exercise any other privilege whatever hereafter proposed to be granted by boards of supervisors, boards of trustees, or common councils, or other governing or legislative bodies or any county, city and county, city or town within this state, except steam railroads and except telegraph or telephone lines, doing an interstate business, * * * shall be granted upon the conditions in this act provided, and not otherwise." The remaining sections prescribe the method of procedure to be followed and the conditions upon which the franchises specified shall be granted; such conditions including among others one to the effect that the holder must, after the first five years of the life of the franchise, pay to the county or municipality 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts, arising from the use, operation, or possession of the franchise. It appears very clear to us that this act cannot reasonably be construed as granting any right in public highways. Its whole purpose was to prescribe the method and conditions upon which the franchises included within its terms might be granted by the legislative body authorized by law to make the grant, or, as said in McGinnis v. Mayor, etc., 153 Cal. 711, 96 Pac. 367, "to prevent the granting thereof in any other manner than that prescribed," and the only effect of the exception was to exempt the excepted franchises from the operation of the act. So that, assuming that plaintiffs' claim as to the interstate character of its business in Pasadena is correct, that fact alone gives it no right to exclusive possession of portions of the public highways in the city. And it may be said in passing that we cannot see that the question whether this claim be well founded or not is at all material in the determination of this case, unless it be also true that ordinance No. 841 discriminates against those engaged in interstate telephone or telegraph business —a matter to which we shall hereafter refer.

[4] Plaintiffs' claim of right to use the streets of Pasadena for its poles and wires without permission from the city is based principally upon section 536 of the Civil Code, providing ever since its re-enactment in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 492), that "telegraph or telephone corporations may construct lines of telegraph or telephone lines along and upon any public road or highway, along or across any of the waters or lands within this state, and may erect poles, posts, piers, or abutments for supporting the insulators, wires and other necessary fixtures of their lines, in such manner and at such points as not to incommode the public use of the road or highway or interrupt the navigation of the waters." Prior to its re-enactment in 1905 this section did not in express terms include telephone corporations or telephone lines, and it is very earnestly argued by defendants and was held by the learned trial judge that until such re-enactment the section was not applicable to telephone corporations or lines.

Section 536, Civil Code, was a part of the original Civil Code, adopted in 1872, and was never changed or amended in any respect until its repeal and re-enactment in the year 1905. As we have already stated, until the year 1905, it contained no reference in terms to telephone corporations, reading: "Telegraph corporations may construct lines of telegraph along and upon," etc. In the recent case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hopkins, 116 Pac. 557, we considered the effect of this section, so far as telegraph corporations are concerned. It was there concluded that the section is operative to effect a grant to all telegraph corporations so far as acceptance of its provisions by construction and maintenance of its lines in public highways is had, in the absence of later enactment having the effect of repealing the same or suspending its operation as to particular portions of the state, and that in so far as such acceptance is had prior to any such repeal or suspension, and to the extent of the actual occupation by any corporation of public streets constituting such acceptance, a vested right accrues to the corporation, subject only to the lawful exercise of the police power, of which it cannot be deprived at the instance of the state without compensation. This, as his opinion indicates, was the view of the learned judge of the trial court in this case.

This construction makes the section a pure grant by the state of a franchise in its highways, one, as suggested by defendants, "of incalculable value and importance." It is a well-settled principle that grants contained in public statutes or made by public officers or public bodies are to be strictly construed in favor of the public; the rule being clearly stated in Knoxville Water Co. v. Knoxville, 200 U. S. 22, 33, 26 Sup. Ct. 224, 227 (50 L. Ed. 353), as follows: "Only that which is granted in clear and explicit terms passes by a grant of property, franchises, or privileges in which the government has an interest. Statutory grants of that character are to be construed strictly in favor of the public, and whatever is not unequivocally granted is withheld. Nothing passes by implication." This rule of construction of public grants has been incorporated in our Civil Code; section 1069 of the Civil Code providing: "A grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee, except that a reservation in any grant. and every grant by a public officer or body, as such, to a private party, is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor." The italics are, of course, ours. See opinion of Chief Justice Beatty in Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 174, 175, 50 Pac. 277, and Clark v. City of Los Angeles (decided May 31, 1911) 116 Pac. 722. It is urged by learned counsel that this rule has no application to the question in dispute here, going only to the question of the extent of a valid grant and in no way to the identity of the grantee, and the language, "but this rule presupposes the existence of an effective grant, and relates only to the extent of its operation," used by this court in Cullen v. Sprigg, 83 Cal. 56, 23 Pac. 222, is quoted in support of this claim. This was said in disposing of a claim that section 1069, Civil Code, was applicable in determining the question whether a grant to a private party was void for uncertainty, and was immediately followed by the statement: "In all cases, it must be presumed that a grantor intended to make a valid grant of some property unless the contrary appears." Assuming, in favor of plaintiff, that the rules goes only to the question of the extent of a valid grant, it appears to us that such a question is necessarily presented here. The thing granted, as described in the statute, was the right to "construct lines of telegraph along and upon any public road or highway," etc., and in such places to "erect poles," etc., "for supporting the insulators, wires, and other necessary fixtures of their lines," i. e., the lines of a telegraph system. Whether or not this description included the poles and wires of a telephone system is a question very materially affecting the extent of the grant made by the state and the consequent burden imposed on public streets and highways. We can see no good reason why the rule of strict construction in favor of the public is not applicable to this section, which is purely a grant by the state of valuable rights.

In view of this rule, we are satisfied that the decision in Davis v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 127 Cal. 312, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698, cannot be taken as definitely settling the meaning of the word "telegraph," as the same is used in section 536 of the Civil Code. The question there was whether the words "any line of telegraph," as used in section 591, Penal Code, as it existed prior to the year 1905, included a telephone line. The section made it a misdemeanor for any one to maliciously take down, remove, injure, or obstruct "any line of telegraph," or to sever any wire thereof. After showing that in numerous cases in other jurisdictions the courts had held that "telephone" is included within the meaning of "telegraph," the court said that, "if the consideration could be limited to a strict etymological point of view, it would have to be conceded at once that there is a difference in the meaning of the two words; the one conveying the idea of transmission of writing to a distance, the other the transmission of sound to a distance." But it was declared that in their "present sense and acceptation" the term "telegraph" means "any apparatus for transmitting messages by means of electric currents and signals, and embraces within its meaning the narrower word 'telephone.'" It was held that in contemplation of section 4 of the Penal Code, which provides that the rule of the common law that penal statutes are to be strictly construed has no application to the Code, and that "all its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms with a view to effect its object and to promote justice," and in recognition of the fact that a substantial identity exists between the two words, no hesitation need be expressed in declaring that under section 591 of the Penal Code a criminal prosecution will lie for the illegal destruction of a telephone wire.

When we consider the rules applicable in the construction of public grants, it seems at once apparent, in view of the fact that the telephone was absolutely unknown at the time of the enactment of section 536, Civil Code, that the decision in Davis v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., supra, is not controlling here.

[5] There is no rule of law that necessarily requires the same meaning to be given to the same word used in different places in the same statute. It is plain that section 4480 of the Political Code, as was said by Judge Gilbert in his dissenting opinion in Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pomona, 172 Fed. 840, 97 C. C. A. 262, "does not purport to say that a word used in the statutes shall have the same meaning wherever used." And while, for certain purposes, the provisions of the four Codes must be construed as though they had all been passed at the same moment of time, and were parts of the same statute (section 4480, Pol. Code), it is manifest that, dealing as they do with all the subjects of our statutory law, the prima facie presumption that a word used more than once in the same statute is always used in the same sense, if it be conceded to apply at all, is necessarily of the slightest weight when considering sections in different Codes relating to essentially different matters and subject to different rules of construction. The case of Bruner v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. 239, 28 Pac. 341, cannot be taken as holding otherwise, for, as was said by Judge Gilbert in the Pomona Case, supra, "the word 'telegraph' has not been defined in either of the Codes, as was the word 'elisor,'" the word there under consideration, which was clearly defined in section 4192, Political Code. The difference between the telegraph and telephone in respect to matters affecting the question at bar is very pronounced. The telephone being a device by which the human voice is directly transmitted, all that is essential to the sending of a message thereby is the speaking of the same into a comparatively simple appliance connected with the wire along which the current is to go. Trained and skilled operators are necessary only at the central offices for the purpose of answering calls and making the necessary connections of wires. Skilled experts, only, can operate the telegraph, manipulate its instruments, and understand its signals. See Telegraph Co. v. Nashville, 118 Tenn. 19, 101 S. W. 770. This difference is accountable for the greatest conceivable difference in the extent of the burden on public streets and highways by the use of a telegraph company and a telephone company respectively of such streets and highways for the poles and wires of the system, especially in villages, towns, and cities. A telegraph line does no purely local business, but simply runs through a town or city, having therein one or more offices where messages are received and transmitted by trained operators. The result is that its use of public streets for the purposes of its poles and wires is limited to its main through line, and such branches as are essential to connect with its various offices, which are necessarily very few in number. While the telephone is also used for long distance communication, its most common use is for communication among the people of a particular city or town. Any person being able to use the same in his home, office, or place of business, through a simple and inexpensive instrument placed therein and connected by wire with a central agency, the subscribers therefor in a city or town constitute a large proportion of the inhabitants, numbering in a city like Pasadena several thousand. The result is well expressed by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in Telegraph Co. v. Nashville, supra, as follows: "A telephone system, however, to be effective, requires, not only rights of way to enter and leave the city, but also to occupy all its streets and alleys, and to enter its business houses, residences, and other places, thus making it necessary to use many poles and wires and other fixtures, in order to do the business expected of it. It must therefore, necessarily, make use of the streets and alleys generally of the city, and incumber them with a network of wires and poles and fixtures, to a much greater extent than a telegraph system would do." The italics are ours.

As we have said, the telephone was unknown at the time of the enactment of section 536 of the Civil Code in the year 1872. While the possibility of transmitting speech along wires had previously been suggested by scientists, no one had ever succeeded in devising a practical instrument therefor until Bell made his discovery in the year 1875. To show that the idea of such transmission of the human voice was up to that time but a dream of scientists, reference need only be made to the Telephone Cases, 126 U. S. 1, 8 Sup. Ct. 778, 31 L. Ed. 863. Under these circumstances, our Legislature granted the right to construct lines of telegraph, with the necessary poles, etc., along and upon the public highways of the state. We have seen that this court has expressly recognized that, from a strict etymological point of view, telephone lines would not be included in the words "lines of telegraph," or telephone corporations, within the words "telegraph corporations." We have seen further that the circumstances at that time were such that in its common acceptation the word "telegraph" must have meant only the kind of communication then known and in practical use under that name, entirely excluding all idea of any such thing as the direct transmission of the human voice, and that by the simple method of speaking into an instrument of such slight cost that it could be placed in every dwelling house and place of business, with the necessary result that the use of practically all of the streets would be required. It is to be remembered that the question in determining the meaning of the word "telegraph" contained in this statutory grant is: What was in the minds of the legislators as to its meaning when they used it? No rule of construction applicable to public grants warrants the inclusion therein of privileges not embraced within the common acceptation of the language used. Practically the same question as is here involved was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States in Richmond v. Southern Bell Tel. & Tel. Co., 174 U. S. 761, 19 Sup. Ct. 778, 43 L. Ed. 1162. It was there claimed that the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, granting to any "telegraph company" accepting the provisions of the act the right to construct, maintain and operate "lines of telegraph" over and along military and post roads, etc., applied to telephone companies. After reviewing the decisions that had been rendered by other courts up to that time (1889), the court held that the act was not applicable to such companies. Among other things, the court said: "It may be that the public policy intended to be promoted by the act of Congress of 1866 would suggest the granting to telephone companies of the rights and privileges accorded to telegraph companies. And it may be that, if the telephone had been known and in use when that act was passed, Congress would have embraced in its provisions companies employing instruments for electrically transmitting articulate speech. But the question is, not what Congress might have done in 1866, nor what it may or ought now to do, but what was in its mind when enacting the statute in question. Nothing was then distinctly known of any device by which articulate speech could be electrically transmitted or received between different points, more or less distant from each other, nor of companies organized for transmitting messages in that mode. Bell's invention was not made public until 1876. Of the different modes now employed to electrically transmit messages between distant points, Congress in 1866 knew only of the invention then and now popularly called the 'telegraph.' When therefore the act of 1866 speaks of telegraph companies, it could have meant only such companies as employed the means then used or embraced by existing inventions for the purpose of transmitting messages merely by sounds of instruments and by signs or writings." The court further said that the conclusion that the act conferred upon telephone companies the valuable rights and privileges therein specified is not authorized by any explicit language used by Congress. While it is true, as said by learned counsel for plaintiff, that this court is the ultimate tribunal in the matter of the construction of a statute of this state, we are satisfied that the court in that case correctly construed the act of Congress, and that what is said in the opinion is equally applicable to our section 536 of the Civil Code. A similar question was presented to the Supreme Court of Tennessee in Telegraph Co. v. Nashville, supra, a state statute very much like ours being there involved, and a similar conclusion reached. Any other construction would, it appears to us, make this statutory grant include rights and impose burdens on the public that were never within the contemplation of the Legislature, and this case is a striking illustration of the wisdom of the rule that requires a grant by the public to be strictly construed in favor of the grantor.

We have examined the many cases cited by plaintiff, wherein it is held that the word "telegraph" in a statute includes "telephone." Comparatively few of these cases involve any question of the right of a telephone company to use public streets and highways under a statutory grant to telegraph companies being generally, as our own Davis Case, cases in which the meaning of the word as used in some other statute was involved. For instance, the question whether a telephone company could incorporate under a statute authorizing the incorporation of telegraph companies, the question whether such a company had the right of eminent domain under a statute giving telegraph companies such right, the question whether telephone companies were under the burdens and obligations imposed on telegraph companies, the question whether a statute providing for the assessment of telegraph companies applied to telephone companies, were questions presented in many of the cases. But there are some cases cited in which statutes giving telegraph companies rights and privileges in public highways were held to include telephone companies. In none of these cases, however, does the question of the effect of the rule requiring grants by the public to be strictly construed in favor of the grantor appear to have been discussed. In so far as these decisions may appear, upon a close examination of the condition of the statutory law upon which they are based, to be opposed to the conclusion we have reached, we are of the opinion that they should not be followed in this state.

We are thus brought to the conclusion that, prior to its repeal and re-enactment in the year 1905, section 536 of the Civil Code was not applicable to telephone companies.

[6] In the year 1901 the city of Pasadena became organized under a freeholders' charter, adopted under the provisions of section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution of the state, and has ever since continued as a city under such charter. Stats. 1901, p. 884 et seq. In the year 1896, section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution was so amended as to make the provisions of a freeholders' charter so adopted paramount to general laws enacted by the state Legislature "in municipal affairs." The charter above referred to purports to confer upon the city of Pasadena full control of its streets, with power to determine whether and upon what terms portions thereof may be exclusively used and occupied by telegraph or telephone companies. By subdivision 13 of section 3 of article 1, the city is declared to have the power to lay out, open, extend, widen, change, vacate, and improve streets. By subdivision 7 of section 10 of article 8, the city council is declared to have not only the power to require the placing underground of all telephone, telegraph, and other wires, but also the power to "prohibit the placing of poles and the suspending of wires along or across any of the streets, alleys and public places of the city." By subdivision 31 of the same section the city council is declared to have the power "to grant the right to erect or lay telegraph or telephone wires, to construct and operate street railroads, to lay gas or water pipes, to erect poles and wires, or lay conduits for transmitting electric energy for lighting or power purposes along or upon the public streets and highways of the city; provided, however, that all such rights and franchises shall be granted subject to all the restrictions and limitations in this charter contained relating to the granting of franchises." The italics are ours. By section 3 of article 13, as amended in February, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 1022), the terms for which any franchise may be granted was limited to 20 years, and the city council was authorized to impose such lawful conditions, restrictions, and limitations as may best subserve the public interest and welfare. We are satisfied that these provisions can reasonably be read in no other way than as evidencing an intention to give to the city of Pasadena full control of its streets and highways, with the power to determine for itself whether any portion thereof shall be exclusively used and occupied by the poles and wires of telegraph, telephone or power companies.

[7] It cannot be disputed in the light of the decisions that the state may surrender to any municipality full control of its streets and highways in regard to such matters, and, of course, an appropriate place for an enactment of this character on the part of the state is, under our constitutional provisions, the freeholders' charter provided for by section 8, art. 11. See Platt v. City and County of San Francisco, 158 Cal. 74, 82, et seq., 110 Pac. 304.

[8] That the provisions of the charter purporting to give such full control as to the use of streets for pipes and conduits for the furnishing of water and light are not effective, in view of the direct grant for those purposes made by section 19 of article 11 of the Constitution (see In re Johnston, 137 Cal. 115, 69 Pac. 973), is not a sufficient warrant for holding that it was not intended to vest such control in the city. We think it impossible to reasonably construe these provisions as purporting to authorize on the part of the city only such regulations as come within the domain of the police power.

Are the matters referred to "municipal affairs" within the meaning of those words as they are used in section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution? There has been much discussion in our decisions as to what matters are embraced in this term, and it has been said that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to give a general definition clearly defining the term "municipal affairs" and its scope. But we can see very little reason in the argument that the question whether and to what extent the streets of a municipality shall be subjected to such secondary uses as the maintenance therein of telegraph and telephone poles and wires, the primary purpose for which highways are established being the convenience of public travel, and such secondary uses permanently excluding the public from using for such purpose the portions occupied for such uses, is not a municipal affair. If the provisions of not only the many freeholders' charters of this state, but also those of the general municipal corporation act and other statutes, are to be given any effect in the consideration of this question, they demonstrate the existence of practically a universal idea that such matters are principally of local concern, and should be within the exclusive control of the municipality. Even in the case of the ordinary commercial railroad, we find legislative recognition of the fact that the question whether such a railroad should be allowed to occupy for its tracks any street, alley, or highway within a municipality is one of such concern to the municipality that its consent should be a prerequisite; it being provided in section 470 of the Civil Code, as enacted in 1872, that "no railroad corporation must use any street, alley, or highway * * * within any incorporated city or town, unless the right to so use the same is granted by a two-thirds vote of the town or city authority from which the right must emanate." As said by learned counsel for defendants, "the Legislature has consistently recognized and treated the control of municipal streets by municipalities as a local or municipal affair as distinguished from a state affair." It is unquestioned that the matter of opening, widening, and vacating the streets of a municipality is purely a municipal affair. See Byrne v. Drain, 127 Cal. 663, 667, 60 Pac. 433. It would seem to be equally true that the question to what extent and upon what terms the primary use of these streets, which are constructed and maintained by the people of the city for use in common by the public for purposes of travel, shall be subjected to secondary uses completely excluding any use at all by the traveling public of the portions devoted to such secondary uses, is also a municipal affair, within the meaning of our constitutional provision. It is simply a question of the extent to which streets constructed and maintained by the city primarily for purposes of travel by the public shall be diverted to other uses excluding such primary use as to the portions so diverted, an absolute taking away from the city and its inhabitants of so much of the streets as is exclusively used for poles and wires.

In holding that a statute of the state of Washington made the consent of the city council of a municipality prerequisite to such use of the streets for telegraph and telephone lines, the Supreme Court of that state said: "In addition to the reasons suggested heretofore for imposing the powers and duties upon municipalities to control the streets, it is pertinent to refer to the long usage in this country for vesting such authority in municipalities. Such usage is historical, and is expressed in many statutes in the different states and in the mother country. The people of a municipality, who incur and pay the expenses for the construction and maintenance of their streets, and who largely use them, are usually most capable of exercising discretion in the secondary and subordinate purposes for which their streets shall be used." State ex rel. Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. City of Spokane, 24 Wash. 53, 63 Pac. 1116. In the face of the long usage in such matters, by virtue of which this power has so frequently been regarded as one appropriate for a municipality to possess, it would be difficult to find warrant for the conclusion that, although such power is in terms conferred by a charter, it is nevertheless not a municipal affair within the meaning of our Constitution. That any citizen in the state may be interested in the maintenance and operation of a telephone system in the city of Pasadena, to the extent that he may desire "the quick and ready communication afforded by the telephone" with some resident thereof, is doubtless true; but we do not see that this affects the question whether the extent to which portions of the streets of Pasadena may be exclusively occupied by telegraph and telephone companies is a municipal affair. It may, however, be suggested that no persons can be more interested in having the quickest and most efficient method of communication available between Pasadena and the rest of the state than the people of Pasadena themselves, and it is not likely that any municipality will insist upon such arbitrary and unreasonable conditions in the matter of the use of its streets, as will result in cutting it off from such method of communication.

[9] The matters referred to being "municipal affairs" within the meaning of our constitutional provision, the charter provisions vesting control in the city of Pasadena are not subject to general laws, and the re-enactment of section 536 of the Civil Code in 1905, by which certain rights in public highways were granted to telephone companies, conferred no right upon plaintiff so far as the streets of Pasadena are concerned.

It follows that plaintiff has no effectual "grant of right from a competent authority" for the use of the streets of the city of Pasadena for its poles and wires.

[10] The ordinance is not open to the objection that it discriminates against lines doing an interstate business, in that it imposes a semiannual charge of 75 cents for each pole of a line used in interstate business, and imposes no such charge for the poles of lines used in local or intrastate business. The discrimination, if any, is one entirely in favor of the interstate line. As to lines doing a local or intrastate business the requirement of the ordinance is absolute that such use of the streets cannot be had without a franchise therefor from the city of Pasadena. As to lines doing an interstate business, it is recognized that a franchise may also be obtained from the city, and it is expressly provided that, if such person or corporation have or secure such franchise, it shall not be required to pay the amounts required by the ordinance during the life of the franchise. The requirement as to such lines is simply that either a franchise must be obtained for the use of the streets, as required for intrastate and local lines, or the charge imposed by the ordinance must be paid. In other words, no franchise need be procured for such use for interstate lines, but the streets may be used for such lines without any grant by the city, provided the required charge be paid. At the same time, the owners of an interstate line, if they elect, may obtain such a franchise therefor just as and presumably on as favorable terms as the owners of intrastate and local lines may obtain their franchise, and thus exempt themselves from the payment of any such charge as is imposed by the ordinance. It is obvious, therefore, that there is no discrimination against interstate lines.

There is no question in this case of any actual discrimination against interstate companies in the enforcement of the ordinance, and the ordinance, so far as any attempt at discrimination is concerned, is fair on its face. It is of course needless to say that such a discrimination would not be allowable.

[11] We are satisfied, in view of what has been said as to the power of the municipality in such matters, that no question is here involved as to the reasonableness of the amount of the semiannual charge made by the ordinance. The city of Pasadena having the power to withhold from telephone companies the right to exclusively occupy portions of its streets for poles and wires, or to permit such occupation on such terms as are satisfactory to it, we have, as suggested by the trial judge, no question whether or not the amount charged is a reasonable charge. As said by him, "If it be competent for the city to exclude the poles and wires of a telephone company from its streets (and for reasons here given it must be so held), then, clearly, it is competent for the city to name such terms and require the payment of such compensation as seems proper."

Our conclusions upon the matters we have discussed require an affirmance of the action of the trial court.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

HULBERT v. CALIFORNIA PORTLAND CEMENT CO.

GILBERT v. SAME. (L. A. 3,003.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 20, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 458*)—INJUNCTION—STAY PENDING APPEAL.

Where adjoining landowners instituted suit against a cement company to restrain the operation of its works so as to throw clouds of cement dust over complainant's lands, to the irreparable injury thereof, and the trial court granted an injunction restraining defendants from operating its plant so as to produce an excess of a certain number of barrels of cement per annum, defendant on appeal from such judgment was not entitled to a stay of the injunction pending the appeal as an exercise of appellate jurisdiction, since such stay could only be granted at the risk of destroying rights belonging to complainants if the judgment should be sustained.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Suits by Lillie A. Hulbert, as administratrix of the estate of A. Hulbert, deceased, and by Spencer E. Gilbert against the California Portland Cement Company. The decree was rendered for complainant in each case, from which defendant appealed, and applied to the Supreme Court for a stay of the operation of injunction pending appeal. Denied.

Wesley H. Beach and Waters & Goodcell, for plaintiffs. Shankland & Chandler, for defendant.

MELVIN, J. Petitioner has made an original application to this court to suspend the operation of a certain injunction until the decision of the appeals in two cases, in each of which the California Portland Cement Company, a corporation, is the defendant, on the ground that the property of the corporation would be so greatly damaged by the operation of the injunction pending the appeals that a judgment in defendant's favor would be almost fruitless; while it is contended the damage to plaintiffs is easily susceptible of satisfaction by a payment of money. Petitioner offers to furnish any bond this court may require, if the order which is prayed for shall be granted. As this was the first case in America, so far as this court knew, in which the operation of a cement plant had been enjoined because of the dust produced in the processes of manufacture, and as the showing which was made indicated that petitioner's loss would be very great if the injunction were enforced at once, an order was entered, temporarily staying its operation until both sides to the controversy could be heard. The court was moved somewhat to such action also because the trial court had made an order staying the operation of the injunction for 60 days, so that this court might have the opportunity of passing upon this application. Two principal questions are presented: (1) Has the Supreme Court the authority in aid of its appellate jurisdiction, under section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, to suspend the operation of an injunction pending appeal? (2) If it have such power, is this a proper case for the exercise thereof? Owing to the conclusion which we have reached, it is unnecessary to answer the first question authoritatively, because, assuming a reply to it in the affirmative, we cannot say that the facts of this case warrant any other response to the second inquiry than a negative one.

The salient facts shown by the petitioner are that the California Portland Cement Company is engaged in the manufacture of cement on property situated nearly two miles from the center of the city of Colton, in the county of San Bernardino, but not within the limits of said city; that said manufactory is located at Slover mountain, where the substances necessary to the production of Portland cement are quarried; that long before the surrounding country had been generally devoted to the production of citrus fruits Slover mountain had been known as a place where limestone was produced; that quarries of marble and limestone had been established there; that lime kilns had been operated upon said mountain for many years; that in 1891 the petitioner obtained title to said premises, and commenced thereon the manufacture of Portland cement; that the said corporation has expended upon said property more than $800,000; that at the time when petitioner began the erection of the cement plant the land surrounding the plant was vacant and unimproved, except some land lying to the north, which had been planted to young citrus trees; that these trees were first planted about a year before the erection of the cement plant was commenced (but long after the lime kilns and the marble quarries had been operated); that subsequently other orange groves have been planted in the neighborhood; that the petitioner's plant on Slover mountain has a capacity of 3,000 barrels of cement per day; but that by the judgment of the superior court in two certain actions against petitioner, entitled Lillie A. Hulbert, Administratrix, etc., v. California Portland Cement Company, a Corporation, and Spencer E. Gilbert, plaintiff, v. Same Defendant, the corporation aforesaid was enjoined from operating its plant in such manner as to produce an excess of 88,706 barrels of finished cement per annum; that the regular pay roll of the company includes the names of about 500 men, who are paid about $35,000 a month; that the fixed, constant monthly expenses for supplies and materials amount to $35,000; that the California Portland Cement Company employs the best, most modern methods in its processes of manufacture, but that nevertheless there is an unavoidable escape into the air of certain dust and smoke; that petitioner has no other location for the conduct of its business at a profit; that the land of the Hulbert estate is located from 1,500 to 2,500 feet from petitioner's cement works, and that Spencer E. Gilbert's land is all within 1,000 feet therefrom; that petitioner has diligently sought some means of preventing the escape of dust from its factories; that it has consulted the best experts and sought the best information obtainable, and that it is now and has been for a long time conducting experiments along the lines suggested by the most eminent engineering authorities upon this subject, and that, as soon as any process can be evolved for preventing the escape of the dust, the petitioner will adopt such process in its works, and it is believed that a process now constructing with all diligence by petitioner will effectually prevent the escape of dust. Petitioner also alleges that it is easily possible to estimate the damages of the plaintiffs in money, while it is utterly impracticable to estimate the damage in money which will be caused to the petitioner by the closing of the plant, and that stopping the plant pending the appeals will cause financial ruin to the chief stockholders of the petitioner, and that the elements of loss averred are irreparable on account of the disorganization of petitioner's working force, loss of market, and deterioration of machinery.

The learned judge of the superior court, in deciding the cases in which petitioner here was defendant, described the method of manufacturing cement and the injury to the trees. He said, in part: "The output from these two mills at the present time is about 2,500 barrels of cement every 24 hours, and to produce this there is fed into the various kilns of the defendant, during the time mentioned, about 1,500,000 pounds of raw mix, composed of limestone and clay, ground as fine as flour and thoroughly mixed. This raw mix is fed into the tops of kilns, wherein the temperature varies from 1,800 to 3,000 degrees Fahrenheit, and through which kilns the heated air and combustion gases pass at the rate of many thousands of feet per minute. The result of this almost inconceivable draft is to carry out, in addition to the usual products of combustion, particles of the raw mix, to the extent of probably 20 tons per day or more, the greater part of which, without question, is carried up into the air by the rising gases, and thereafter, through the action of the winds and force of gravity, distributed over the surrounding territory." Speaking of the premises of the plaintiffs, he said that, because of prevailing westerly winds and on account of the proximity of the mills, said lands were almost continually subject to the deposit of dust. In this regard he said: "It is the fact incontrovertibly established by both the testimony of witnesses and personal inspections made by the court that a well-nigh continuous shower of cement dust, emanating from defendant's cement mills and caused by their operation, is, and for some years past has been, falling upon the properties of the plaintiffs, covering and coating the ground, filtering through their homes, into all parts thereof, forming an opaque semi-cemented incrustation upon the upper sides of all exposed flowers and foliage, particularly leaves of citrus trees, and leaving ineradicable, yet withal plainly discernable, marks and evidence of dust, dusty deposits, and grayish colorings resulting therefrom, upon the citrus fruits. The incrustations above mentioned, unlike the deposits occasionally occurring on leaves because of the presence of undue amounts of road dust or field dust, are not dissipated by the strongest winds, nor washed off through the action of the most protracted rains. Their presence, from repeated observations, seems to be as continuous as their hold upon the leaves seems tenacious." The court further found that the deposit of dust on the fruit decreased its value; that the constant presence of dust on the limbs and leaves of the trees rendered the cultivation of the ground and the harvesting of the crop more costly than it would have been under ordinary conditions; and that said dust added to the usual and ordinary discomforts of life by its presence in the homes of the plaintiffs. The court also found that the operation of the old mill of the defendant corporation had occurred with the acquiescence of the plaintiffs, and that the defendant had acquired a prescriptive right to manufacture the maximum quantity of cement produced annually by that factory.

In view of such facts solemnly found by the court after trial, we cannot say that there is reason for a suspension by this court of the injunction, even conceding that we have power under proper circumstances thus to prevent a disturbance of existing conditions, pending an appeal. We are not insensible to the fact that petitioner's business is a very important enterprise; that its location is peculiarly adapted for the manufacture of cement; and that great loss may result to the corporation by the enforcement of the injunction. Even if the officers of the corporation are willing to furnish a bond in a sum equal to the value of the properties of Gilbert and of the Hulbert estate here involved, we cannot, under plain principles of equity, compel these plaintiffs to have recourse to their action at law only, and take from them the benefit of the injunctive relief accorded them by the chancellor below. To permit the cement company to continue its operations, even to the extent of destroying the property of the two plaintiffs and requiring payment of the full value thereof, would be, in effect, allowing the seizure of private property for a use other than a public one—something unheard of and totally unauthorized in the law. Hennessy v. Carmony, 50 N. J. Eq. 616, 25 Atl. 374; Sullivan v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., 208 Pa. 540, 57 Atl. 1065, 66 L. R. A. 712. Nor may we say, as petitioner urges us to declare, that cement dust is not a nuisance, and therefore that the restraint imposed is illegal, even though this is one of the first cases, if not the very first, of its kind, in which the emission of cement dust from a factory has been enjoined, for we are bound by the findings of the court in this proceeding, and may not consider their sufficiency or lack of it until we take up the appeals on their merits. The court has found that the plaintiffs in the actions tried were specially damaged by a nuisance maintained by the cement company. This entitles the plaintiffs, not only to damages, but to such relief as the facts warrant, and the chancellor has determined that limiting the production in the manner selected is a proper form of protection to their rights. It is well settled in California that a nuisance which consists in pouring soot or the like upon the property of a neighbor in such manner as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of the premises is a private nuisance, which may be enjoined or abated, and for which, likewise, the persons specially injured may recover pecuniary damages. Code Civ. Proc. § 731; Fisher v. Zumwalt, 128 Cal. 493, 61 Pac. 82; Melvin v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 7 Cal. App. 328, 94 Pac. 390; Judson v. Los Angeles Sub. Gas Co., 157 Cal. 172, 106 Pac. 583, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183. The last-named case was one in which the operation of a gas factory had been enjoined, and the following language was used: "A gas factory does not constitute a nuisance per se. The manufacture in or near a great city of gas for illuminating and heating is not only legitimate, but is very necessary to the comfort of the people. But in this, as in any other sort of lawful business, the person conducting it is subject to the rule, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas," even when operating under municipal permission, or under public obligation to furnish a commodity. Terre Haute Gas Co. v. Teel, 20 Ind. 131; Attorney General v. Gaslight & Coke Co., L. R. 7 Chan. Div. 217; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248 [13 Pac. 655]. Nor will the adoption of the most approved appliances and methods of production justify the continuance of that which, in spite of them, remains a nuisance. Evans v. Fertilizing Co., 160 Pa. 223 [28 Atl. 702]; Susquehanna Fer. Co. v. Malone, 73 Md. 276 [20 Atl. 900, 9 L. R. A. 737, 25 Am. St. Rep. 595]; Susquehanna Fer. Co. v. Spangler, 86 Md. 562 [39 Atl. 270, 63 Am. St. Rep. 533]."

Petitioner contends for the rule that the resulting injuries must be balanced by the court, and that, where the hardship inflicted upon one party by the granting of an injunction would be very much greater than that which would be suffered by the other party if the nuisance were permitted to continue, injunctive relief should be denied. This doctrine of "the balance of hardship" and the associated rule that "an injunction is not of right but of grace" are the bases of petitioner's argument, and many authorities in support of them have been called to our attention. In petitioner's behalf are cited such cases as Richards' Appeal, 57 Pa. 105, 98 Am. Dec. 202, where an injunction which had been sought to restrain defendant from using large quantities of bituminous coal to plaintiff's damage was refused, and the plaintiff was remitted to his action at law; the court saying, among other things: "Whatever of injury may have or shall result to his (the plaintiff's) property from the defendant's works, by reason of a nuisance complained of, is only such as is incident to a lawful business conducted in the ordinary way, and by no unusual means. Still, there may be injury to the plaintiff, but this of itself may not entitle him to the remedy he seeks. It may not, if ever so clearly established, be a cause in which equity ought to enjoin the defendant in the use of a material necessary to the successful production of an article of such prime necessity as good iron, especially if it be very certain that a greater injury would ensue by enjoining than would result by refusal to enjoin." The same rule was announced in Dilworth's Appeal, 91 Pa. 248, a case involving the building of a powder house near plaintiff, and in Huckenstine's Appeal, 70 Pa. 102, 10 Am. Rep. 669. Petitioner admits that in the later case of Sullivan v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., supra, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania reached a different conclusion, but contends that the opinion in that case merely defines the word "grace" as used in Huckenstine's Appeal; the real meaning of the expression "an injunction is a matter of grace" being that a high degree of discretion is exercised by a chancellor in awarding or denying an injunction. An examination of the case, however, shows that the court went very much further than a mere definition of the phrase "of grace." In that case the defendant had erected a large factory for the manufacture of steel on land purchased from one of the plaintiffs, but after many years defendant had commenced the use of "Mesaba" ore, which caused the emission of great quantities of fine dust upon the property of plaintiffs. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in reversing the decree of the lower court, dismissing the bill, went into the matter of "balancing injuries" and "injunctions of grace" very thoroughly, and we may with propriety, I think, quote and adopt some of its language upon these subjects as follows:

"It is urged that, as an injunction is a matter of grace, and not of right, and more injury would result in awarding than refusing it, it ought not to go out in this case. A chancellor does act as of grace, but that grace sometimes becomes a matter of right to the suitor in its court, and, when it is clear that the law cannot give protection and relief—to which the complainant in equity is admittedly entitled—the chancellor can no more withhold his grace than the law can deny protection and relief, if able to give them. This is too often overlooked when it is said that in equity a decree is of grace, and not of right, as a judgment at law. In Walters v. McElroy et al. [151 Pa. 549] 25 Atl. 125, the defendants gave as one of the reasons why the plaintiff's bill should be dismissed that his land was worth but little, while they were engaged in a great mining industry, which would be paralyzed if they should be enjoined from a continuance of the acts complained of; and the principle was invoked that, as a decree in equity is of grace, a chancellor will never enjoin an act where, by so doing, greater injury will result than from a refusal to enjoin. To this we said: 'The phrase "of grace," predicated of a decree in equity, had its origin in an age when kings dispensed their royal favors by the hands of their chancellors; but, although it continues to be repeated occasionally, it has no rightful place in the jurisprudence of a free commonwealth, and ought to be relegated to the age in which it was appropriate. It has been somewhere said that equity has its laws, as law has its equity. This is but another form of saying that equitable remedies are administered in accordance with rules as certain as human wisdom can devise, leaving their application only in doubtful cases to the discretion, not the unmerited favor or grace, of the chancellor. Certainly no chancellor in any English-speaking country will at this day admit that he dispenses favors or refuses rightful demands, or deny that, when a suitor has brought his cause clearly within the rules of equity jurisprudence the relief he asks is demandable ex debito justitiæ, and needs not to be implored ex gratia. And as to the principle invoked, that a chancellor will refuse to enjoin when greater injury will result from granting than from refusing an injunction, it is enough to observe that it has no application where the act complained of is in itself, as well as in its incidents, tortious. In such case it cannot be said that injury would result from an injunction, for no man can complain that he is injured by being prevented from doing to the hurt of another that which he has no right to do. Nor can it make the slightest difference that the plaintiff's property is of insignificant value to him, as compared with the advantages that would accrue to the defendants from its occupation.' There can be no balancing of conveniences when such balancing involves the preservation of an established right, though possessed by a peasant only to a cottage as his home, and which will be extinguished if relief is not granted against one who would destroy it in artificially using his own land. Though it is said a chancellor will consider whether he would not do a greater injury by enjoining than would result from refusal, and leaving the party to his redress at the hands of a court and jury, and if, in conscience, the former should appear, he will refuse to enjoin (Richards' Appeal, supra), that 'it often becomes a grave question whether so great an injury would not be done to the community by enjoining the business that the complaining party should be left to his remedy at law' (Dilworth's Appeal, supra), and similar expressions are to be found in other cases, 'none of them, nor all of them, can be authority for the proposition that equity, a case for its cognizance being otherwise made out, will refuse to protect a man in the possession and enjoyment of his property, because that right is less valuable to him than the power to destroy it may be to his neighbor or to the public' (Evans v. Reading Chem. Fer. Co., 160 Pa. 209 [28 Atl. 702]). The right of a man to use and enjoy his property is as supreme as his neighbor's, and no artificial use of it by either can be permitted to destroy that of the other."

Petitioner lays great stress upon North Fork Water Co. v. Medland (C. C.) 187 Fed. 169, in which, in the opinion by Judge Ross, formerly a member of this court, the following appears: "Now, in the first place, it is to be remembered that no one is entitled to an injunction as a matter of absolute right. When a contract is broken and any party thereto sustains an injury by reason of such breach, the injured party has an absolute right to maintain an action at law for the recovery of such damages as can be shown to have been sustained by him. But a suit in equity, either to enjoin the continuance of such a breach or to enforce the specific performance of the contract, appeals to the sound discretion of the chancellor—to his conscience—and the relief so sought will be granted or withheld according to the real equity of the case, in view of all its facts and circumstances." Petitioner also cites Mountain Copper Co. v. U. S., 142 Fed. 625, 73 C. C. A. 621, in which the opinion was also by Judge Ross. In that case the court refused to enjoin the operation of defendant's smelter, relying largely upon the early cases from Pennsylvania, which declare the "balance of hardship" doctrine, and that an injunction is ex gratia, and not ex debito justitiæ, and citing other cases, including the well-known Madison v. Ducktown Sulphur, Copper & Iron Co., 113 Tenn. 331, 83 S. W. 658. While we have the utmost respect for the learned author of these opinions and for the decisions of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, we cannot agree with the principles announced in the two cases decided by that court, cited above. In connection with the case of Mountain Copper Co. v. U. S., supra, it is interesting to note that in his dissenting opinion therein Judge Hawley quotes from Fisher v. Zumwalt, supra, and two other California cases (Daubenspeck v. Grear, 18 Cal. 443, 447, and Natoma Water & Min. Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 544, 551), and after an analysis of them concludes with this brief but excellent statement of the rule which he deduced from them: "The pith, point, and substance of this whole matter is that, where the acts of a party, whether individuals or corporations, wealthy or poor, destroy the substance of complainant's estate, whether it be of great or of but little value, an injunction should be issued. This is the underlying principle, the essence, and effect of all the decisions upon the subject which distinguish this character of cases from those where the injury is slight and trivial, and the damage not irreparable, and not absolutely destructive of complainant's estate."

The Mountain Copper Company Case has also been criticized by the Supreme Court of Arizona, as well as the later case of McCarthy v. Bunker Hill & Sullivan Mining & Con. Co., 164 Fed. 927, 92 C. C. A. 259. In Arizona Copper Co. v. Gillespie, 12 Ariz. 203, 100 Pac. 470, this language was used: "Counsel press upon us the proposition that we should consider the comparative damage that will be done by granting or withholding an injunction in this case, alleging that the effect of an injunction will be to stop the operation of extensive works, deprive thousands of persons of employment, and cause loss and distress to other thousands. It is undoubtedly true that a court should exercise great care and caution in acting where such results would follow. It should very clearly appear that the acts of the defendant are wrongful, and that the complainant is suffering substantial and irreparable injury, for which he cannot secure adequate compensation at law. A number of eminent courts support the contention of appellant that the comparative injury to the parties in granting or withholding relief must also be considered. Among the cases so holding is the case of McCarthy v. Bunker Hill & Sullivan Min. & Con. Co., 164 Fed. 927 [92 C. C. A. 259], decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals for this circuit, a court for which we entertain the highest respect (which exercises an appellate jurisdiction over this court in certain cases); and, if this case were reviewable there, we should not feel at liberty to express views in conflict with those of that court. But this case is reviewable only by the Supreme Court of the United States, and we cannot find, as suggested by the Circuit Court of Appeals, that that court has given adherence to the doctrine. It seems to us that to withold relief where irreparable injury is, and will continue to be, suffered by persons whose financial interests are small in comparison to those who wrong them is inconsistent with the spirit of our jurisprudence. It is in effect saying to the wrongdoer, 'If your financial interests are large enough so that to stop you will cause great loss, you are at liberty to invade the rights of your smaller and less fortunate neighbors.' We prefer the doctrine adhered to by Judge Hawley, in his dissenting opinion in Mt. Copper Co. v. U. S., 142 Fed. 625 [73 C. C. A. 621], and by Judge Sawyer in Woodruff v. North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co. [C. C.] 18 Fed. 753. In the latter case it is said: 'Of course, great interests should not be overthrown on trifling or frivolous grounds, as where the maxim, "De minimis non curat lex," is applicable; but every substantial, material right of person or property is entitled to protection against all the world. It is by protecting the most humble in his small estate against the encroachments of large capital and large interests that the poor man is ultimately enabled to become a capitalist himself. If the smaller interest must yield to the larger, all small property rights, and all small and less important enterprises, industries, and pursuits would sooner or later be absorbed by the large, more powerful few; and their development to a condition of great value and importance, both to the individual and the public, would be arrested in its incipiency.' To the same effect are the remarks of Judge Marshall, in McCleery v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. [C. C.] 140 Fed. 951."

Petitioner cites, among others, the following cases, which, although tending for the most part to support the rule for which he contends, are not, we think, in accord with the best modern ideas upon this subject and with the current of Californian authorities: McBryde v. Sayre, 86 Ala. 458, 5 South. 791, 3 L. R. A. 861; Chambers v. Iron Co., 67 Ala. 358; Clifton Iron Co. v. Dye, 87 Ala. 468, 6 South. 192; Riedeman v. Mt. Morris Elec. Co., 56 App. Div. 23, 67 N. Y. Supp. 391; Barnard v. Sherley, 135 Ind. 547, 34 N. E. 600, 35 N. E. 117, 24 L. R. A. 568, 41 Am. St. Rep. 454; Gilbert v. Showerman, 23 Mich. 449; Lloyd v. Catlin Coal Co., 210 Ill. 460, 71 N. E. 335; Amelia Mill Co. v. Tenn. Coal & Iron Co. (C. C.) 123 Fed. 811; Edwards v. Allouez Min. Co., 38 Mich. 46, 31 Am. Rep. 301; Atchison v. Peterson, 20 Wall. 507, 22 L. Ed. 414; and Stewart Wire Co. v. Lehigh C. & N. Co., 203 Pa. 474, 53 Atl. 352. The last-named case was really decided upon the doctrine of laches, and not that of "balance of detriment." Many of the cases to which our attention is called by petitioner are not strictly in point. For example, in New York City v. Pine, 185 U. S. 93, 22 Sup. Ct. 592, 46 L. Ed. 820, the Supreme Court of the United States recognized the principle that, where the defendant in an injunction suit has "the ultimate right"—that is to say, where it is entitled to continue with its work by eminent domain proceedings—a permanent injunction will be denied, but a temporary injunction may be granted to compel the defendant to make compensation.

In Georgia v. Tenn. Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 27 Sup. Ct. 618, 51 L. Ed. 1038, there is a dictum to the effect that if the plaintiff were a private individual the court might consider the balance of hardship, but from this Harlan, J., dissented. One of the most instructive cases upon this subject is American Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Godfrey, 158 Fed. 225, 89 C. C. A. 139. In that case Judge Riner says: "The fact, urged by counsel, that these smelters are located at a place where, by reason of its relation to the railroads and mines, it is most convenient for smelting purposes does not, in our judgment, constitute any defense to a bill to abate a nuisance; neither can a court take into consideration the fact that the business is conducted in a proper and reasonable manner, employing the latest and best devices and instrumentalities, where the evidence shows, as in this case, that when so operated and conducted it still results in very great damage to, if not the total destruction of, complainant's property and is a menace to health. 'The rights of habitation are superior to the rights of trade, and whenever they conflict the rights of trade must yield to the primary or natural right.' 1 Wood on Nuisances, §§ 514–517, and 523. It is also insisted that the injury to the appellants and to the public, if an injunction issues, so greatly exceeds the injury to the appellees, if denied, that an injunction should not have been granted. We think it may well be doubted whether this statement is supported by the record. The parties to this suit, upon both sides, have important and very valuable interests affected by the decree, and it would indeed be difficult to say upon the facts disclosed by the record which side would suffer the greater injury. However that may be, we do not think the fact that an actual injury resulting from the violation of a right is small, and the interest to be affected by an injunction is large, should weigh against the interposition of preventative power in equity, when it is clear that, on one hand, a right is violated and, on the other, a wrong is committed." He then discusses the leading cases. This, and the appended opinion of Marshall, District Judge, rendered in the Circuit Court, are very illuminating.

Our attention has been directed to certain Californian cases which, according to petitioner's belief, support the rule with reference to the "balancing of injury." These are Peterson v. City of Santa Rosa, 119 Cal. 387, 51 Pac. 557, and Williams v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 150 Cal. 593, 89 Pac. 330. In the latter case the court was considering the refusal by the superior court of an injunction pendente lite. While it contains some language perhaps susceptible of the meaning for which petitioner contends, the court was really considering the principle announced in Hicks v. Michael, 15 Cal. 116, that an injunction should not be issued before a hearing on the merits, except in cases of urgent necessity. In Peterson v. Santa Rosa, supra, the following language is found: "In Attorney General v. Council of Birmingham, 4 Kay & J. 528, the court indicated that in such cases only the right of plaintiff to relief, rather than the question of inconvenience to defendants, was to be considered, although the latter represented a large population. We regard the foregoing as an extreme statement, and deem it more proper to adopt the language of Swayne, J., in Parker v. Winnipiseogee, etc., Co., 2 Black, 545 [17 L. Ed. 333]: 'After the right has been established at law, a court of chancery will not, as of course, interpose by injunction. It will consider all the circumstances, the consequences of such action, and the real equity of the case.' In Curtis v. Winslow, 38 Vt. 690, it was said: 'In determining the right of a party to an injunction after a verdict in his favor by a court of law, the court will consider the relative loss to either party, the character of the property for which protection is sought, the character of the locality in which the nuisance exists, and whether the injury is properly compensable in damages.' If the injury is only occasional, and the damages small, accidental, rather than a probable and necessary consequence, an injunction will be denied. Wood v. Sutaliff, 8 Eng. L. & Eq. 217. In short, each case must be governed by the circumstances that surround it and by relative equities. Wood on Nuisances, § 550." Nevertheless the department sustained the judgment granting an injunction, by which defendant, a large city, was restrained from polluting the waters of Santa Rosa creek, although plaintiff's damages were found by the jury to amount merely to one dollar. The case is really in exact accord with the views which we have expressed above, for this language is used with reference to plaintiff: "Her right as a riparian owner was, not only to have the water of the stream flow over her land in its usual volume, but to have it flow in its natural purity, and such pollution of the stream by the defendant as substantially impaired its value for the ordinary purposes of life, and render it measurably unfit for domestic purposes, is an actionable nuisance, and the fact that the defendant is a municipal corporation does not enhance its rights or palliate its wrongs in this respect. Wood on Nuisances, § 427; High on Injunc. (3d Ed.) § 810." We are convinced that upon reason and upon great weight of authority we should deny petitioner's prayer, considering the subject upon the assumption that we have power under the Constitution, in aid of our appellate jurisdiction in a proper case, to suspend the operation of a prohibitory injunction pending an appeal.

Let the temporary order staying the operation of the injunction be dismissed, and the petition be denied.

I concur: LORIGAN, J.

HENSHAW, J., deems himself disqualified to participate herein, and therefore declines to act.

SLOSS, J. I concur in the order. It seems to me, however, that the discussion concerning the right of a court of equity to refuse an injunction where the injury resulting to the plaintiff from a denial of the relief would be far less than that sustained by the defendant, if the injunction were granted, is applicable to a consideration of appeals on their merits, rather than to the question here involved. If the court may balance the extent of the losses to be suffered by the respective parties, it exercises its discretion in this behalf when it grants or refuses the injunction. In this case the lower court has determined that it was essential, or at least proper, for the protection of the plaintiffs' rights that the defendant should be restrained. We are not now reviewing the correctness of that determination. The petitioner cannot, of course, ask us in this proceeding to stay the force of the injunction, on the ground that the trial court abused its discretion, or that it erred otherwise in granting the injunction. What is claimed is that a suspension of the judgment "is necessary or proper to the complete exercise" of our appellate jurisdiction (Const. art. 6, § 4); it is claimed that a refusal to stay the injunction will so affect the subject of the controversy that, if the judgment should ultimately be reversed, the appellant will in large measure be deprived of the fruits of its successful appeal.

But we must consider the rights of the respondents, as well as those of the plaintiffs. If the judgment of the court below is right, the plaintiffs are absolutely entitled to have the wrongful acts stopped, not only after the determination of the appeal, but pending the appeal. Under the findings, the acts complained of are inflicting a continuing injury upon the plaintiffs and their lands, an injury of a kind which has always been regarded by courts of chancery as irremediable, and not capable of adequate redress by damages. If the appellant may ask that it shall not lose the fruits of an appeal which may turn out to be meritorious, the respondents are in at least as good a position to demand that the appellate court shall not irrevocably take away from them the benefit which they have already won, and which will be confirmed to them if the judgment should be sustained. The exercise of the appellate jurisdiction must contemplate the possibility of affirmances, as well as reversals. I do not think a stay of execution can be said to be necessary or proper to the complete exercise of appellate jurisdiction when such stay can be granted only at the risk of destroying rights which will unquestionably belong to the respondent, if the judgment of the lower court shall be confirmed. This will always be the situation in the case of an appeal from a judgment enjoining acts which are found to be destructive of the plaintiff's real property. I think, therefore, that in such cases, at any rate, this court should not undertake to suspend the force of a prohibitory injunction pending appeal. Swift v. Shepard, 64 Cal. 423, 1 Pac. 493. The statutory law gives no stay, and there should be none, unless the trial court, which is in the best position to weigh the respective equities, concludes to exercise its power (Pasadena v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 781, 109 Pac. 620) to suspend the injunction until the merits are finally determined.

It may be suggested, further, that the effect of an order by this court, suspending the operation of a prohibitory injunction, is to reverse, pro tanto, the judgment granting the injunction, and that in advance of a hearing on the merits. That this is so will appear more clearly if we suppose the case of an appeal from an order of the superior court, granting an injunction pendente lite. In such case, an application for a suspension of the injunction pending the appeal could be urged upon precisely the same grounds as those here presented by petitioner. The thing decided by the trial court, in the case supposed, was that the defendant should be restrained until a trial on the merits, or until that court should order otherwise. That conclusion is reviewable on appeal; but to suspend the order before a hearing of the appeal would clearly be to set aside the very thing decided below, viz., that the defendant should be enjoined until a trial or a further order. The situation does not differ where the injunction is embraced in a final judgment. There, too, it is a part of the adjudication that the defendant should be enjoined at once, and this adjudication should not be set aside on appeal before a hearing on the merits of the appeal.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. DELUCCHI. (Cr. 156.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 14, 1911. On Petition for Rehearing, Oct. 14, 1911.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 829*)—Trial—Requests to Charge—Instruction Given.

Where the court charged that defendant's plea of not guilty put in issue every material allegation, and placed the burden on and made it the duty of the prosecution, before a conviction could be had, to establish to the jury's satisfaction, to a moral certainty beyond and to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, by legal and creditable evidence, each and every material fact essential to a conviction, such instruction covered a request to charge that, by accused's plea of not guilty, "he has said that he is not guilty of the crime with which he is charged, or of any crime included therein."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

2. Criminal Law (§ 770*)—Trial—Requests to Charge—Commonplace.

A request to charge that defendant's plea of not guilty amounted in effect to a statement by accused that he was not guilty of the crime with which he was charged, or of any crime included therein, was properly refused, as a mere commonplace proposition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 770.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 829*)—Trial—Requests to Charge—Instructions Given.

An instruction that defendant should be accorded the benefit of the presumption of innocence until the contrary was proved beyond a reasonable doubt, that such presumption accompanied defendant all through the case, and did not cease on the submission of the cause to the jury, but operated during their deliberations and until verdict, and that the jury must examine the evidence by the light of the presumption, and, unless they found it sufficiently strong to overcome the presumption, to remove it, and to satisfy them of defendant's guilt beyond and to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt he should be acquitted, sufficiently covered a request to charge that the presumption of innocence is not a mere form to be disregarded at the jury's pleasure, but is a substantial part of the law binding on the jury in the case, and that defendant is not required to prove his innocence, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

4. Criminal Law (§ 829*)—Trial—Requests to Charge—Instructions Given—Information.

An instruction that the information was a mere accusation by the district attorney, and was not to be considered as evidence, nor was the jury to infer therefrom or presume defendant's guilt, covered a request to charge that the fact that defendant had been arrested, charged with an offense, and that an information had been filed against him, created no presumption of his guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 785*) — Impeachment — Effect—Instructions.

An instruction that, if any witness had willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, "it was the jury's duty" to distrust his entire evidence, was objectionable, since, though the jury may reject the entire evidence of such a witness, it is not necessarily their duty to do so.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1173*)—APPEAL—PREJUDICE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Defendant was not prejudiced by the court's refusal to charge that, if a witness had willfully sworn falsely, the jury were at liberty to disregard his entire testimony, not shown by other evidence to be, or which the jury did not believe to be, true, where the court improperly, but to defendant's benefit, charged that, if a witness had willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, "it was the jury's duty" to distrust his entire testimony.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—REQUESTS TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

The court properly refused a request to charge, defining a deadly weapon, where such term was correctly defined in the main charge as one which, from the manner in which it is used, is likely to produce death or great bodily injury, and the jury were informed that whether the weapon alleged and proved to have been used in the case in question was a deadly weapon, was a question of fact for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—REQUESTS TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

It is not error to refuse requests for instructions, the subject of which is fully covered by instructions given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1173*)—APPEAL—REFUSAL OF REQUESTS—PREJUDICE.

On the cessation of an original difficulty between prosecutor and defendant, the latter went to a hotel, while prosecutor crossed the street, and remained with others until defendant shortly after returned from the hotel, holding a revolver behind him. Prosecutor was warned, whereupon a struggle took place, resulting in prosecutor finally wresting the revolver from defendant, who testified that he had the revolver only to protect himself from the crowd, from which he had heard threats while in the hotel. Prosecutor, however, testified that defendant leveled the revolver at him, and attempted to fire it. Held, that defendant was not prejudiced by the refusal of a request to charge on exhibiting a deadly weapon in a rude, angry, and threatening manner, in violation of Pen. Code, § 417, though the instruction might have been given in a proper exercise of discretion.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*)—EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Defendant in a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill was asked on cross-examination to define the attitude of all the people present toward him, and answered that a majority of the men he did not know. "I never do anything to anybody. I know many people in Amador. They are always against me, and the time I got a little trouble at Amador I was boss in there. Lot of people there they were against, how to go buy that job. I no buy that job. I no ask for that job. I no say whether those people Amador City were business men or not business men." Held that, though the question was objectionable as calling for a conclusion, the answer was not only not responsive, but unintelligible, and defendant was therefore not harmed by the court allowing it to stand.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; F. V. Wood, Judge.

John Delucchi was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Frick, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

HART, J. By information the district attorney of Amador county charged the defendant with the crime of an assault with a deadly weapon with the intent to commit murder. The jury found the defendant guilty of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, and the court thereupon imposed upon him a fine in the sum of $600, "and, in default of the payment of said fine, that he be imprisoned in the county jail of Amador county, Cal., one day for each $2 of said fine until said fine is satisfied." This appeal is from the judgment and the order refusing the defendant a new trial.

The points urged against the judgment and order are that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions requested by the defendant and in its rulings permitting certain questions to be asked defendant on his cross-examination.

The evidence, briefly epitomized, developed the following facts: The defendant and the prosecuting witness, one Manuel Lopez, prior to the day on which occurred the difficulty bringing about this prosecution, had worked together at the Little Amador mine, situated near Amador City, in the county of Amador, the first named being a "shift boss" and the last named an ordinary laborer; that on the 29th day of August, 1910, the two men met in the street in Amador City, near the Amador Hotel, and engaged in an altercation which finally led to blows being exchanged; that, immediately thereafter, the defendant, accompanied by one J. M. Coffman, a barkeeper in the hotel, who had been attracted to the scene of the trouble by the noise made by the men, went into the hotel, where Coffman gave the defendant a 45-caliber Colt's revolver, at the same time saying to the defendant, "Take this and protect yourself if they come in and jump you—maul their brains out." After the difficulty Lopez started across the street, where a large number of persons had gathered, having been attracted to the street by the trouble between the former and the defendant. Shortly after going into the hotel, the defendant returned to the street with the revolver in his hand, which he held behind him as he approached the spot where Lopez was standing. Some one in the crowd, in a loud voice, warned Lopez that defendant had a revolver, and the former turned and faced the defendant, whereupon, according to Lopez, the defendant presented the revolver, saying to Lopez, "Come here, you s—n of a b—h, I will give you that $10. I will fight you now." Lopez at once grappled with the defendant, and undertook to and did at last succeed in wrenching the weapon from the latter's grasp. Lopez testified that, while the struggle for the revolver was in progress, the defendant attempted to fire the weapon, having several times pulled the trigger which failed to strike the cartridge because he (Lopez) kept his fingers between the cartridge and the hammer. There is also testimony showing that when the weapon was taken from the defendant the latter inserted his teeth into Lopez' chin, holding the latter thus for some seconds. There is some conflict in the testimony, but it is not contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, or that this court would be justified in substituting its judgment as to the effect and weight of the evidence for that of the jury. We have found no prejudicial error in the court's refusal to allow certain instructions proposed by the defendant.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] The first complaint of appellant, as to the matter of the instructions, is that the court seriously erred in not reading to the jury an instruction which would have declared, in express terms, that, by the plea of not guilty entered by the defendant to the information, "he has said that he is not guilty of the crime with which he is charged, or of any crime included therein." The reason assigned by the court for its refusal to give said instruction was that the proposition it contained was covered by its charge to the jury, and we think the court was right. The instruction, given by the court, which declared that the defendant's plea of not guilty "puts in issue every material allegation of the information and places the burden upon, and makes it the duty of the prosecution, before a conviction can be had, to establish to your satisfaction, to a moral certainty beyond and to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, by legal and creditable evidence, each and every material fact essential to a conviction," in effect fully and clearly covered the proposition enunciated in the rejected instruction. We cannot perceive how a statement that a plea of not guilty tenders an issue upon the question of the defendant's guilt, and that the prosecution has the burden of proving his guilt by the proper degree of proof, can by any possibility be construed by intelligent men to mean anything less than that the defendant has denied his guilt of any offense alleged against him, or, as the refused instruction puts it, that he has thus "said that he is not guilty of the crime with which he is charged, or of any crime included therein." The given instruction, it will be noted, declares that the prosecution is compelled to produce the required proof "before a conviction can be had," which language clearly implies a conviction of any crime embraced within the allegations of the information.

[2] Moreover, to tell the jury that the plea of not guilty by the defendant is tantamount to a declaration by him that "he is not guilty of the crime with which he is charged, or of any crime included therein," would only involve the statement of a commonplace proposition. Obviously no other possible view could be taken of such a plea. The court made it very clear in its charge that the responsibility of proving the defendant's guilt of any offense comprehended within the averments of the information rested on the people, and this part of the charge itself was sufficient to impress upon the jury, if indeed, it was necessary to do so, the very obvious proposition that the defendant's plea of not guilty constituted no mere perfunctory act, but involved a serious, earnest protest of his innocence of the crime directly charged or of any other crime included therein.

[3] It is next insisted that the instructions submitted to the court by the defendant, and rejected, upon the doctrine of the presumption of innocence, should have been allowed, and that the refusal to give them constituted prejudicial error. The court told the jury that the defendant was to be accorded the benefit of the presumption of innocence until the contrary was proved beyond a reasonable doubt; that such presumption "goes with the defendant all through the case, and does not cease upon the submission of the cause to the jury, but operates in favor of the defendant not only during the taking of testimony, but during the deliberation of the jury, until they have arrived at a verdict"; that the jury "must examine the evidence by the light of this presumption," and that "unless, upon examining the evidence, you find it sufficiently strong to overcome the presumption of innocence, to remove it and to satisfy you of defendant's guilt beyond and to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt, he is entitled to an acquittal at your hands." The instructions proposed by the defendant upon said presumption, and which the court declined to give because "covered by the charge," merely state the doctrine in a slightly differen form from that in which it is explained in the court's charge. For instance, they would have said to the jury that "the presumption of innocence is not a mere form to be disregarded by you at your pleasure, but it is an essential, substantial part of the law of the land, binding upon you in this case;" that "the defendant is not required to prove his innocence," etc. We are unable to see how the court could have made it appear any more clearly than it did in its charge that the presumption of innocence is not a mere form, which the jury were at liberty to disregard, or that the defendant was not required to prove his innocence. It plainly told the jury, as we have seen, that the defendant was entitled to the benefit of this presumption through all the stages of the trial and up to the very moment, while deliberating upon their verdict, that they became convinced that the evidence was sufficient to overcome it beyond and to the exclusion of any reasonable doubt. If the language as thus used is not sufficiently clear to demonstrate to any person of common intelligence that the presumption of innocence is not "a mere form to be disregarded by the jury at pleasure," and that the defendant in a criminal case is not compelled to prove his innocence, and that the doctrine is "an essential, substantial part of the law," then it must be confessed that it has no meaning at all. The very statement that the presumption must stand until dissipated by evidence establishing the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt is itself, if to ordinary language its ordinary meaning is to be ascribed, a plain and unambiguous declaration that the doctrine is a substantial one which may not be arbitrarily disregarded by the jury.

[4] The court's action in refusing to read to the jury instruction No. 10, proposed by defendant, is also criticised. The part of the instruction which the defendant insists that the court erred in omitting from its charge reads: "The fact that the defendant has been arrested and charged with an offense, and that an information has been filed against him, creates no presumption of his guilt." The court properly disallowed this instruction for the reason, as assigned by it, that the principle embodied therein was given in its charge. The rule proposed to be stated to the jury by said instruction was sufficiently covered in a general way by the court's instructions on the doctrine of the presumption of innocence and particularly by the following instruction which the court gave to the jury: "The information in this case is a mere accusation by the district attorney against the defendant, and is not to be considered by the jury as evidence, nor are you in the slightest degree to infer or presume the guilt of the defendant therefrom." It is manifest that there is absolutely no difference, except as to form of language, between the foregoing and the rejected instruction. It is clear that if the jury, from the instructions declaring the defendant to be entitled to the presumption of innocence and explaining the only means by which that presumption may be overcome, were not made to clearly understand that they were not justified in encouraging the slightest inference militating against the accused from the mere information itself or the mere filing thereof, the instruction just quoted would most surely leave no doubt in the minds of the triers as to their duty in that regard.

[5] There was no error in the refusal to give defendant's instruction No. 14. The principle set out in said instruction, though in perhaps less amplified form, was stated to the jury much more broadly than we think the law justifies. As given, the instruction reads: "If any witness examined before you has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire evidence." The rejected instruction states the rule more nearly in the language of the statute than does the given instruction; that is, it declares that, where the witness has willfully testified falsely as to any material matter, "such witness is to be distrusted in other portions of his testimony," and to this language is added: "And you are at liberty to disregard from your consideration all of the testimony of such witness, which has not been shown by other evidence to be, or which you do not believe to be, true." It will be observed that the court's instruction declared it to be the duty of the jury to distrust the entire testimony of a witness who has been found to have sworn falsely as to any material part thereof. We do not conceive this to be an accurate statement of the rule. We do not understand it to be binding upon the jury to distrust all of a witness' testimony because he may have sworn falsely in a material part thereof. The rule, as it is laid down by the Code, merely offers a test by which the testimony of a witness who has willfully not been truthful in all material parts thereof may be weighed. We see no inconsistency in believing a portion of the testimony of a witness who, in certain parts thereof, has deliberately testified falsely, and in disbelieving the part or parts that are false, and we do not believe it to be intended by the law that the court should tell the jury, in effect, that, because of the willful falsity of a material part of a witness' testimony, it is their unqualified duty to distrust his entire evidence.

[6] But we may assume that counsel for defendant had a special reason, arising in the trial of the case, for asking the court to state to the jury the principle contained in the court's instruction upon that subject, and, so viewing it, it can only be said that, even if the rule as thus given to the jury may not be said to be a strictly correct statement of the law, it was manifestly stated to the jury more favorably to the defendant than the one proposed by him and disallowed by the court; for, as will be readily noticed, his instruction would have told the jury that they were at liberty to disregard such witness' entire testimony—that is, they could believe or disbelieve those parts not found to be willfully false, according to whether, in their opinion, it was worthy or unworthy of belief—whereas, the court's instruction declares that it is the duty of the jury to distrust his entire evidence—language that can mean nothing less than that it was the duty of the jury to arbitrarily disregard the entire testimony of any witness who has willfully sworn falsely in any material part thereof.

[7] The court refused defendant's instruction No. 31, defining a deadly weapon. It was properly refused, the court having covered the same matter in its charge. The instruction relating to this subject, as submitted to the jury, reads, in part, "A deadly weapon is one which, from the manner in which it is used, is likely to produce death or great bodily injury," following which definition is a statement that whether the weapon alleged and proved to have been used in the case at bar was or was not a deadly weapon was a question of fact, to be determined by the jury from all the evidence, considered in connection with the definition of a deadly weapon as thus given.

[8] Instructions 32 and 33, proposed by defendant, and setting forth the law of justifiable homicide. were properly refused, as the court, in its charge, fully, clearly, and correctly explained to the jury the several occasions, under the law, on which homicide is justifiable. To have given the instructions as offered by the defendant upon the law of self-defense would have been only to unnecessarily repeat to the jury the law on that subject. Refusal to allow defendant's proposed instruction 37, relating to threats which certain testimony disclosed that the complaining witness had made against the defendant, and explaining the circumstances on which the latter would be justified in using a deadly weapon in his rencounter with said witness, was not erroneous, the court having in its charge fully and with sufficient clearness explained to the jury the law in that respect.

It is further objected that the court erred, to the serious injury of the defendant, by declining to read to the jury certain other instructions proposed by the accused. These instructions are numbered 43, 45, 46, 50, 51, and 53, and they merely in effect declare that, unless the jury are convinced by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant of some one of the three offenses of which he could be convicted, under the allegations of the information, if the evidence justified it, it would be their duty to return a verdict of acquittal. We shall not examine these instructions here in detail. It will be enough to say as to these that an examination of the court's charge will disclose that the jury were thus clearly instructed on all the propositions of law stated in the rejected instructions. Indeed, while expressing the opinion that the evidence would not justify a verdict of guilty of assault with the intent to commit murder, the court nevertheless explicitly and with marked clearness defined the elements of that offense as well as those constituting, respectively, the crimes of assault with a deadly weapon and simple assault, and, in short, with the exception of failing to state concretely the rule laid down in defendant's rejected instruction 55, which we shall presently consider, announced to the jury, in very plain and simple language, and correctly, all the principles of law necessary to a fair and just consideration by the jury of any question of fact which might pertinently arise under the information.

[9] As to said instruction 55, while we are of the opinion that the court should have allowed it, we think that the refusal to read it to the jury was without prejudice to the defendant in view of the given instructions and some of the important facts which stand in the record without contradiction. After briefly recapitulating the circumstances of the trouble between Lopez and the defendant from the time of the occurrence of the original difficulty up to and including the circumstance of the return of the defendant to the street, carrying a revolver and holding the weapon behind his back as he approached Lopez, who was standing in the street with a number of other persons, said instruction proceeds: "And that, upon reaching the edge of the porch in front of said hotel, said defendant drew said revolver and exhibited it to said Lopez, and to one or more other persons, in a rude, and angry and threatening manner, but entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether he attempted to shoot said Lopez, and also entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether he attempted to strike said Lopez in such manner as would have been likely to inflict upon said Lopez great bodily injury, you must find the defendant not guilty of assault with intent to commit murder, and you must also find him not guilty of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon." The claim of the defense is, and there is testimony in the record tending to support it, that Lopez and certain other persons, who were among the crowd that had gathered at the scene of the trouble and remained in the street until defendant's return thereto, had threatened to inflict upon the latter bodily injury, and that defendant, upon his return to the street, assaulted no one, but simply exhibited the weapon in the manner described by section 417 of the Penal Code for no other purpose than to frighten his enemies who were in the crowd. Said section reads: "Every person who, not in necessary self-defense, in the presence of two or more persons, draws or exhibits a deadly weapon in a rude, angry and threatening manner, or who in any manner unlawfully uses the same, in any fight or quarrel, is guilty of a misdemeanor." The obvious purpose of the rejected instruction was to submit to the jury's consideration the question whether the defendant, if committing any crime at all, was guilty only of the crime defined by said section 417 of the Penal Code.

The court, as already noted, correctly and with clearness instructed the jury that "an assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury upon the person of another," and further instructed the jury that if they were not satisfied, from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was guilty either of an assault with the intent to commit murder, or of an assault with a deadly weapon or of simple assault, as those crimes were defined in the charge, then it would be their duty to acquit the defendant. Thus it will be observed that the court made it clearly to appear to the jury that, if the evidence failed to disclose an assault of any kind or character upon Lopez by the defendant, it would be their duty to acquit the latter; and it would certainly be an unwarranted reproach upon the intelligence of the jury to hold that, if the evidence showed that the defendant made no assault, but merely exhibited the weapon in the presence of the crowd that had collected on the street, in a "rude, angry and threatening manner," they would not have promptly returned, as, under such circumstances it would have been their duty to have done, a verdict of acquittal.

But we do not think that it is at all probable, in view of certain facts brought out at the trial, that, had the rejected instruction been given to the jury, it would have had the effect of causing them to have reached and returned any different verdict from the one found and recorded. The undisputed evidence, as seen, shows that the original trouble was between the defendant and Lopez; that, upon the cessation of said difficulty, defendant went into the hotel, and that Lopez started across the street, and there remained with others until the defendant, a short time after going into the hotel, returned, holding a revolver in his hand; that the defendant approached the spot where Lopez was standing and held, presumably for the purpose of concealing it from view, the revolver behind him; that Lopez was warned by some one on the street that the defendant held a weapon in his hand, and that thereupon a struggle between the two men took place, resulting, finally, in Lopez wresting the revolver from the defendant. The defendant testified that he left the hotel for the purpose of going to the mine at which he was employed and carried the pistol for the purpose of protecting himself against Lopez and others of the crowd by whom he heard threats made against him while he was in the hotel. But, from the undisputed fact that the original difficulty was between the defendant and Lopez, the former, according to his version, getting a little the worst of the affray, and from the admitted manner in which the defendant was carrying the revolver, the jury were clearly warranted in finding that the defendant procured the revolver, and returned to the street with the purpose of resuming hostilities with Lopez, and not with an intention of keeping Lopez and other enemies mingling in the crowd (if any others were there than Lopez) from attacking him. It is, of course, to be assumed that the jury, as manifestly they had a right to do, believed Lopez when he declared that the defendant leveled the revolver at him and at the same time attempted to fire it, and we cannot say that the instruction would have operated to change that belief.

Our conclusion upon this point is, as before stated, that, while the court might just as well have allowed the instruction, its refusal to do so could not have so prejudiced the defendant as to have denied to him a fair and impartial trial.

[10] The only objection specified here against the rulings of the court on the question of the admissibility of testimony arose on the cross-examination of the defendant. The district attorney first asked the defendant how many people were in the crowd at the time the alleged assault took place, and he replied: "Oh 25 or 30; might be less and might be more." The prosecuting officer then asked these questions, to each of which counsel for defendant objected, the court overruling the objections: "Q. Were those men all laboring men? A. Most of them, I think. I do not know everybody over there. Q. There were quite a number of business men looking on, weren't there? A. I could not say; might be, and might be not; I have not time to look around who was the men looking on. Q. What was the attitude of all the people there to you, Mr. Delucchi, against you, or how were they? A. A big majority of the men here I do not know. I never do anything to anybody. I know many people in Amador. They are always against me, and time I got a little trouble at Amador, I was boss in there; lot of people there they were against, how to go buy that job. I no buy that job. I no ask for that job. I no say whether those people Amador City were business men or not business men." The ground of the objection to the foregoing questions was that they did not constitute pertinent cross-examination. The district attorney did not explain to the court the purpose of that line of cross-examination, but we think that it is clear, barring the form of the last question, that they were proper questions. The defendant, as we have seen, sought to convey the impression to the jury that a number of the persons, including the complaining witness, composing the crowd standing on the street when he left the hotel and entered said street after the first trouble, were his enemies, bent on doing him violence. He was asked by his counsel about the people in the crowd and, in reply, explained his reason for procuring and carrying a weapon, as follows: "I did not go out to kill anybody. I go out with this idea: Probably if I go out with a pistol, all bunch scatter away and make, clear them up and be all trouble done," or "all the trouble over," as his counsel made him say.

The district attorney (the defendant himself having first stated that those of the crowd who had arrayed themselves against him were laboring men) no doubt sought to show by the cross-examination to which objection was there and is here made that as a matter of fact a majority of the crowd were business men who were mere lookers-on and entertained no feeling of hostility whatever toward the defendant, and thus, if he could, weaken defendant's story about the "bunch" being against him, and that his purpose in carrying the revolver to the street was not to "scatter the bunch," but to resume the fight with Lopez. The question propounded to the defendant as to the "attitude of all the people there to you," etc., called for a conclusion of the defendant, and could have been successfully objected to on that ground; but it was eminently proper for the district attorney, in view of the theory of the defense, as disclosed by the defendant's story, to put to the latter proper questions, the object of which was to secure from the defendant himself a description of the manner in which "all the people" acted toward him—whether they sided with or encouraged or manifested, by words or actions, or both, a disposition to assist Lopez as against him or were apparently indifferent and took no part in the trouble. But the answer to the question was not only not responsive, but was, so far as we are able to judge it by the bare record, altogether unintelligible, and would have been stricken out on motion on either ground. There is nothing in the answer, nor in the nature or form of the question, if it may be assumed not to have been proper in substance, that could have done the defendant any harm.

We have now examined all the points pressed on this appeal, and have found no error that in our judgment calls for a reversal.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. We are satisfied with the conclusion reached in the former opinion in this case. We think, as announced therein, that the court's charge clearly and correctly covered every important question arising upon the evidence, and do not think that it has been or can be shown that any different verdict would have followed from the giving of the special instructions proposed by the defendant and rejected by the court.

But we may not improperly here say, lest a misapprehension may arise from our criticism of the instruction given by the court based upon subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure—that a witness false in a material part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others—that we did not intend to be understood as intimating that it was our opinion that an instruction announcing that proposition in the language in which it was expressed by the court would be prejudicial in any case, whatever the facts and circumstances thereof might be. The instruction obviously involves the statement of a mere commonplace or the statement of a proposition which every person of common sense knows or ought to know. Indeed, he would be radically deficient in natural mental equipment who would not know, without being warned, that his duty would be to distrust or not implicitly rely upon important statements of a person who he had found had deliberately lied as to other matters of equal importance. In the case of a trial, about the first thought that would naturally run through the minds of jurors, if they possessed common intelligence, would be their duty to consider with great caution and distrust the testimony of a witness who they had found had been untruthful in a material part thereof, and the court's warning that it is their duty to so view the testimony of such witness has always appeared to the writer to be unnecessary, and, indeed, a reflection upon the intelligence of the jury. The truth is that any man having sense enough to discharge the duties of a juror would distrust the entire testimony of such a witness, whether told by the court to do so or not, unless there were parts of it that harmoniously coincided with the general theory of the case or with evidence as to the reliability of which no question could arise or had arisen.

While, as pointed out in the original opinion, there is a slight variance between the language of the section and that in which the court announced that commonplace to the jury, the difference is so immaterial that we are unable to see wherein the giving of it could have prejudiced the rights of the defendant in the remotest degree, or that the jury would have probably reached any other conclusion had the instruction in the language proposed by the defendant been given in lieu thereof.

We are satisfied that the defendant was fairly tried, and that the judgment and order should not be disturbed.

The petition for a rehearing is therefore denied.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

PINHEIRO v. BETTENCOURT et al.

(Civ. 764.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 21, 1911.)

1. LICENSES (§ 44*)—USE OF REAL PROPERTY—PAROL LICENSE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to establish a mere parol license to use certain land in controversy belonging to defendant, and not an easement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by M. V. Pinheiro against M. M. Bettencourt and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Royal A. Carter, for appellants. Joel H. Smith and M. G. Gallaher, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to quiet title. In his amended complaint, plaintiff alleges ownership and possession of the E. ½ of the E. ½ of the N. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of section 11, township 16 S., range 22 E., M. D. B. & M., "being ten acres of land, more or less, and more particularly described and bounded as follows: Beginning at the northeast corner of said section 11, and running westerly along the north line of said section, a distance of 326 feet; thence southerly and parallel with the east line of said section, a distance of 1,322 feet; thence easterly and parallel with the north line of said section, a distance of 326 feet, to the east line of said section; thence north along said east line of said section, a distance of 1,322 feet, to the place of beginning;" alleges the payment of all taxes which have been assessed against said land; also alleges adverse possession since February 2, 1901, "as against all the world of all of the said land, except that defendants and each of them claim some right, title, interest, or estate in and to, and possession of, that portion of said land particularly described as a strip of land about four or five feet in width along the east side of and adjacent to the west line of said land, and extending north and south the entire length of said land; and that said claim of defendants and each of them is adverse to plaintiff," without right, etc. This latter description is involved in some obscurity, but it was intended to describe a strip of land along the west side of plaintiff's land. This is in a degree cleared up by the answer, and the trial seems to have been addressed to the issues affecting land on the west side of plaintiff's land.

The answer is a voluminous document of some 75 folios, but its substance may be stated in much less space. Defendants admit title in plaintiff to the land, as first described in the complaint, but deny that the tract contains more than 9⅞ acres, and deny that the north and south boundary line is but 326 feet in length, and allege its length to be 330 feet, but they do not admit or deny the length of the land north and south to be as alleged; admit adverse possession, as alleged, and payment of all taxes, except "on the right of way or easement hereinafter specified"; deny that they claim any right to or interest in plaintiff's said land, "except as hereinafter specified"; allege that in October, 1900, defendant Joaquin was the owner of the N. E. ¼ of said section, and in that month sold the E. ½ of E. ½ of N. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ to plaintiff, and plaintiff went into possession, and ever since has been in possession of the same, "except as to the easement and right of way herein referred to," and on February 2, 1901, said defendant Joaquin conveyed said land to plaintiff, "subject only to said easement," and thereafter conveyed the W. ½ of the E. ½ of the N. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of said section—an undivided eleven fourteenths to defendant M. M. Bettencourt and three fourteenths to defendant Ida—"subject only to the easement and right of way therein in favor of plaintiff, as hereinafter specified"; deny that defendant Joaquin has any interest in either said tracts of land, and he disclaims any right therein, "other than such contingent interest as he has therein on said W. ½ of said E. ½ of the N. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of said section 11, by virtue of a mortgage from defendants" M. M. and Ida on their said land. It is then alleged that, in the year 1901, plaintiff, being the owner of the land now claimed by him, and defendant Joaquin, the owner of the tract owned by the other defendants, agreed to leave a strip of land 17 feet in width along the dividing line of the two tracts; that is to say, plaintiff was to leave a strip 9½ feet wide on his side of the line and Joaquin 7½ feet on his side from a point about 400 feet south of the north line, to which point a fence ran along the dividing line, said strip of land 17 feet wide to be used jointly by Joaquin and his successors in interest and plaintiff for their mutual convenience in turning their horses when cultivating the vines planted by Joaquin and the trees planted by plaintiff, and also to be used for a roadway and for irrigating ditches; and it is alleged that since 1902 this strip of land has been jointly used by plaintiff and by defendants, the Bettencourts, in accordance with this agreement, to the point where said division fence was erected, which latter had been by plaintiff and Joaquin placed on or near the dividing line of their said land. For convenience, the plaintiff's land will hereinafter be designated as tract A and defendants' land as tract B.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is alleged, as a further defense, that, about the year 1902, plaintiff was the owner of tract A and defendant Joaquin was the owner of tract B; that there was then along the dividing line between said tracts a strip of land about 17 feet in width, which plaintiff and defendant Joaquin "had left, and which was then, and ever since has been, vacant and unplanted, for the purpose of being jointly used by them and the future owners of said land as and for a turn row, or turning space, whereon to turn teams in the cultivation of each of said several tracts of land," which said strip extended and now extends northerly from the south line of said tracts to a point about 400 feet south of the north line of said tracts, at or near "the termination of a fence, built by plaintiff and defendant Joaquin jointly as a partition fence, at or near the division line," said strip extending easterly about 9½ feet from the division line on plaintiff's land and about 7½ feet westerly on defendant Joaquin's land; and that, in 1902, "and more than five years before the commencement of this action," plaintiff and said defendant "jointly entered into and upon and used said strip of land jointly as a turn row, or turning space in the cultivation of said two several tracts of land, respectively, and for ditches and a roadway, and thereafter said plaintiff continuously to the present time, and jointly with defendant M. M. Joaquin and his successors in interest, and with their full knowledge, under a claim of right thereto, used, occupied, possessed, and enjoyed an easement and right of way upon, along, and over and across said portion" of defendants' land, and defendants enjoyed like uses and privilege over plaintiff's portion of said land, "and said use * * * of said land for said purposes was done openly * * * and under claim of right thereto by plaintiff and said Joaquin and his successors in interest adversely by said plaintiff to said defendant Joaquin and his successors in interest, but jointly with him and them, and not exclusively, and adversely by said defendant Joaquin and his successors in interest to said plaintiff, but jointly with him, and not exclusively, which said use * * * has existed and continued, as aforesaid, for more than five years immediately before the commencement of the action;" that the parties paid all taxes assessed against their said lands, respectively, and that no taxes were levied to either party or imposed on said easement and right of way, except as the same was assessed in the assessment upon the land. Two other separate defenses are set up, which so far as we can see, allege an easement by adverse user, for the purposes hereinbefore stated, acquired by plaintiff jointly with defendants over the strip of land, part of tract B, and the like acquisition by defendants of an easement by defendants jointly with plaintiff over the strip of land situated on tract A, having a length along said division line, north from the south line of the tracts, of 920 feet. Finally, substantially the same facts are averred as a counterclaim. Defendants pray that this 17-foot strip of land, 920 feet long, be decreed to be subject to an easement for the joint use of the parties, and for the purposes already described.

The court found that plaintiff was the owner of the land as described in the complaint, and "that ever since said 2d day of February, 1901, plaintiff has been and is now in the open, notorious, peaceable, and adverse possession, as against the whole world, of said land," and has paid all the taxes assessed thereon. That plaintiff did not, in the year 1901, or at any time, enter into an agreement with defendant Joaquin that any portion of plaintiff's land "should be used as a turning row or space to turn teams in cultivating said tract of land, or in cultivating the west half of the east half of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of said section (defendants' land), or any tract of land, or at all, or that any portion of said (land) should be used for an avenue or driveway, or for the construction thereon of an irrigating ditch, or of irrigating ditches." That at various times during a period of about four years next before the commencement of the action defendants Joaquin and M. M. Bettencourt "have used the strip of land between the west row of trees and vines" on plaintiff's land "and the west line of said land as a space to turn their teams or turning row in cultivating" defendants' said land, "and for irrigating ditches constructed thereon from time to time; but such use was in the nature of a neighborly accommodation, and was not pursuant to any agreement between plaintiff and defendants, or either of them, and was not under any claim of right, nor adverse to plaintiff, nor continuous, nor uninterrupted." It is then further found that plaintiff, "by the license and neighborly accommodation of defendants Joaquin and M. M. Bettencourt, at various times during said four years, used as and for a part of a turning row a part of a small strip of land lying between the east row of vines" on defendants' land, "and that said use was with the consent of said defendants, and not under any claim of right, and not adverse to said defendants or either of them, and not under any agreement therefor, and was not continuous and uninterrupted." "That all the allegations and averments of plaintiff's complaint are true, and that all of the denials of defendants' answer, and all of the allegations and averments of said answer, and all the allegations and averments of defendants' cross-complaint, adverse to or inconsistent with plaintiff's complaint, are untrue."

Plaintiff had judgment accordingly, with costs assessed "against all the defendants." Defendants appeal from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial.

Defendants admit plaintiff's ownership of the land claimed by him, except that they aver that the north and south boundary lines are 330 feet in length; whereas plaintiff claims that they are 326 feet long, and the court so found. As to the length of the division line, or plaintiff's west boundary line, he alleged and the court found it to be 1,322 feet. Defendants make no denial of this, except in their brief they say that, according to the rule governing United States surveys, that line could not have been over 1,320 feet in length. We do not see that the fact is material, for the length of this line in no wise affects defendants' land, and no controversy has arisen over the location of the south boundary of plaintiff's land. There is, indeed, no issue as to the precise location of the line dividing plaintiff's and defendants' land. But the evidence is that a survey was made of plaintiff's land by County Surveyor McKay, in the presence of defendant Joaquin and plaintiff, and he found a stake on its northwest corner 326.1 feet from the east section line, and another stake a the southwest corner 326.3 feet from the section line, and he found "a crooked wire fence on the west side of the property, but not on the line, probably 200 yards long," along the north end of the line. He testified: "It seems to me that Mr. Joaquin called my attention to the fence, and that it ran very close to the line, but just how close I can't say exactly."

[1] However, the point contended for by defendants does not concern this part of the land; they claimed in their answer an easement over the land of plaintiff south of this fence, i. e., "the southerly 920 feet of the westerly 9½ feet" of plaintiff's land, and this is the real issue in the case. Defendants claim an easement over the land of plaintiff, which they themselves admit is east of the division line. Defendant Joaquin testified that about the time he conveyed the land to plaintiff, in February, 1901, he and plaintiff measured the width of the tract with a board, and they then agreed upon the division line thus established. Upon this point, plaintiff's testimony, and that of his wife, was that Joaquin said if the survey they had made was not satisfactory plaintiff could call a surveyor any time, and have the line established. Defendant Joaquin testified "In regard to leaving a space unplanted, he [plaintiff] said he would leave an avenue there, and I said that was all right. He did not say at that time how much he would leave, because he planted one year before I did, and left 9½ feet, and afterwards, when I started to plant, I left 7 feet, because mine were vines and his were trees. That was left as an avenue to turn in and to ditch. He said he left 9½ feet to turn the horses, and he asked me to leave 7½ feet for the same purpose. When I used that, I turned the horses, going between his trees and coming right back; then when he turned from his trees, and reached my vines, he had room to turn. He drove across to my vines and turned, and I drove across to his and turned." He also testified that the space was used as an avenue "to haul things out," and he also built ditches through there.

Plaintiff testified that there was nothing said between him and Joaquin about an avenue between his land and Joaquin's. "I never had any discussion with Mr. Joaquin about the use of an avenue between Mr. Bettencourt's present land and my land. * * * I didn't know until last April that Mr. Bettencourt was claiming a right to the use of that road, or so-called avenue, on the line between his land and mine. * * * The space between the vines and trees on my land, and the space between the vines on the land of Bettencourt, has been used by us to turn our teams on. He asked me for it one year to run water on. * * * The only conversation I had with Mr. Joaquin about the use of that ditch was the first year. Nothing was said about the ditch after that." Bettencourt testified: "I have used the strip between his vineyard and orchard and my vineyard as a turnway and for a ditch. Neither he nor I objected to the other using the strip for a turnway. He consented to me using that avenue, and we used it in a neighborly way. He started to put some posts there (1908), and I objected, because I could not turn my horses." And Bettencourt pulled the posts out of the ground, and threw them on plaintiff's land.

[2-4] It seems to us that the findings of the court are justified by the evidence and sufficiently meet all material issues. The most that can be said of the right claimed by defendants is that they had a mere license by parol to cross over plaintiff's land for their convenience in cultivating their land, and plaintiff had a like privilege to use defendants' land, and that the use for a ditch and "to haul out things" was of a similar character. Such a license is revocable at any time. An easement can only be created by grant, or by prescriptive title. Defendants are claiming under an agreement, but a prescriptive title cannot arise out of agreement; it must be acquired adversely; it cannot be adverse when it rests upon a license, or mere neighborly accommodation. Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 205, 63 Pac. 361; Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667; 66 Pac. 10. See, also, Abbott v. Pond, 142 Cal. 393, 76 Pac. 60. We are unable to discover any legal basis upon which defendants can build.

[5] Defendants, in their cross-complaint, claimed an easement over plaintiff's land, and they also set up in plaintiff an easement and right of way over their lands, and defendants now complain that the court made no finding on this latter issue. The action was brought to quiet plaintiff's title to his own land. He denied any claim to defendants' land, thus disclaiming any interest in it. Defendants are not prejudiced by failure of the court to adjudge an easement over defendants' land, not claimed by plaintiff. This issue seems to us to be immaterial, and a failure to find on an immaterial issue is not sufficient ground for ordering a new trial. Garvey v. Lashells, 151 Cal. 526, 534, 91 Pac. 498.

[6] The finding that all the averments of defendants' answer and cross-complaint, "adverse to or inconsistent with plaintiff's complaint, are untrue" may be conceded to be an insufficient finding. But where all the material issues are found upon, and the findings support the judgment, such a general finding as is complained of may be disregarded.

[7] There was no necessity for a finding of ownership by defendants of their land. No issue was raised as to such ownership, for it was admitted by plaintiff, as was plaintiff's ownership of the land claimed by him admitted by defendants, except as to the right of way claimed, and on this there was a finding. Nor was it material for the court to find on defendants' averment that they had a right of way over their own land. This was not denied, and, besides, such right was appurtenant to the fee. Nothing more is required than that the material issues should be covered by the findings. And where a pretermitted finding must necessarily have been adverse to appellants they are not aggrieved. A fact which is implied by law need not be found upon. Aydelotte v. Billing, 8 Cal. App. 673, 97 Pac. 698.

[8] Appellant Joaquin complains that judgment should not have gone against him, with the other defendants, for costs. If he made an unqualified disclaimer, this would be true. But he expressly stated that he had an interest in defendants' land as mortgagee, and he claimed and urged at the trial that defendants' title carried with it the easement contended for by them. In Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 21 Pac. 946, the court quoted approvingly from cases there cited: "The statute does not confine the remedy to the case of an adverse claimant setting up a legal title, or even an equitable one; but the act is intended to embrace every description of claim, whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of his property, or its title clouded, or its value depreciated, or whereby the plaintiff might be incommoded and damnified by the assertion of an outstanding title already held, or to grow out of the adverse pretention." And the court said: "If the defendant by his answer disclaimed all interest whatever, judgment may, nevertheless, be entered against him, though in such case it must be without costs." We think that when a mortgagee is made a defendant with the owners of the fee, and unites with them in contesting the action, he is with them liable for the costs, should they fail in their defense.

It seems to us that the findings sufficiently meet all the material issues, and are sufficient to support the judgment. We discover no prejudicial errors in the trial of the cause.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

H. A. McNabb was convicted of assault with intent to rob, and he appeals. Affirmed Earl Newmire and Isador Morris, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit robbery. By the judgment it was ordered that he be imprisoned in the state prison for a period of two years. The judgment and also an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are appealed from. But two points are urged as grounds for reversal. It is contended, first that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict; and, second, that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in asking certain questions of a witness relative to statements alleged to have been made by defendant prior to the commission of the crime charged.

[1] The evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict. The complaining witness testified to the attempt made by two men to rob him on the evening of January 27, 1911, as he left a car on his way home, and within the easterly limits of the city of Los Angeles. He told how he had wrestled with one of his assailants, and, after escaping from him, had run to his home near by and telephoned the police; that he had then returned to the place where he had been assaulted, and found the defendant not far away. The latter was leaving the scene of the assault, and appeared to be intoxicated at the time. Complaining witness pursued and overtook him, and caused him to be detained until a policeman arrived. Complaining witness further testified positively that the defendant was one of the two men who attempted to rob him. If the jury believed this testimony to be true, as it must be assumed it did, then the verdict as rendered was the proper one to be returned. In no view of the case can it be said that the evidence was insufficient to support the conclusion of the jury.

[2] While a witness named Powell was being examined at the trial the district attorney asked him several questions touching a statement alleged to have been made by defendant a few days prior to the day on which the attempted robbery was committed. The question finally propounded to the witness was as follows: "Q. Did Mr. McNabb at that time in the presence of other people say he was going into the hold-up business?" To this and preceding preliminary questions the defendant's counsel objected. Defendant's counsel made a general objection that the matter sought to be elicited was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and this objection was sustained. The district attorney then announced that he had finished with the witness, and the court, without any request from counsel prompting him so to do, addressed the jury and said: "The jury will disregard the offer to prove this matter." It was not pointed out specifically, either by any objection of counsel to the questions indicated, or any exception then taken, that misconduct was attributable to the district attorney on account of his having pursued this line of examination. If we admit that the matter sought to be brought out was subject to the objections as made, which we do not decide, it does appear that the trial judge was careful to admonish the jury and directed it to disregard the offer to prove the matter objected to. And conceding that a proper exception has been preserved (which, in our opinion, the record fails to show, under the decisions in People v. Shem Ah Fook, 64 Cal. 380, 1 Pac. 347; People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 650, 49 Pac. 842; People v. Frigerio, 107 Cal. 153, 40 Pac. 107; People v. Osborn, 12 Cal. App. 148, 106 Pac. 891), still it does clearly appear that the rights of defendant were fully guarded, and that prejudice could not reasonably be said to have resulted where the court so promptly admonished the jury to disregard the matter which defendant claims was improperly suggested by the questions of the district attorney.

In our opinion this appeal is without substantial merit, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NITTA. (Cr. 352.)

1. PROSTITUTION (§ 3*) — INDICTMENT — CONSENT OF HUSBAND—EVIDENCE.

Under an information charging that defendant did willfully connive at, consent to, and permit the placing and leaving of his wife in a house of prostitution, and that he did then and there willfully allow and permit her to remain there, evidence held sufficient to sustain the conviction under the charge of willfully permitting her to remain there.

HALL, J. Defendant was convicted for violating the provisions of section 266g of the Penal Code, and, upon judgment being rendered, appealed to this court.

It is charged in the information that the defendant did willfully connive at, consent to, and permit the placing and leaving of his wife in a house of prostitution, and that he did then and there willfully permit and allow her to remain there.

[1] It is contended that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, because the evidence shows that the defendant placed his wife in the house of prostitution, and the argument is that this state of facts does not support a charge of conniving at, consenting to, or permitting the placing of his wife in such house.

The information however, also charges him with permitting his wife to remain in such house of prostitution, which act constitutes a complete offense. The evidence shows that the defendant placed his wife in the house in question on a given date, and received from the keeper thereof $350, and departed, leaving his wife in the house, where she remained, and for several months followed the calling of a prostitute. Subsequently after an interval of several months, defendant returned and demanded of his wife that she give him $250. This she did, on his agreeing to a separation after the Japanese custom, paying the money from her earnings as such prostitute. Whether or not the evidence may be said to support a charge of conniving at the placing of the wife in a house of prostitution or not, it certainly supports the charge that he permitted her to remain in such house, which is all that is required to support a conviction under the information. People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 403; People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; People v. Sheldon, 68 Cal. 434, 9 Pac. 457.

[2] It is also contended that the character of the house was not sufficiently proved. This is also without merit. Several witnesses, police officers, testified to the general reputation of the premises as being a house of prostitution, and which they described as consisting of the third floor of a certain house containing little rooms, at the door of which gaudily dressed Japanese girls were accustomed to sit, and in which rooms they received the visits of Chinese men. At the entrance to the premises was a sign, "No white men allowed." During the time the wife of defendant remained in the house there were no other inmates, but during such time she and the keeper, a woman, followed the calling of prostitutes. The character of the house was amply proved.

No other points are made for a reversal, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

WANIOREK v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 836.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 348*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—ACTION—EMERGENCY—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where plaintiff, a street car passenger, jumped from the car by reason of defendant's alleged negligence in permitting the controller to blow out, and was injured, an instruction that if such fact created in plaintiff's mind a reasonable apprehension of great peril, and, in order to avoid the same, plaintiff jumped while the car was in motion, and an ordinarily prudent person under like conditions would have acted likewise, then plaintiff was not negligent, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1403; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 203*)—INSTRUCTIONS—THEORY OF CASE.

Either party is entitled to have an instruction given based on his theory of the case, if there is any evidence to support it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 478; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 260*) — INSTRUCTIONS — REQUEST TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

In an action for injuries to a passenger caused by jumping from a street car while in motion in an alleged emergency, the court charged that in considering whether plaintiff was negligent in jumping the jury should consider all the circumstances prior to the jumping and the situation as then presented to his mind, and, if plaintiff did not act as a prudent man would have acted under the same circumstances, he was negligent. Held not to cover a request to charge that, if the blowing out of the controller created in plaintiff's mind a reasonable apprehension of great peril, and in order to avoid such anticipated peril plaintiff jumped from the car while in motion sustaining the injuries complained of, and that an ordinarily prudent person under like circumstances would have jumped, then he was not negligent, though, had he remained on the car, he would not have been injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 260;* Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1407.]

4. CARRIERS (§ 315*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—ACTION—PLEADING—THEORY OF CASE.

Where a passenger jumped from a street car to avoid a supposed impending peril because of the explosion of the controller, but the complaint was not framed on the theory that he acted in obedience to the direction of the conductor in telling the passengers to jump, plaintiff could not recover on the theory that the railway company was liable for the result of such direction given by the conductor in the course of his employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1281, 1282; Dec. Dig. § 315.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 345*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—ACTION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where plaintiff jumped from a moving street car to avoid what he thought was an impending peril resulting from the explosion of the controller, evidence that the conductor told the passengers to "Jump for your lives" was admissible as bearing on the question whether, as a reasonable man, plaintiff was justified in jumping from the car.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1400; Dec. Dig. § 345.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 317*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS —ACTION—EVIDENCE — MATERIALITY TO ISSUES.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger in jumping from a street car as the result of an explosion of the controller, there was no allegation that the conductor's direction to the passengers to "Jump for your lives" constituted actionable negligence, evidence that the conductor had no authority to give such direction was immaterial.

7. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—CONCLUSION OF WITNESS.

A question as to whether a street car motorman or conductor in a sudden emergency had authority to order any one to jump from the car while it was in motion was objectionable as calling for a conclusion of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2176; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

8. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 120*)—AGENT'S AUTHORITY—PROOF.

The proper way to show the extent of an agent's authority is to offer evidence of the orders given him or of the rules adopted for his guidance, and, if such evidence is not available, it is proper to describe the work performed by the agent in his employment with knowledge and implied acquiescence of the principal, or tracing it to some word or act of the principal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by M. Waniorek against the United Railroads of San Francisco. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for appellant. A. A. Moore, Stanley Moore, and Wm. M. Cannon, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages for personal injuries and defendant had the verdict. Plaintiff appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The facts deemed essential for a proper understanding of the case will appear as we proceed.

[1] Among the instructions requested by plaintiff and refused by the court was the following: "If you believe from the evidence that on the 12th day of February, 1903, and while plaintiff was being transported as a passenger on said car of said defendant, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, by reason of the negligence of the defendant, the controller on said car blew up or caught fire, and that the blowing up or catching on fire of said controller created in the mind of said plaintiff a reasonable apprehension of great peril or injury, and that by reason thereof, and in order to avoid such anticipated peril or injury, plaintiff jumped from said car, while said car was in motion, sustaining the injuries complained of, and that an ordinarily prudent and cautious person, under like conditions and circumstances would have jumped off and from said car, then I instruct you that, under such circumstances, plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in jumping off and from said car, even though you also believe from the evidence that, had he remained upon said car, said plaintiff would not have been injured." Whether prejudicial error was committed by the refusal to give said instruction depends upon the proper solution of the following questions: Does said proposed instruction embody an authenticated principle of law? Does the hypothesis contained therein find substantial support in the evidence? If the foregoing be answered in the affirmative, then, could the court legally decline to give the instruction and was the refusal without prejudice by reason of other instructions which were given to the jury? Of these the last only can be the subject of serious controversy.

As a proposition of law, indeed, the instruction is hardly questioned by respondent. It presents a hypothetical situation of peril to a passenger produced by the negligence of the carrier and which creates in that passenger's mind a reasonable apprehension of danger; and upon the basis of the passenger acting as a reasonably prudent man in his effort to escape the danger is predicated the absence of contributory negligence. This is in harmony, we may say, with the test universally prescribed by the authorities. The only possible objection to it as a principle of law arises from the suggestion that the act of jumping from a moving car is irreconcilable with the theory of prudent and reasonable conduct. But the authorities are agreed that the circumstances may be such as to justify and even demand this perilous step, and they positively affirm the doctrine of the instruction, many of them stating the rule even more favorably for the injured person.

In Thompson on Negligence, § 2927, it is said: "It is a principle of obvious justice that one person cannot impute negligence to the act of another which act has been induced by the negligence or wrongful act or omission of the former; and this rule applies as between carriers and passengers. It follows that where the passenger acts erroneously under a sudden impulse of fear produced by the negligence of the carrier or his servants, in consequence of which erroneous action the passenger is killed or injured, whereas he would have escaped unharmed but for the same, there may be a recovery of damages; for here, though the error of the passenger is nearer in time to the hurt which he receives than is the negligence of the carrier, yet in a juridical sense it is more remote. Perhaps it is a better statement of this doctrine to say that in theory of law the passenger is not guilty of contributory negligence at all, but that his error is the natural, and consequently the blameless consequence of the fault of the carrier. The real rule proceeds upon the theory that the misconduct of the carrier has produced the erroneous action of the passenger, and that it does not therefore lie in the mouth of the carrier to defend an action for damages on the ground of such erroneous action, thereby taking advantage of his own wrong."

Among the illustrations of the rule given in section 2978 by the learned author is one in the following language: "So, where a passenger upon a railway train is, in consequence of the negligent and unskillful operation of its train by the company, placed in a situation so perilous as to render it seemingly prudent for him to leap from the train, as where he sees another train rapidly approaching from the rear on the same track, and he so leaps and is injured, he is entitled to recover damages, although he would not have been hurt if he had remained on the train." Many cases in support of the doctrine of said text are cited by appellant. Of these we refer to the following: Robinson v. Railroad Co., 48 Cal. 421; Lawrence v. Green, 70 Cal. 417, 11 Pac. 750, 59 Am. Rep. 428; Green v. Pacific Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 435, 62 Pac. 747; Schneider v. Market St. R. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 66 Pac. 734; Dinnigan v. Peterson, 3 Cal. App. 765, 87 Pac. 218; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Murray, 55 Ark. 248, 18 S. W. 50, 16 L. R. A. 787, 29 Am. St. Rep. 32; Firebaugh v. Seattle, etc., Co., 40 Wash. 658, 82 Pac. 995, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 836, 111 Am. St. Rep. 990; Baber v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co., 10 Misc. Rep. 109, 30 N. Y. Supp. 931; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Maddry, 57 Ark. 306, 21 S. W. 472; Budd v. United Carriage Co., 25 Or. 314, 35 Pac. 660, 27 L. R. A. 279; Buel v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co., 31 N. Y. 314, 88 Am Dec. 271. See, also, Braly v. Fresno City Ry. Co., 9 Cal. App. 417, 99 Pac. 400.

In the case of Green v. Pacific Lumber Co., supra, a lady passenger had jumped with other passengers from a train going at the rate of from eight to ten miles an hour, under an apprehension of great danger from collision with a freight train, discovered to be rapidly approaching from around a curve. Recovery was opposed on the ground of contributory negligence. In discussing the question our Supreme Court said, through the late Mr. Justice Garoutte: "If the danger of collision is hanging right over a passenger's head, the proprieties and niceties usually demanded of passengers in alighting from trains need not be observed to their full extent. Under these circumstances, a person does not stand and ponder upon the order of his going, but goes at once. A safe or unsafe spot may be chosen upon which to alight from the car. If the spot be unsafe and dangerous, that fact of itself will not necessarily defeat a right of recovery, even though a safe and secure spot was at hand and equally ready of access," and it was held to be "essentially a question of fact for the jury whether or not plaintiff was justified, in view of all the surrounding conditions, in jumping from the train."

The Firebaugh Case was very much like the one at bar. There, as here, a passenger being placed in danger in consequence of the blowing out of the controller in an electric trolley car, jumped from the car, with a view of saving himself, and was thereby injured. The Supreme Court of Washington upheld the action of the lower court in giving the following instruction: "When a controller upon a car of a street railway company blows out or burns out, the law presumes that such blowing or burning resulted from some defect of the controller or other appliances of the car, and in such a case it devolves upon the company to show that such burning or blowing out did not result from any cause which the highest degree of care on its part could have prevented." It was also held that plaintiff could not properly be charged with contributory negligence for jumping from the car; it being said: "We think, upon an examination of the cases, that they do not in any manner sustain appellant's contention, and that, when it is conceded, as it must be from an examination of the testimony in this case, that the plaintiff was warranted in retreating from the peril which threatened him, and when, in fact, he would have been guilty of contributory negligence if he had not attempted to save himself by retreating, there is no equitable rule which could deprive him, by reason of such cautionary action on his part, from pleading negligence on the part of the carrier." In Baber v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co., supra, it is said: "Contributory negligence was not predicable of the fact that the plaintiff leaped from the moving car. * * * Neither is error of judgment in a sudden and instinctive effort to escape impending danger to be accepted as a proximate cause of resultant injury."

In the case of St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Maddry, supra, also, the complaining party, who was a passenger, attempted to escape from the car. The court said: "Self-preservation dictated flight, and all the passengers attempted it. In the attempt Maddry was killed, while others reached places of safety, and one, who was caught in the car, strangely enough survived its wreck. But there is nothing to show that Maddry's fate was due to any careless, negligent, or incautious act of his. It certainly did not appear safe, and was not incumbent upon him to keep his seat in the car about to be wrecked." The rule is well stated by the Supreme Court of Oregon, in the Budd Case, supra, as follows: "Whether the plaintiff was contributorily negligent in jumping from the carriage, under the circumstances, depends upon whether her act was precipitate or rash, or such as a person of ordinary prudence might do. The evidence shows that the plaintiff was in a closed coupé, that the horses were running and kicking, and that the driver, who appeared to be frightened and unable to control them, was calling excitedly to the plaintiff and her daughter, 'For God's sake, jump out.' These circumstances showed presumptively that the negligence of defendant had placed the plaintiff in a situation of imminent peril. In such case the law does not require of the passenger the exercise of all the presence of mind and care of a prudent man; and if the plaintiff, in endeavoring to escape from such danger, either by following the directions of the driver or the dictates of her own judgment, acted as a person of ordinary prudence would have done under similar circumstances, she was not negligent. Hence whether she acted negligently or not was a question of fact, to be submitted to the jury." So in the Buel Case the New York Court of Appeals says: "But it is insisted that, although the defendant's negligence caused the injury complained of, the plaintiff should have been nonsuited, because his careless conduct contributed to produce it. The misconduct alluded to is that, upon seeing the approaching train, and men jumping from other cars, to avoid the impending danger, he left his seat, and rushed to the forward door of the car, with the view of escaping himself, and had stepped one foot upon the platform at the instant of the collision. This, it is said, was such negligence as to have required the court to nonsuit the plaintiff. That is, as a matter of law, a passenger in a railroad car, who sees that he is placed in peril by the culpable conduct of the managers of the road, and judges correctly that a collision is inevitable is guilty of a wrong, if he does not control the instinct of self-preservation and sit still and take the chances of safety. This is not the law. Seeing the danger in which he was placed, the plaintiff was justifiable in seeking to escape injury by leaving the car." The proposed instruction here, it must be remembered, contains no direction to the jury to find that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence if they believed that he was under a reasonable apprehension of danger when he jumped from the car, but it requires that the jury shall go further in order to acquit him of contributory negligence and hold that, in attempting to escape from the danger, he acted as a reasonably prudent man would under the same circumstances.

As a basis in the evidence for the instruction, we refer to the following: Plaintiff's witness, Camencind, testified: "It was a loud report. I looked towards the place where it came from and saw a light, the sparks, and lightning. This kept on for some time. I saw nothing else but fire—I saw the motorman. The fire was around the controller and around the motorman. It was a large flame and was all around the motorman. The conductor was there in the front end of the car. He came running through the car, and told us to jump off of the car. He said 'Jump for your lives, get off the car.' At the time I jumped the car was going at a terrific speed." The plaintiff also testified to the same effect, and he declared that he jumped off the car "because it was the rule of the conductor, and then there was danger that the car might get all on fire, and I was the first time in an accident, or the car may come out of all that and fall over and kill me in any way and maybe the whole people," and that he believed it was the best thing he could do under the circumstances as they existed.

The theory of the instruction being, therefore, within the sanction of the law and supported by substantial evidence, it was the duty of the court to direct the jury what should be their conclusion as to contributory negligence in case they found the facts as recited in said instruction.

[2] "Either party has a right to have an instruction given to the jury based upon his theory of the case, if there is any evidence to support it." Buckley v. Silverberg, 113 Cal. 673, 45 Pac. 804; People v. Hemple, 4 Cal. App. 120, 87 Pac. 227.

[3] The remaining question is whether the ground was covered by instructions which were given. The better course is for the court to give a proposed instruction where there is no valid objection to it (People v. Lachanais, 32 Cal. 436); but, where the substance of an instruction refused is fairly embraced and expressed in those given, no injury is presumed to have resulted (Merguire v. O'Donnell, 103 Cal. 50, 36 Pac. 1033; People v. Schmitt, 106 Cal. 48, 39 Pac. 204). The only instructions that could possibly be claimed to supply the omission were as follows: No. 5: "Contributory negligence of a passenger, in its legal signification, is such an act or omission on the part of a passenger amounting to want of ordinary care, as, concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant, is a proximate cause or occasion of the injury to the passenger complained of. To constitute contributory negligence on the part of a passenger, there must be a want of ordinary care on the part of the passenger, and a proximate connection between that and the injury sustained by the passenger." No. 7: "You are instructed that in considering the question as to whether plaintiff, M. Waniorek, was guilty of contributory negligence in jumping off the car upon which he was riding as a passenger on the 12th day of February, 1903, you should take into consideration all of the conditions and circumstances, as proven, existing at and immediately prior to the time he so jumped, and the situation as it was then presented to his mind, as established by the evidence." No. 19: "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff in jumping from the car in question (if you find that he did jump therefrom) did not act as a reasonable and prudent man would have acted under the same circumstances, then I instruct you that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and your verdict must be in favor of the United Railroads of San Francisco." The first of these, "No. 5," it is apparent, is a mere abstract definition of contributory negligence, and it does not reach the question under consideration. No. 7 comes nearer the point. "All the conditions and circumstances existing at and immediately prior to the time he so jumped" comprehends, of course, in a general way, every circumstance referred to in said proposed instruction as occurring before the accident; but said instruction No. 7 does not purport to present plaintiff's theory of the case. It is a mere general instruction, directing the jury to consider all the facts and circumstances proven in the case. It might be given just as well for the defendant as for the plaintiff and, by changing the language describing the accident itself so as to conform to each particular case, it might very properly be given in any damage suit whatever. In fact, it contains a mere legal platitude and directs the jury to do something which every intelligent juror, in the absence of any such instructions, understands to be his duty.

That the omission was not supplied by instruction No. 19 is at once apparent. Said instruction presented the theory of defendant to the effect that plaintiff, in jumping from the car, did not act as a reasonably prudent and cautious person. Some astute juror might get from that the impression that the converse was equally binding, but it was just as important to present the affirmative as well as the negative phase of the legal proposition.

Plaintiff's whole case depended upon the theory embodied in said proposed instruction, and we are left to conjecture whether the jury accepted the facts as recited in the instruction and drew the erroneous inference that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore not entitled to recover, or whether they rejected the theory as to some or all of the facts, and therefore reached a legal conclusion as to plaintiff's culpability. The other feature, relative to the result if he had remained in the car, was also a matter of importance to call to the attention of the jury. There is no doubt he would have escaped uninjured if he had not jumped from the car, and, from this circumstance, alone, in the absence of a caution to the contrary, the jury were likely to conclude that he acted in a precipitate and unreasonable manner.

It may be, as suggested by respondent, that the jury found all the facts in favor of defendant's theory. It is beyond controversy that they had the legal right to do so, and, if they believed the testimony of defendant's witnesses, it was their bounden duty to so find. But respondent is entirely at fault in the contention that for this reason any error in ruling upon evidence or in giving or refusing instructions is without prejudice. There were no special findings, and hence we do not know what theory as to the facts was adopted by the jury. They may have found for defendant because of an erroneous view as to the law of contributory negligence, and this might have been corrected had the proposed instruction been given. Of course, if there had been no evidence in support of plaintiff's theory, a different question would be presented.

Appellant devotes much space to a learned discussion of the proposition that "Common carriers of passengers are responsible for the negligent or willful acts of their employés, done within the scope of their employment, whether directly authorized or not. Waniorek, therefore, was justified in acting upon the suggestion or direction of the motorman or conductor to jump for his life." But, conceding that appellant states the law correctly, it is difficult to perceive how it can be of any advantage to him on this appeal.

[4] There was no proposed instruction embodying said principle, nor was the complaint, indeed, framed upon the theory that plaintiff, in jumping from the car, acted in obedience to the direction of defendant's agents given in the course of their employment. Likewise, since the evidence was strikingly conflicting as to whether any such direction was given, the verdict of the jury cannot be said to be against law, even upon the hypothesis that the motorman or conductor was authorized to direct the passenger to "jump for his life." The fact is, as conceded by appellant in his closing brief, that, under the pleadings, the question of whether the agent acted within the scope of his authority was entirely immaterial. [5] The true position, as we conceive it, is that the direction, if given, was an additional circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether the plaintiff acted as a reasonable man. Since the motorman or conductor was presumably better qualified than plaintiff to judge of the exigency of the situation, the passenger would naturally rely largely upon the judgment of the employé, and it is apparent that, if such direction were actually given, it would have an important bearing upon the question whether as a reasonable man he was justified in jumping from the car.

[6] The only other contention of appellant is that the court erred in admitting evidence of the witness Allen as to the duty or authority of the motorman and conductor. The question and answers in this connection that we deem important are as follows: "Q. Has the motorman any power or authority, or it is his duty in any way, to order any one to jump from the car while it is in motion? A. No, sir; it is not. Q. Even in the case of a sudden emergency, such as I have suggested, has he any such power? A. He has not. Q. Has the conductor any power or authority in that regard? A. Not at all." To these questions the general objection was made, and also that each of them called for the conclusion of the witness. As already stated, the questions related to immaterial matter. It was not charged in the complaint as an act of negligence, or at all, that plaintiff was directed to jump from the car, and therefore said directions, if given, were not made the basis for recovery, and they could only be considered as affecting the reasonableness of the conduct of plaintiff. But for this purpose it is clear that the question whether said directions were authorized or not was a matter of indifference, especially since plaintiff had no knowledge as to the extent of the agent's authority.

[7] But the question called for the opinion of the witness, and upon this ground also the objection, we think, should have been sustained.

[8] Manifestly the proper way to show the extent of the agent's authority is to offer evidence of the orders or direction given him or of the rules adopted for his guidance by the principal. If there were no such evidence available, it would be proper to describe the work performed by the agent in the course of his employment, bringing it home to the knowledge and implied acquiescence of the principal, or, in the language of Mechem, "tracing it to some word or act of the alleged principal." But without any such showing it is a palpable invasion of the province of the jury to ask a witness whether a certain act is within the scope of the agent's authority. Neither can it be justified upon the theory that the witness was an expert upon the subject, as the duty of these employés is not a matter of expert testimony.

In Cent. R. R. Co. v. De Bray, 71 Ga. 406, the plaintiff had been directed by the conductor to get off the train while in motion. It is said in the opinion: "The court refused to allow W. A. Tinsley and R. Schmidt to testify that, if one obeys the order of a conductor and gets off of a moving train, 'he does it at his own risk.' To allow testimony of this kind would be to allow a witness to testify what the law is. Witnesses must testify to facts, and the court is responsible for the law." It was also held that the court below properly rejected the offer to prove by one A. J. White that "no conductor or other officer had the right to order an employé to get off or on a moving train, and, if such orders were given, the employé could not be required to obey the order," on the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant, and also not the subject of expert testimony. McIsaac v. Northampton Electric Co., 172 Mass. 89, 51 N. E. 524, 70 Am. St. Rep. 244, was an action by a lineman employed by an electric lighting company to recover damages for injuries sustained by the breaking and falling down of a pole carrying the wires. It was sought to charge the plaintiff with contributory negligence in failing to inspect the pole before going upon it. In striking out some of the testimony in reference to the duty of inspection, the court said: "The words, 'It is not the lineman's business to do it,' in Dorsey's answer, were rightly stricken out. To say nothing of other objections, they were not responsive to the question. The question whether it was a part of the work of a lineman to make that inspection was properly ruled out. It called for an opinion of the witness in regard to the legal effect of a contract." It was held in Krueger v. Chic., etc., Ry. Co., 84 Mo. App. 366, that it was improper to ask a brakeman the question whether certain acts were in the line of his duties, but that the proper course to follow would be to state what he had been directed to do, or that he had been accustomed to perform certain acts, and how long he had been accustomed to perform them. In Providence Tool Co. v. Mfg. Co., 120 Mass. 35, it was held improper to ask a treasurer whether, as treasurer, he had authority to make and execute a promissory note, the court stating that "all that could properly be obtained from him were the facts by which the inference of authority was to be supported or repelled, and it was for the counsel to argue, and for the jury to find, under the instructions of the court, whether the facts so given proved that he had the authority which he denied." In Short Mountain Coal Co. v. Hardy, 114 Mass. 197, it was held improper to ask whether an agent had authority to make a sale.

It is no doubt true, as stated in Kiesel v. Sun Ins. Co., 88 Fed. 243, 31 C. C. A. 515, that "The general rule that facts, and not conclusions, should be stated, is a wise and salutary one, and cannot be too strictly followed. It tends to prevent fraud and perjury, and is one of the strongest safeguards of personal liberty and private rights. Whenever it is doubtful whether a case falls under the rule or under one of its exceptions, the wise course is to place it under the rule." Other cases, cited by appellant, discussing and illustrating the same principle are the following: Kendall Co. v. Baine, 46 Mo. App. 588; Muff v. Railway, 22 Mo. App. 588; Madden v. Railway, 50 Mo. App. 673; Fogel v. S. F., etc., Ry. Co., 42 Pac. 566;[1] People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303; Conner v. Stanley, 67 Cal. 315, 7 Pac. 723; Sappenfield v. Main St. R. R. Co., 91 Cal. 59, 27 Pac. 590; Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 281, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Kerrigan v. Market St. R. Co., 138 Cal. 506, 71 Pac. 621; Luman v. Golden Ancient Channel M. Co., 140 Cal. 708, 74 Pac. 307.

It is evident that the testimony thus admitted may have had an important bearing upon the verdict of the jury. They may have believed that the direction was given to plaintiff as claimed by him, but have concluded that he had no right to regard or be influenced by it, for the reason that the act was beyond the scope of the employé's authority. We cannot tell, of course, what weight was given by the jury to the testimony, or whether without it their verdict would have been for defendant. It is sufficient to say that, in view of the probability that such testimony influenced the verdict, the ruling of the court must be held to be prejudicial.

[1] Reported in full in the Pacific Reporter; reported as a memorandum decision without opinion in 110 Cal. xvii.

Respondent asks: "When a master is sought to be held liable for the act of his servant, is he precluded from showing the facts concerning the employment and from asserting his defense that it was not within the scope of the servant's authority?" As we have already seen, plaintiff has not sought to hold the defendant liable for the said direction alleged to have been given to plaintiff; but, if such were the case, there is no doubt that the facts concerning the employment could be shown. But the opinion of a witness is not legal evidence of these facts.

No fault can be found with the authorities cited by respondent. For instance, quotation is made from Mechem on Agency, § 106, as follows: "It is impossible to lay down any inflexible rule by which it can be determined what evidence shall be sufficient to establish an agency in any given case, but it may be said in general terms that whatever evidence has a tendency to prove the agency is admissible, even though it be not full and satisfactory, as it is the province of the jury to pass upon it." We have examined the cases cited by respondent, but find that none of them involves the same situation as is presented here. They contain, however, some interesting reflections upon the subject of agency, and may be consulted with profit. The cases are Howe Machine Co. v. Clark, 15 Kan. 492; Piercy v. Hedrick, 2 W. Va. 458, 98 Am. Dec. 774; Van Sickle v. Keith, 88 Iowa, 9, 55 N. W. 42; O'Leary et al. v. German American Ins. Co. of New York, 100 Iowa, 390, 69 N. W. 686; Reeves & Co. v. Breuning, 13 N. D. 157, 100 N. W. 241; Brunner v. American Telegraph & Telephone Co., 151 Pa. 447, 25 Atl. 29; Moe v. Job, 1 N. D. 140, 45 N. W. 700.

For the foregoing reasons, we think plaintiff is entitled to a new trial, and the order is therefore reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

DRINKHOUSE v. GERMAN SAVINGS & LOAN SOCIETY. (Civ. 792.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 26, 1911. Rehearing Denied Oct. 25, 1911. Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1911.)

1. GIFTS (§ 30*)—BANK DEPOSIT—EVIDENCE.

Decedent went to a bank with W., and transferred an account to the joint credit of herself and W., in order that on her death W. might receive the balance on surrendering the passbook. Decedent at all times prior to her death retained exclusive possession of the books, as well as the right to withdraw at will, and at one time did draw money from the account. Held, that such facts were insufficient to show a gift of the deposit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. §§ 52–75; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 34*)—EXPRESS TRUSTS—CREATION.

In order to create an express trust of a bank deposit, it was not necessary that the depositor should have technically declared her intent to create a trust, or that the bank, in order to be charged with the duties of a trustee, should have indicated its willingness to undertake the trust by any formal words of acceptance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. TRUSTS (§ 25*) — PERSONAL PROPERTY — CREATION.

A voluntary trust in personal property may be created as to the donor, beneficiary, and trustee, by any words or acts of the donor and trustee which indicate with reasonable certainty an intention on the donor's part to create a trust, the subject, purpose, and beneficiary, and by the acceptance of the trust by the trustee, as provided by Civ. Code, §§ 2221 and 2222.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 34–37; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

4. TRUSTS (§ 42*)—DECLARATIONS OF DONOR.

All the declarations of a donor, made to a trustee in relation to a trust before acceptance, except where the trust is declared in writing, are admissible as part of the declaration of the trust, as provided by Civ. Code, § 2254.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 61; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

5. TRUSTS (§ 34*) — PERSONAL PROPERTY — BANK DEPOSIT.

Decedent, having certain accounts in a savings bank, went to the bank with claimant, and stated that she desired to sign over to claimant whatever money she had in the account, so that if anything happened to her (decedent) claimant could take the passbook, go to the bank, and receive the money. The clerk suggested that the account be changed to a joint account in the name of decedent and claimant, which was done. Thereafter decedent retained the bank books, and at one time drew a small amount from one of the accounts. Held that, notwithstanding such circumstance, the facts indicated the creation of an express trust of the deposits for claimant's benefit.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by John A. Drinkhouse, as administrator of the estate of Elizabeth Thomsen, deceased, against the German Savings & Loan Society. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Goodfellow & Eells and Edward Lande, for appellant. Fabius T. Finch, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal upon a bill of exceptions from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The plaintiff, as the administrator of the estate of Elizabeth Thomsen, deceased, brought suit against the defendant, to recover a specific sum of money which it was alleged the deceased had deposited for her use and benefit with the defendant. The defendant in its answer alleged, in substance, that on the 14th day of September, 1898, the deceased, Elizabeth Thomsen, and one Louisa H. Wilson deposited with the defendant the sum of $1,597.34, and that the amount of said account, with accrued dividends to date of July 17, 1899, was the sum of $1,636.35; that at the time of the making of said deposit the defendant issued and delivered a passbook to the said Elizabeth Thomsen and to said Louisa H. Wilson, and that they, when depositing the money and opening the account, instructed the defendant to pay, and the defendant agreed with them and each of them to pay, the said sum of money so deposited and entered in the said passbook to whichever of them should demand and receipt for the same and produce the said passbook. That on the 17th day of July, 1899, the said Louisa H. Wilson produced the said passbook, and demanded and received from the defendant the sum of $1,616.35.

For a further and separate defense, the defendant averred that, on or about the said 14th day of September, the money in controversy was deposited with the defendant by the said Elizabeth Thomsen, in trust for the said Louisa H. Wilson, and was, in the event of the death of the said Elizabeth Thomsen, to be paid to the said Louisa H. Wilson, and that at the time of the deposit of said money the said Elizabeth Thomsen gave and transferred all of said money and all of her interest therein, as well as her claims and demands against the defendant in respect thereof, to the said Louisa H. Wilson.

The undisputed facts of the case as developed upon the trial are, in substance these: On the 14th day of September, 1898, Elizabeth Thomsen had on deposit in two accounts with the defendant bank the sum of $1,697.34. On that day, accompanied by Louisa H. Wilson, she called at the bank of defendant, surrendered her bank books, and closed those particular accounts by withdrawing all of the money therein standing to her credit. Thereupon, and in the presence and hearing of the said Louisa H. Wilson, she opened two new accounts with the bank which, at the request of Mrs. Thomsen, were entered upon the books of the bank in the name of "Elizabeth Thomsen or Louisa H. Wilson." The sum of $1,597.34 was placed to the credit of one of these accounts, and the sum of $100 to the credit of the other. Two new bank books in the name of "Elizabeth Thomsen or Louisa H. Wilson" were issued and delivered into the personal possession of Mrs. Thomsen. Mrs. Wilson, it seems, went to the bank on this occasion at the request of Mrs. Thomsen. Mrs. Thomsen had previously said that she had some money in the bank, and that if anything happened to her she wanted the money to go to Mrs. Wilson. After withdrawing the money from the old accounts, and before establishing the new accounts, Mrs. Thomsen said to the bank clerk who waited upon her that she desired to sign over to Mrs. Wilson whatever money she (Mrs. Thomsen) had in the old accounts, so that if anything happened to her Mrs. Wilson "could take the passbooks and go to the bank and draw the money." The clerk, in reply to Mrs. Thomsen, clearly indicated that a deposit of the money in the joint name of the two women, and upon the condition stated, would be accepted by the bank, and thereupon the accounts were opened with the bank and entered upon its books in the form hereinbefore stated. Upon leaving the bank, Hrs. Thomsen gave the passbooks to Mrs. Wilson, but later in the day, at the home of Mrs. Thomsen, the books were given into the possession of Mrs. Thomsen, who placed them in a trunk.

On July 16, 1899, Mrs. Thomsen died intestate. At the time of her death, as the record affirmatively shows, she had no living relations or next kin in the state of California, or elsewhere, and on the 31st day of July, 1889 letters of administration upon her estate were duly issued to the plaintiff herein. The bank books in question were in the possession of Mrs. Thomsen at the time of her death, and they were taken from her effects on the morning of her death by the husband of Mrs. Wilson. On July 17, 1899, Mrs. Wilson appeared at the bank and, presenting the bank books, demanded payment to her of the money entered therein. The bank complied with the demand upon the surrender of the books by paying to Mrs. Wilson the full sum of the deposits which, together with the accrued interest, totaled the sum of $1,729.99. Some time during the day of July 17, 1899, there was served upon the defendant's secretary a notice from the public administrator, the plaintiff herein, not to make payment of these particular deposits to any one but himself. The plaintiff, however, at that time had not been appointed the administrator of the estate of Mrs. Thomsen, and whether the notice which it was claimed was served upon the bank was served prior to or after the money was paid to Mrs. Wilson is not entirely clear. Incidentally it appears that Mrs. Thomsen, on April 6, 1899, and without the knowledge of Mrs. Wilson drew against the larger account in the sum of $39.91.

The trial court found that Mrs. Thomsen was at all times the individual owner of the money; that the passbooks in question had been originally delivered to Mrs. Thomsen, and were at all times thereafter, and up to the time of her death, in her exclusive possession; that the deposit of the money was made by Mrs. Thomsen alone; that Mrs. Thomsen did not establish a trust in favor of Mrs. Wilson; that said money was not deposited with defendant upon trust to pay the same to Mrs. Wilson; that Mrs.Wilson never had any interest whatever in the money; that Mrs. Thomsen did not at any time make an assignment of her interest in the money to Mrs. Wilson; that the defendant never had any agreement with Louisa H. Wilson in relation to the said passbooks or said money so deposited; and that the defendant, prior to paying the money to Mrs Wilson, was notified by the plaintiff that the money belonged to the estate of Mrs. Thomsen, and to pay said money to no one but plaintiff. However, the trial court did find as facts: (1) That the passbooks in question were indorsed and inscribed "Elizabeth Thomsen or Louisa H. Wilson, in account with the German Savings & Loan Society"; (2) that Louisa H. Wilson, on July 17, 1899, presented the said passbooks to defendant, and demanded payment to her of the money entered and credited therein, and that the same ($1,729.99) was then paid to her by the defendant; (3) that at the time of the opening of the accounts and the delivery of the passbooks to said Elizabeth Thomsen she instructed the defendant bank to pay, and defendant agreed with her to pay, the money then deposited by her, and any other money which she might deposit with the defendant to the credit of those particular accounts, to her or to Louisa H. Wilson, upon demand of either, accompanied by the passbooks.

As a conclusion of law from those findings of fact, the trial court held that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the sum of $1,729.99, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 17th day of July, 1899. Judgment was entered accordingly for the sum of $2,392.33.

In support of this appeal, counsel for defendant insists that a judgment upon the pleaded and proven facts should have been rendered for the defendant upon any one of the following grounds: (1) "Mrs. Thomsen in her lifetime made a legal and valid gift to Mrs. Wilson of whatever interest she had in the moneys on deposit." (2) "If Mrs. Thomsen had any interest in the money deposited (as distinguished from having a claim or credit against the bank) she created a trust in favor of Mrs. Wilson, the terms of which were that the bank should pay to Mrs. Wilson alone upon the death of Mrs. Thomsen." (3) "The relation between the bank and Mrs. Thomsen and Mrs. Wilson was that of debtor and creditor. By the terms of the contract, the debt was made payable to either. Payment to one was satisfaction as to both." The sum and substance of defendant's several contentions may be reduced to the one general proposition that the essential findings of fact are in direct conflict with the uncontradicted and undisputed evidence adduced at the trial.

[1] The claim of the defendant that "Mrs. Thomsen in her lifetime made a legal and valid gift to Mrs. Wilson of * * * the moneys on deposit" does not require extended consideration. The evidence, upon that phase of the case, not only warrants, but fully supports, the finding of the trial court that Mrs. Thomsen did not make or intend to make an immediate gift of the money in controversy to Mrs. Wilson. The mere form of the deposit was not, in and of itself, evidence of a completed gift; and the fact that Mrs. Thomsen at all times retained exclusive possession of the bank books, as well as the right to withdraw at will all or any portion of the money credited therein, is inconsistent with the theory that she made or intended to make a present and perfected gift to Mrs. Wilson. "Although the deposit was in the names of either, and either could draw therefrom as between themselves and the bank, this does not show a gift. * * *" (Robinson v. Mutual Sav. Bank, 7 Cal. App. 642, 95 Pac. 533); and a finding in this case that a gift had been fully created and executed during the lifetime of Mrs. Thomsen would have been clearly contrary to the evidence, and opposed to the rule of law in such cases established in this state. Dennigan v. Hib. Savings & Loan Soc., 127 Cal. 138, 59 Pac. 389; Dennigan v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 127 Cal. 142, 59 Pac. 390, 78 Am. St. Rep. 35; Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 532, 98 Pac. 269.

[2] It is the contention of the plaintiff that the transaction cannot be considered or treated as an executed trust, because Mrs. Thomsen never made a formal declaration of trust, or parted with control of the property claimed to be the subject of the trust. It is urged further that the defendant never formally accepted the trust. It is true that Mrs. Thomsen did not say, in so many words, that it was her purpose to deposit the money with the defendant bank in trust for Mrs. Wilson. It was not necessary, however, to the creation of a trust that Mrs. Thomsen should have technically and precisely declared her purpose and intent to create a trust, or that the bank, in order to be charged with the duties and responsibilities of a trustee, should indicate its willingness to undertake the trust by any formal words of acceptance; and the circumstance that Mrs. Thomsen retained the bank books in her possession, with power to withdraw the whole or any part of the deposits, would not affect the validity of the trust, if one in fact was created. Booth v. Oak. Bank of Sav., 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370; Carr v. Carr, 115 Pac. 261.

[3, 4] The subject of the trust was personal property, and a voluntary trust in personal property may be created, as to the trustor, beneficiary, and trustee by any words or acts of the trustor and trustee which indicate with reasonable certainty (1) an intention on the part of the trustor to create a trust; (2) the subject, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust; and (3) the acceptance of the trust by the trustee. Civ. Code, §§ 2221, 2222. And all of the declarations of a trustor, made to the trustee in relation to the trust before its acceptance, save and except where the trust is declared in writing, are deemed part of the declaration of trust. Civ. Code, § 2254.

[5] The facts and circumstances of the whole case, in our opinion, are not only not inconsistent with, but fully sustain, the defendant's theory and pleaded defense that the transaction, in its entirety, was intended by all of the parties thereto to be, and was in legal effect, a perfected trust. While, as heretofore indicated, the facts of the case would not have supported a finding that the transaction in question created, or was intended to create, either a gift inter vivos or causa mortis (Civ. Code, §§ 1146, 1147, 1149), yet we think, following the doctrine announced in Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, supra, that the form in which the account in each instance was opened and entered upon the books of the bank, coupled with all that was said and done by all of the parties to the transaction before and at the time the deposits were made, indicated with reasonable certainty the purpose and intent of Mrs. Thomsen to be that upon her death Mrs. Wilson, as the survivor, should have and take the money in question, or so much thereof as might then be remaining to the credit of each account.

In brief, it is our opinion that the evidence, which was entirely free from conflict, not only warranted, but required, a finding by the trial court that Mrs. Thomsen intended to create, and, by her acts and declarations in conjunction with the acceptance by the defendant did in fact create, a voluntary trust in the money in question, with Mrs. Wilson as the beneficiary and the defendant as the trustee, and that upon the death of said Elizabeth Thomsen the said Louisa H. Wilson became entitled to have and receive from the defendant the said money.

The two cases of Dennigan v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society and Dennigan v. S. F. Savings Union, supra, are strongly relied upon by the plaintiff to support the judgment in his favor. It is claimed that these cases not only dispose of the defendant's contention with regard to the gift feature of the case, but completely dissipate the claim that the transaction was in legal effect a trust. Those cases, upon the law and the facts, are readily distinguishable, upon the question of the creation of a trust, from the case at bar. As was said in a very recent case, the facts of which were not essentially different from the present case: "Under our theory of the case at bar, it is obvious that these cases are not in point. There are no acts or language connected with the transactions which would furnish the slightest indication of an intention on the part of Ellen Dennigan to create out of the deposits a trust, either in favor of herself and husband, or in favor of her husband alone. While, as seen, no certain form of words is required in the creation of a trust, there must nevertheless be some words—it matters not what they are—which indicate with reasonable certainty a purpose to create a trust. Nor is there anything decided in the Dennigan Cases at cross-purposes with the proposition that a valid trust in money may be created, with the power reserved by the trustor to practically revoke it by drawing on the trust fund until it is completely exhausted, before the beneficiary can enjoy the fruits thereof." Carr v. Carr, supra.

Much stress is placed by counsel for the plaintiff upon the fact that the defendant was notified not to pay the money to Mrs. Wilson. The question of notice, in the view we have taken of the case, is now of no consequence. If the defendant was, as we think the evidence clearly shows, a trustee of the fund in question, it was bound to follow the directions of the trustor and fulfill the purposes of the trust as declared at its creation (Civ. Code, 2258), and the defendant could not be relieved of, nor restricted in the performance of, its obligation by a notice from a disinterested third person.

It follows from what has been said that the findings of the trial court are contrary to the evidence, in so far as it is found to be a fact that a trust was not created in the money in question, and that Louisa H. Wilson did not have any interest therein. This conclusion necessitates a reversal of the judgment and the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, and makes it unnecessary for us to discuss or decide the remaining question as to whether or not the relation between the bank and the other parties to the transaction was that of debtor and creditor, and created a contract, by the terms of which a payment of the debt to either Mrs. Thomsen or Mrs. Wilson would have been a satisfaction of the debt as to both.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

McCOLGAN v. PIERCY. (Civ. 874.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 26, 1911.)

1. RECORDS (§ 17*)—LOST RECORDS—RESTORATION.

Where the records of an action were lost and destroyed in a conflagration, an order restoring the record merely restores the papers as filed, and does not affect their operation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Records, Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 60*)—PROSECUTION—DELAY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 581a provides, among other things, that an action must be dismissed by the court on its own motion, or on motion of any party interested, if summons be not served and return made thereon, or appearance be made by defendant within three years after the commencement of the action. Held that, where a complaint was filed and summons issued July 13, 1904, and an affidavit of personal service filed July 16th following, after which no further action was taken until December 7, 1909, when an order was made for the restoration of the records which had been destroyed in a conflagration, and defendant then filed an affidavit, denying that he had ever been served with summons, or had ever appeared in the action, defendant's motion for dismissal was properly granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Dce. Dig. § 60.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Emma C. McColgan against Andrew J. Piercy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Garoutte and E. J. Talbott, for appellant. J. E. Alexander, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order dismissing an action, made after hearing upon notice and motion of defendant.

The original records in the action were destroyed in the conflagration of April, 1906. No action whatever was thereafter taken in the action until December 7, 1909, when plaintiff filed a petition for the restoration of the records. Defendant thereupon gave notice of a motion for a dismissal of the action, as well as for a denial of the petition for a restoration of the records, upon grounds stated in the notice, involving laches in the plaintiff in failing to serve summons in the action, or to take any steps to bring the action to trial, and in failing to take steps to restore the records for nearly four years, and for the further reason that all rights of plaintiff were barred by the provisions of section 581a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The court granted the motion to restore the records, as prayed for by plaintiff, but dismissed the action. The order dismissing the action is general, and does not state the particular grounds upon which it is based. Taking the evidence contained in the record and in the affidavits most favorable to the respondent as true, which we are obliged to do in support of the order of the court, the order is amply supported.

The restored record consists of: (1) The complaint, on promissory notes, for $500, filed July 13, 1904; (2) summons issued on same day; and (3) affidavit of personal service thereof, filed July 16, 1904, and nothing else.

[1] The defendant made affidavit that he had never been served with summons, and had never appeared in said action. The restored record contains a return of personal service, and the person making such return also filed an affidavit, used on the motion, showing such service of summons on defendant. But these matters simply presented a conflict with the affidavit of defendant that no service had ever been made, which we must assume the court determined in favor of respondent. The order restoring the record does not determine nor purport to determine the fact of service, but simply restores to the record the return as filed.

[2] The affidavit of defendant also sets out that he never appeared in said action, and the restored record is in full harmony with his affidavit on this point. Section 581a provides, among other things, that an action must be dismissed by the court upon its own motion, or upon motion of any party interested, if summons be not served and return made thereon, or appearance be made by defendant, within three years after the commencement of the action. There was, as we have already shown, evidence to support the conclusion that the summons had never been served, and defendant had never appeared in the action, though it had been commenced more than five years before the motion for a dismissal was made. Upon such facts being established, it was not only the right, but the plain duty, of the court to dismiss the action. Sharpstein v. Eells, 132 Cal. 507, 64 Pac. 1080, and cases there cited; section 581a, Code Civ. Proc.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SAMPO. (Cr. 160.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 22, 1911.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 129*)—INFORMATION—MALICE.

An information, alleging that defendants did willfully, etc., and of malice aforethought, kill and murder deceased, a human being, was substantially in the language of the statute and was not defective for failure to allege that defendants of "their" malice aforethought did kill and murder, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 197, 198; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

2. JURY (§ 112*)—QUALIFICATION OF JURORS—IMPLIED BIAS—ORDER OF CHALLENGE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 198, declares that one of the qualifications of jurors shall be assessment on the last assessment roll on property belonging to him. Pen. Code, § 1087, provides that challenges for cause must be taken in the following order: To the panel; to an individual juror, for general disqualification; to an individual juror for an implied bias; and lastly for actual bias. Held, that section 1087, in so far as it provided the order for challenges, was mandatory, and hence, where a challenge for implied bias had been overruled, defendant could not then examine the juror, and on his admitting that he had not been assessed on the last assessment roll, challenge him for general disqualification; such objection being waived by prior challenge for implied bias.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 174*)—EVIDENCE—SUBSEQUENT DECLARATIONS.

Evidence that, within less than half an hour after defendant had inflicted the blows which caused decedent's death, he said to his brother: "Come on, Brother, we might as well kill them all; we are not scared"—was admissible as indicating defendant's frame of mind immediately after the difficulty and as implying that defendant had either killed or attempted to kill some other person.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 404*) — EVIDENCE—INSTRUMENT USED.

The state claimed that defendant killed deceased by striking him on the head with a rock. A physician testified that the wound was inflicted by a blunt instrument and could have been caused by a rock identified by a witness as found by her on the morning following the night of the difficulty at the spot where it occurred, on which rock she testified there were then fresh blood spots. Held, that the rock was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 891; Dec. Dig. § 404.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 476*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—PHYSICIANS.

It was proper to permit physicians to testify that the wound from which deceased died could have been inflicted by means of a rock offered in evidence by which the state claimed defendant struck deceased.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1062; Dec. Dig. § 476.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 406*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS OF ACCUSED.

Evidence that defendant, immediately after his arrest, admitted that he had engaged in a fight, was not in the nature of a confession, but was admissible as an admission of his connection with the difficulty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 894; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 260*)—TRIAL—VIEW BY JURY—DISCRETION.

Where a homicide resulted from a difficulty in a public street, refusal of the court to order that the jury be taken to view the scene of the difficulty, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 610, was not an abuse of discretion.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—REQUEST TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

Refusal of a request to charge is not error, where the court's charge fully covered every vital phase of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; F. V. Wood, Judge.

Giacomo Sampo was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Spagnoli & Spagnoli, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

HART, J. The defendant and one Stefano Conte were jointly charged by information with the crime of murder. They were awarded separate trials, and the defendant, having been tried on said information, was found guilty by the jury of murder of the second degree. The cause is brought to this court by an appeal from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

No question is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, but it is claimed by the defendant for a reversal: (1) That the information does not correctly state the crime of murder and that, therefore, the demurrer thereto should have been sustained; (2) that the court erred in its rulings in disallowing challenges to certain jurors; (3) that certain rulings of the court involving the question of the admissibility of certain evidence were erroneous; and (4) that the rejection of certain instructions proposed by the defendant constituted serious and prejudicial error.

The homicide, or rather the difficulty which resulted in the death of the deceased a few hours thereafter, occurred in Drytown, Amador county, on the 19th day of November, 1910. The facts as disclosed by the evidence may thus be stated:

The deceased, Stefano Pistone, a mere boy, of about the age of 19 years, was employed as a laborer in one of the mines situated near Drytown. He had been in Amador county for about one year, having gone directly to said county from Italy, his native country. A family by the name of Cavallero, consisting of the husband, wife, and young daughter, Eva by name, and aged about 15 years, resided in Drytown, where they conducted a boarding house. On the afternoon of the 19th day of November, 1910, the deceased went to Drytown and stopped at Cavallero's boarding house. At the boarding house, at the time of Pistone's arrival there, were the defendant, his codefendant, Conte, and a brother of the defendant. Nothing of importance occurred between the parties named during the afternoon, nor until after the evening meal at the boarding house had been served and partaken of by all said parties. It appears that, after dinner had been served, a young man who was then stopping at the house, picked up and proceeded to play an old accordion, whereupon it was suggested that "they have a dance." This suggestion seemed agreeable, and the brother of defendant started to dance with the young daughter of the Cavalleros. Others of the party took a turn at dancing with the young lady, and finally the deceased danced with her. For some reason, not made to appear very clear by the evidence, when the deceased and the young lady were engaged in dancing together, the defendant's brother, George Sampo, became very much incensed and began using profane and abusive language, "calling everybody names," as Eva Cavallero testified, and then attempted to strike the deceased. The latter thereupon ceased dancing, and, saying that he did not want to fight, left the house through the back door. About five minutes thereafter, the defendant and his codefendant, Conte, departed from the house through the front door. These circumstances occurred somewhere in the neighborhood of 10 o'clock at night. At about that hour, a Mrs. Callandri, who, with her husband, resided in their home, situated a distance of about 60 feet from the Cavallero boarding house, heard loud noises on the street in front of and near her home. She had retired for the night, but, upon hearing the noises, arose from her bed and went out on the porch for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of the noises which had attracted her attention. It was, as she testified, a "bright, moonlight night," and when she reached the porch she observed the defendant, the deceased, and Conte in the street directly in front of her house and about 40 feet therefrom. She was personally acquainted with the defendant and the deceased, but knew Conte only by sight. The defendant was engaged in striking the deceased on the head, while Conte was back of the latter and holding him. The deceased was all the time loudly exclaiming: "Please let me alone! I have nothing with you! Don't hit me! Let me alone, please!" The defendant did not cease beating the deceased, saying that he would kill him, until one Burdisso made his appearance on the scene and made defendant drop a large rock with which he was striking deceased. While the defendant was striking Pistone, the latter was in a stooping position, being held, as we have seen, by Conte. Burdisso first took hold of Pistone for the purpose of assisting him to the hotel, but the defendant again picked up the rock and made demonstrations indicating an intention of renewing the attack, when Burdisso again made him drop the rock to the ground and then, taking defendant by the arm, escorted him into the boarding house. The deceased unsteadily walked to the fence leading from Callandri's house to Cavallero's, and, holding on to the fence, walked to the latter place, where he immediately went to bed and died early on the following morning.

Mrs. Callandri's husband, having also been attracted to the porch of their house by the noise, witnessed and heard all that the first named saw and heard of the difficulty, and corroborated his wife's testimony.

On the morning following the trouble as thus described Mrs. Callandri went to the spot where the trouble occurred, and there she found a large rock upon which, according to her positive statement, there were blood stains which were yet fresh.

Drs. Endicott and Griffin made a thorough autoptical examination of the body of the deceased, and the two physicians concurred in saying that all the vital organs of the deceased, with the exception of the brain, were in a normal or healthy condition. They, however, found a linear or straight fracture of the skull back of the right ear, and a large blood clot, approximately of the size of an ordinary baseball, pressing on the right side of the brain. As is manifestly true, they testified that the fracture caused the blood clot, and the pressure of the latter on the brain caused the death of Pistone. They gave it as their opinion that the fracture was produced by a blunt instrument of some character and could have been caused by means of the rock which Mrs. Callandri found lying on the spot where the affray occurred; said rock having been kept by the authorities and introduced in evidence.

The defense attempted to prove an alibi, and introduced some proof to that end; but it is very clear that this contention was erected and attempted to be sustained upon a very frail foundation. Assuming that the witnesses introduced by the people told the truth (and this court must presume that they did, since the jury must have believed them), the evidence so advanced amply sustains the verdict. Indeed, the evidence presented by the people discloses, in our judgment, a deliberate, cold-blooded murder—in truth, the destruction of the life of a mere boy under circumstances devoid of the slightest semblance of justification or excuse. If the testimony produced by the people is believable (and the jury must have believed it or they would have acquitted the accused), there was but one verdict which should have been returned, viz., murder of the first degree, and the defendant may, indeed, regard himself as having been extremely fortunate in having his fate submitted to a jury that could be persuaded, in the face of what appears to be conclusive evidence of his guilt, to believe that punishment less than the extreme penalty prescribed for the wanton and malicious taking of human life would afford adequate expiation for his diabolical act.

We shall now proceed to a consideration of the points made by defendant on this appeal in the order in which his counsel have presented them in their brief.

[1] 1. There is no merit in the claim that the information does not properly describe the crime of murder, and the demurrer thereto was, therefore, properly disallowed.

It is alleged that the defendants "* * * did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously and of malice aforethought kill and murder one Stefano Pistone, a human being," etc. The contention is that the charging part of said pleading is defective as descriptive of the crime of murder against the accused, in that it does not allege that the said defendants "did then and there * * * of their malice aforethought kill and murder," etc.; that is, that the information fails to charge that the defendants committed the crime sought to be charged with malice. The objection is addressed to form rather than to substance, and, if at all tenable, should have been raised by a special demurrer. The information is, however, substantially in the language of the statute, and is, therefore, sufficient. It is very plain that, merely because of charging the act of killing to have been done "of malice aforethought," without specifically declaring the "malice" thus charged to have been the "malice" of the accused, the information could not, by any possible, torturing of language, be construed to mean that the "malice" so alleged was that of some person or persons not charged to have committed the act. And such would be the result of the construction which appellant gives the information in the respect referred to.

[2] 2. Many objections are urged against the rulings of the court in disallowing challenges interposed by the defendant for various causes; but the only ruling in this regard which, on first blush, appears to menace the judgment and order and to which, therefore, special attention is merited, involves the action of the court in disallowing the challenge to Juror Coffman upon the ground that he was deficient in one of the general qualifications which section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a person must possess to render him competent to serve as a juror.

It appears that, after an exhaustive examination of Juror Hughes upon the question whether he was biased, a challenge was interposed by defendant to said juror on the ground of implied bias and denied by the court. Thereafter counsel for defendant asked the juror whether he was "assessed on the last assessment roll of the county on property belonging to him," and, receiving a negative reply, challenged him on that ground. The court disallowed the challenge on the ground that said challenge was not made in the order prescribed by section 1087 of the Penal Code; a challenge for implied bias having, as seen, been previously interposed and denied. The defendant used a peremptory challenge on said juror and, before the completion of the jury, had used all the peremptory challenges allowed by law, in addition to the extra one allowed him by the court; the court having announced to counsel for defendant that it would give or accord to the defendant an extra peremptory challenge—that is, it would allow the defendant 21 peremptory challenges in lieu of 20, the number to which a defendant in a capital case is entitled under the law.

Subsequently to the examination of Juror Hughes, counsel for defendant examined Juror Coffman at great length, and finally interposed a challenge to said juror upon the ground of actual bias; the same having been overruled by the court. Thereafter, counsel for defendant, by the further questioning of Coffman, developed the fact that he, too, was disqualified because of not being assessed "on the last assessment roll of the county on property belonging to him," and challenged the juror on that ground. The court disallowed the challenge, and, in doing so, said: "It seems to me the counsel waived it when he made the challenge on the ground of actual bias. Now, I cannot see the use in consuming half an hour of time in examining into other matters, when the matter can be easily ascertained in the first place, whether the juror is on the last assessment roll. The Code provides specifically that challenges must be taken in a certain order." To which counsel for defendant replied: "* * * But I will say in regard to the matter of this challenge, we do not intend to challenge anybody upon the jury list because they do not possess these qualifications under section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure, unless we find we do not want that juror on this jury. If we find out we do not want him, and can get him off on no other ground, we are going to get him off on this ground, just as we challenged him."

We think the court was right in holding that the defendant had, under the circumstances shown by the foregoing statement, waived his right to challenge the juror on the ground that he was not assessed on the assessment roll, etc. Section 1087 of the Penal Code reads as follows: "The challenges of either party for cause need not all be taken at once, but they must be taken separately, in the following order: (1) To the panel; (2) to an individual juror, for a general disqualification; (3) to an individual juror, for an implied bias; (4) to an individual juror, for an actual bias."

The foregoing section was, of course, intended to achieve some purpose, and if it can be given effect without impinging upon any of the vital rights of parties to actions, which are tried by a jury, it is manifestly the duty of the courts to so construe and apply it as that it may be enforced in all proper cases.

It is very clear that the consideration which prompted the Legislature to provide for the challenging of a person drawn as a juror for a general disqualification first in the order in which said section of the Penal Code declares that challenges to an individual juror shall be taken was to save time and expense in the trial of cases by jury; it being a matter of common notoriety that the examination of jurors upon the question whether they entertain bias, actual or implied, for or against either party or with reference to the case, ordinarily consumes a vast amount of time. The design of the section was, therefore, to require litigants, in the matter of impaneling juries, to ascertain, first of all, whether persons drawn into the jury box possess the general qualifications prescribed by section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that, if grounds exist therefor, to challenge and thus get rid of such persons without taking up the time of the court, at great expense to the litigants, or to the county, if the case is one that involves the prosecution of a criminal charge, with a lengthy voir dire examination addressed to the question whether they do or do not entertain such personal opinions with regard to the case as would or would not prevent them from trying the issues of fact intelligently and with perfect fairness and impartiality.

The language of said section is, on its face, mandatory, and we think that, in so far as it can be made applicable to the provisions of section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure, without actually invading the substantial rights of the parties to the action, the order therein prescribed for taking challenges ought to be held to be, as unquestionably it was intended to be, imperative and to be invariably followed.

Section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a person is competent to serve as a juror if he be: "(1) A citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the state one year, and of the county or city and county, ninety days before being selected and returned; (2) in possession of his natural faculties, and of ordinary intelligence, and not decrepit; (3) possessed of sufficient knowledge of the English language; (4) assessed on the last assessment roll of the county, or city and county, on property belonging to him."

Section 199 of the same Code provides that "a person is not competent to act as a juror who does not possess the qualifications prescribed by the preceding section. * * *"

It will be observed that by section 198 of said Code there are prescribed two distinct classes of qualifications to render a person competent to serve as a juror, the one class resting on an entirely different reason or principle from the other, viz.: (1) Those qualifications which inhere in the mental capacity of a person to intelligently or at all discharge the duties of a juror and which are set forth in subdivisions 2 and 3 of said section; (2) those qualifications, prescribed by subdivisions 1 and 4, which, in and of themselves, do not affect the ability of a person to fairly, impartially and intelligently discharge such duties, but which were established by the Legislature upon a principle of policy. The causes of challenge for a general disqualification are, therefore, divided into two classes founded upon like distinction, and it is our view that the provisions of section 1087 of the Penal Code may and were intended to apply solely to causes of challenge based upon the want of the qualifications of the second class or those that are prescribed by subdivisions 1 and 4 of section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This conclusion is fortified, we think, by the following considerations: Where a person is deficient in any of those qualifications prescribed by subdivisions 1 and 4 of said section 198—i. e., not a citizen of the United States, of the required age, etc., or not "assessed on the last assessment roll of the county on property belonging to him"—the fact of such disqualification must be made to appear, if disclosed at all, by the prosecution of a special inquiry to that end on his voir dire examination. In other words, whether he is or is not shown to be incompetent to act as a juror for wanting in any of those qualifications prescribed by subdivisions 1 and 4 of said section of the Code of Civil Procedure depends entirely upon whether or not he is specifically questioned upon his voir dire with a view to the ascertainment of that fact. In the case, however, of a disqualification of a person for any of the reasons enumerated in subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 198 of said Code—that is, where the person is not "in possession of his natural faculties," or not "of ordinary intelligence," or not "possessed of sufficient knowledge of the English language" to understand the testimony or to comprehend the general nature and purpose of the proceedings, or, in short, not capable of appreciating in a general way the duties of a juror—the fact of such incompetency would readily be discovered on a very brief and general examination of the juror. If he were deficient in those respects, his manner of answering questions propounded to him on his voir dire, if, indeed, he could answer them at all, would at once develop his incompetency by reason of such deficiency. But where, at any time during the course of the voir dire examination, such incompetency is thus made satisfactorily to appear, it would undoubtedly be the imperative duty of the court, regardless of whether a formal challenge was interposed on that ground, to excuse such person from sitting on the jury, for, manifestly, to knowingly permit a person so disqualified to act in the capacity of a juror would, in practical effect, amount to a distinct denial to the parties to the action of a trial by a legal jury, since a trial by a jury composed either in whole or in part of persons wanting in the degree of intelligence prescribed by the statute would be no trial at all. And herein lies another ground of distinction between those qualifications prescribed by subdivisions 1 and 4 and those of subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure. To permit a person to sit on a jury who is wanting in the general qualifications prescribed by subdivisions 1 and 4 would not, like a want of those qualifications prescribed by the other subdivisions of said section, necessarily result in actual prejudice to the party objecting to him, for it cannot be laid down as an abstract proposition that actual prejudice to the rights of parties to an action would necessarily follow from permitting either an alien or one not of the required age or a nonresident of the county within the purview of subdivision 1 of section 198 or one not assessed on the "last assessment roll," etc., to serve as a juror. Abstractly speaking, there is no reason why one not a citizen or not of the prescribed age or not on the assessment roll, as required by the statute, should and would not make equally as fair and impartial and as intelligent a juror as one so qualified. Obviously, as before shown, this cannot be true in the case of a person incompetent because not possessing those qualifications affecting his intelligence.

In view of the distinction thus pointed out between the two classes of general qualifications essential to the competency of a person to serve as a juror, our conclusion is, as before declared, that the provisions of section 1087 are mandatory in their application to subdivisions 1 and 4 of section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but cannot apply to the other subdivisions of said last-mentioned section and were not intended to so apply. The result of this conclusion is (tô repeat) that, in impaneling a jury, it is the duty of the parties to an action, whether civil or criminal, to first inquire whether persons drawn into the jury box possess the qualifications prescribed by subdivisions 1 and 4 of section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, if found deficient in any thereof, to challenge them on that ground, and that, where they fail to pursue such course and first challenge a person, without success, on grounds involving particular causes of challenge, they then forfeit or waive their right, at the cost perhaps of the loss of a peremptory challenge, to challenge such person for wanting in those qualifications prescribed by those subdivisions of said section.

It may be argued that to hold section 1087 to be applicable to a part only of section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure involves a strained and unnatural construction of the first-named section. We do not think so. Section 1087 of the Penal Code was first enacted by the Legislature of 1851, and sections 198 and 199 of the Code of Civil Procedure by the Legislature of 1863. All three of those sections were re-enacted in substantially their present form of language by the Legislature of 1872. As previously declared, it must be assumed that, in the enactment of section 1087 of the Penal Code, the Legislature had in mind the accomplishment of some useful or beneficial purpose in the trial of jury cases, and we must further assume that the Legislature, when re-enacting the three sections at practically the same time, recognized and understood the proposition that said section could not, with reason, be made to apply to subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We must therefore assume that the section was intended to subserve that purpose only which it could with propriety and reason accomplish, and that, since it can with perfect propriety and the soundest reason apply to subdivisions 1 and 4 of the said section, such was the specific intention in and object of its enactment and re-enactment.

In the case at bar, it may be well to note, the defendant, apart from the consideration of the point under discussion in its legal aspect, has no cause for complaint. The court, it will be remembered, called the attention of his counsel to the provisions of section 1087 of the Penal Code when they challenged Juror Hughes for not being on the assessment roll and long prior to the challenging of Coffman on the same ground. They displayed their defiance of the mandates of that section and of the opinion of the court with reference thereto by refusing to first inquire into the general qualifications of the persons in the jury box, examined subsequently to the examination of Juror Hughes, and, furthermore, by declaring that they did not intend to challenge persons for general causes unless such persons proved unsatisfactory to the defense and they were unable to exclude them from the jury on other grounds. Thus, we say, it is clear that from every standpoint from which the proposition may be viewed, the approval by this court of the ruling complained of only brings to the defendant consequences for which his own attorneys are alone responsible.

[3] 3. Eva Cavallero was permitted to testify, over the objection of the defendant, that, within less than a half hour after he had inflicted the blows which caused the death of Pistone, the defendant said, addressing his brother: "Come on, Brother, we might as well kill them all; we are not scared." It is now claimed that the ruling allowing that testimony was erroneous and damaging to the accused. There was, as we have seen, testimony showing that George Sampo, the defendant's brother, became very angry for some reason when the deceased started to dance with Eva Cavallero, and that he angrily used very ugly language at that time. The theory of the prosecution was that a general row was started in the boarding house at that time, and that thereupon the deceased left the house by the back door, and that immediately thereafter the defendant and Conte left the house by the front door; that their purpose was to overtake the deceased and punish him for some fancied insult to the defendant's brother; and that they did overtake Pistone and administer to him the beating already described. The declaration imputed to the defendant did not, of course, amount to a confession of his guilt of the crime charged against him, but was merely a statement indicating that he was in an ugly frame of mind immediately after the infliction upon the deceased of the wound which caused the latter's death, and, furthermore, as perhaps implying, according as the jury might view the declaration, that the defendant had either killed or attempted to kill some other person. We think the testimony here objected to was proper.

[4] The court did not err in admitting in evidence as an exhibit in the people's case the rock to which we have hitherto referred as having been found by Mrs. Callandri, on the morning following the night of the difficulty, on the spot where the defendant administered the beating to Pistone. Burdisso declared that he saw defendant strike deceased with a rock, and Mrs. Callandri, as we have shown, testified that there were fresh blood spots on the rock, and in this she was corroborated by her husband. The rock was given into the hands of the officers shortly after it was picked up and was fully identified as the rock found and picked up by Mrs. Callandri. Moreover, the doctors testified that the wound inflicted upon Pistone's head appeared to have been produced by some blunt instrument and that it could have been caused by the use of the rock in question. Having been found at the very place where the beating occurred, with fresh blood stains thereon, and in view of the testimony of the physicians that the wound could have been made by means thereof, the rock itself constituted a pertinent circumstance, to be considered with the other evidence, in determining the question of the guilt of the accused.

[5] Nor was it error, it may be observed in this connection, to permit the physicians to testify that the wound could have been inflicted by means of said rock. The physicians were not asked by whom the wound was inflicted, nor whether the wound was caused by the use of the rock exhibited to them, but were simply asked whether, in their opinion, such a wound as the one they found on the head of the deceased could have been inflicted by means of the rock found by Mrs. Callandri. People v. Bowers, (Sup.) 18 Pac. 660; People v. Olsen, 1 Cal. App. 22, 81 Pac. 676. Opinions of medical doctors as to the means which might have been employed in producing wounds upon the human body are always receivable in evidence as those of experts upon that proposition, and we know of no principle to which the admission of such testimony is repugnant. The manner by which a wound is produced is as much within the range of subjects as to which opinions of experts may be given in evidence as is the proximate or approximate cause of death, and no one will dispute the competency, as evidence, of the opinion of a physician as to the direct or remote cause of one's death.

[6] It is next contended that the court erroneously allowed the witness Bona, a deputy constable, who arrested the defendant for the crime of which he was accused by the information herein, to give testimony of the reply the defendant made to the following question put to him by Bona, immediately after the arrest: "Giac, you fellows had a fight outside in the road there, too, didn't you?" The answer of the defendant to said question, and which it is claimed the court improperly allowed to be given in evidence, was: "I think we did." The objection to this testimony was that a proper foundation had not been laid for the introduction of proof of any declarations by the accused concerning the crime with which he is charged. The ruling was clearly correct. The statement proved by the witness was not a confession, but a mere admission, in the technical sense of the term, which might or might not be incriminatory in its effect, according to the other circumstances developed in the case, and it was therefore unnecessary to lay any foundation or to show that the statement was voluntary. The fact that he admitted having a "fight outside in the road," while a circumstance, where one is charged with actual, physical participation in the commission of the crime, tending to prove one of the essential elements of guilt—that is, that he was at the scene of the trouble when it occurred—did not constitute an acknowledgment of guilt, for he might have had a fight and still be guiltless of the particular crime with which he is charged or of any crime.

[7] We cannot sustain defendant's claim that the court's refusal to permit the jury to be taken to Drytown for the purpose of viewing the scene of the difficulty leading to Pistone's death is erroneous. The law vests in trial courts the discretion of allowing or disallowing a "view of the premises" or other physical objects relevant to the case which it is impracticable to bring into court, and whether, in any case, such discretion has been abused by a denial of a motion to permit such view, depends upon the circumstances upon which the order has been refused (section 610, Code Civ. Proc.); and the burden on appeal is upon the moving party to affirmatively show that such discretion has been abused. There is no showing in the record here indicating an abuse of discretion in the respect referred to, and we must therefore assume that the course of the court was justified. It may be remarked that the power vested in trial courts by section 610 of the Code of Civil Procedure is one that should be exercised, if at all, with great caution and circumspection, lest more harm than good will result to the parties by thus receiving evidence out of the courtroom or perhaps on a public street, as would have been the case here.

We are asked to review certain exceptions to the rulings of the court permitting the district attorney to ask the defendant's witnesses George Sampo and Stefano Conte certain questions on cross-examination. We have examined these assignments, but, as the answers to the questions so asked were, if anything, invariably favorable to the defendant and innocuous in form, there is no necessity for specially reviewing them.

4. The defendant does not contend that, so far as it goes, the charge of the court is amenable to just criticism. Indeed, an examination of the instructions given by the court to the jury will at once disclose that, as to them, there is no ground for complaint. But the defendant does challenge the correctness of the action of the court in refusing to allow a large number of instructions proposed by him; the claim being that he was thus deprived of a full exposition to the jury of the law covering all the features of the case as disclosed by the evidence. We shall not review in detail here the points thus made.

[8] It must be enough to say that the charge of the court fully covered every vital phase of the case, and that the principles contained in those of the rejected instructions that correctly stated the law pertinent to the important questions of fact developed by the evidence were embodied, in singularly clear language, in the court's charge.

We have given every point urged upon us by defendant the most critical consideration. and our conclusion is that the accused was accorded, as most certainly he had a right to expect, a perfectly fair and impartial trial.

For the reasons herein set out, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

PEOPLE v. MENDOZA. (Cr. 205.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 25, 1911.)

1. BURGLARY (§ 33*)—BUILDING—OWNERSHIP—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for burglary the ownership of the building is inadmissible except for identification.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-89; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

2. BURGLARY (§ 20*)—BUILDING—IDENTIFICATION—EVIDENCE.

Where an information for burglary charged that defendant entered a toolhouse situated at specified streets in the city of Los Angeles, such allegations sufficiently identified the building without an allegation of ownership, in the absence of proof that there was more than one such building so located.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 51-54; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

3. BURGLARY (41*)—BUILDING—OWNERSHIP.

In a prosecution for burglary of a toolhouse belonging to the city of Los Angeles, evidence of a waterworks foreman that as foreman he was engaged with others in constructing a water tank, and while so engaged for the purpose of storing the tools constructed the toolhouse out of materials furnished him by the city, sufficiently showed ownership of the toolhouse in the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. § 102; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

4. BURGLARY (§ 41*)—"NIGHTTIME."

Evidence that a building was entered by accused "in the evening some time after dark" was sufficient to establish burglary in the "nighttime" within Pen. Code, § 463, making burglary in the "nighttime" burglary in the first degree and defining "nighttime" as the period between sunset and sunrise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. § 98; Dec. Dig. § 41.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4808.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—PREJUDICE—PRODUCTION OF JOINT DEFENDANT FOR IDENTIFICATION.

Manner of production of the person jointly indicted with accused for identification was not prejudicial, where the court instructed that the production of such person for identification was not to be considered by the jury as evidence of anything.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3141; Dec Dig. § 1169.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Pasqual Mendoza was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Newmire & Morris, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was prosecuted under an information charging him with the crime of burglary, and upon trial was found guilty in the first degree of the offense charged. As grounds for reversal of the judgment he presents three assignments of error.

[1] The information charged defendant with entering a toolhouse of the city of Los Angeles situated at Lemoyne street and Marcom avenue in said city. At the request of defendant the court instructed the jury that in order to convict defendant it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove, among other things, that the house alleged to have been feloniously entered was the property of the city of Los Angeles as alleged in the information.

[2] The ownership of the building was immaterial, except for the purpose of affording a means of its identification. This was done by alleging it to be a toolhouse located at Lemoyne street and Marcom avenue in the city of Los Angeles. In the absence of proof that there was more than one such building so located, such description was sufficient, and fully apprised defendant of the house he was charged with feloniously entering; hence the allegation of ownership was surplusage. People v. Price, 143 Cal. 352, 77 Pac. 73; People v. Bitancourt, 74 Cal. 190, 15 Pac. 744; People v. White, 116 Cal. 17, 47 Pac. 771.

[3] Conceding, however, that by reason of the instruction given it was necessary to prove ownership in the city of Los Angeles, the uncontradicted testimony of witness Neisse was, we think, sufficient to establish such fact. His evidence was to the effect that he was foreman of the city waterworks and as such foreman was engaged with others working under him in constructing a water tank, and while so engaged in such capacity he, for the purpose of storing the tools used in the prosecution of the work in which he and others were engaged, constructed the toolhouse out of material furnished him by the city.

[4] The jury by its verdict found defendant guilty of burglary in the first degree. Appellant contends that there was no evidence tending to show that the offense was committed in the nighttime, as defined by section 3260 of the Political Code and section 463 of the Penal Code, according to which "nighttime" is the period between sunset and sunrise. The evidence, however, without contradiction, shows that the entry to the building was made "in the evening some time after dark." This was clearly sufficient to justify the conclusion of the jury that the offense was committed after sunset.

[5] It appears that one Ruiz, who was jointly charged with defendant in the commission of the crime, was during the trial brought into court and witness Neisse, the foreman who had charge of the toolhouse, was by the district attorney told to "look at this man here," referring to Ruiz, and asked if he had ever given him permission to go into the toolhouse and take the tools. Appellant contends that the production of Ruiz in this manner was misconduct on the part of the district attorney. No objection was made to the question, and we are unable to perceive in what possible manner the substantial rights of defendant could have been prejudiced by such act, particularly inasmuch as the court instructed the jury that the production of Ruiz for identification was not to be considered by them as evidence of anything.

The appeal is without merit, and the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PRIESTLEY. (Cr. 342.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 111*)—NEGATIVING EXCEPTIONS.

Pen. Code, § 281, provides that every person having a husband or wife living, who marries any other person, except in the cases specified in the next section, shall be guilty of bigamy. Section 282 declares that the preceding section shall not extend to any person by reason of any former marriage, whose husband or wife by such marriage has been absent for five successive years without being known to such person within that time to be living nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which has been pronounced void, annulled, or dissolved by a judge of a competent court. Held, that the exceptions contained in section 282 did not constitute a part of the definition of the crime defined by section 281, and hence it was not necessary that they be negatived in an information for bigamy under such section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 295–298; Dec. Dig. § 111;* Bigamy, Cent. Dig. § 23.]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 111*)—STATUTORY OFFENSE — EXCEPTIONS — NEGATION.

In a proceeding based on a penal statute, the subject of an exception in the enacting or prohibitory clause of the act must be excluded by averment in the indictment or information, but any proviso or qualification in a separate substantive clause need not be so negatived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 295–298; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

3. BIGAMY (§ 4*)—INFORMATION—FIRST MARRIAGE—DATE AND PLACE.

Where an information for bigamy alleged that accused at the time of the second marriage had a wife living, it was immaterial that it failed to allege the date or place of the first marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bigamy, Cent. Dig. §§ 19–29; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

4. BIGAMY (§ 4*)—INFORMATION—FIRST MARRIAGE—LEGALITY—KNOWLEDGE.

An information for bigamy was not defective for failure to charge that defendant knew that his alleged first wife was his lawful wife since a second marriage under an erroneous assumption that the first marriage was void or had been annulled or dissolved was no defense to a prosecution for bigamy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bigamy, Cent. Dig. §§ 19–29; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

5. BIGAMY (§ 4*)—INFORMATION—OTHER PERSON.

Pen. Code, § 281, provides that every person having a husband or wife living who marries any other person, except in the cases specified in the succeeding section, is guilty of bigamy. An information alleged that defendant on January 19, 1911, was the lawful husband of S. who was then alive, and that defendant on that day did feloniously marry M., the prior marriage between defendant and S. not having been dissolved, annulled, or pronounced void by a court of competent jurisdiction. Held, that such information sufficiently charged the second marriage to have been with a person other than defendant's first wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bigamy, Cent. Dig. §§ 19–29; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Alfred W. Priestley was informed against for bigamy. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the information, the People appeal. Reversed.

Attorney General Webb, for the People. F. Goodwin Williams, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the people from an order allowing defendant's demurrer to the information.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The information, which charged the defendant with the crime of bigamy, was as follows: "That the said Alfred W. Priestley, on or about the 19th day of January, A. D. 1911, * * * and before the filing of this information, was the lawful husband of one Susan Dunbar Priestley, * * * who was then and there alive, and the said Alfred W. Priestley, * * * to wit, on the 19th day of January, 1911, * * * did feloniously marry one Mabel Addie Cook, the said marriage between the said Susan Dunbar Priestley and the said Alfred W. Priestley * * * not having been dissolved, annulled, or pronounced void by a court of competent jurisdiction." To this information the defendant demurred on general grounds, and also specially upon the ground that the information does not show that the defendant married "any other person" other than his first wife; that the information does not directly charge that the former marriage of the defendant had not been annulled by a judgment of a competent court; that it does not allege that the former wife was not absent for five successive years without being known to the defendant within that time to be living. Other grounds specified in the demurrer are that the information does not allege the date nor the place of the first marriage, nor that the defendant knew that the "alleged first wife was his lawful wife"; nor, says the demurrer, "does the information allege a fact but a conclusion of law in alleging that the defendant was the lawful husband of one Susan Dunbar Priestley."

[1] Section 281 of the Penal Code reads as follows: "Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries any other person, except in the cases specified in the next section, is guilty of bigamy."

Section 282 of the same Code provides: "The last section does not extend—

"1. To any person by reason of any former marriage, whose husband or wife by such marriage has been absent for five successive years without being known to such person within that time to be living; nor,

"2. To any person by reason of any former marriage which has been pronounced void, annulled or dissolved by the judgment of a competent court."

It will be observed that the information does not negative the exception contained in subdivision 1 of section 282, i. e., that the defendant's wife has been absent for five successive years without being known to the defendant within that time to be living. If it be true that this exception is so incorporated into the language defining bigamy as to constitute a part of the description of the offense, then it should have been negatived, and the order of the court sustaining the demurrer was correct. The exceptions to section 281, however, are found in a subsequent and separate section, and neither of them is so related to the previous section as to constitute a part of the definition of the crime.

[2] In a proceeding based upon a penal statute, say the elementary works on pleading, the subject of an exception in the enacting or prohibitory clause of the act must in the charging paper be excluded by averment, but of any proviso or qualification in a separate substantive clause the information or indictment need take no notice. Gould's Common Law Pleading, p. 172; Commonwealth v. Jennings, 121 Mass. 47, 23 Am. Rep. 249. Thus, in this state an information for rape must aver that the act was accomplished with a female "not the wife" of the defendant, because such allegation is a part of the definition of the crime. People v. Miles, 9 Cal. App. 312, 101 Pac. 525. On the other hand, it has been held in Hart v. Cleis, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 41, that in an action for a penalty under a section which prohibited the exportation of slaves, "except as hereinafter provided," the plaintiff need not negative the proviso of a succeeding section which allowed persons traveling through or removing from the state to take their slaves with them.

In Massachusetts, New York, Vermont, and Ohio the statute on bigamy is like our own in that the portion defining the crime is followed by other sections enumerating certain exceptions. In those states it is held that the subject of the exceptions is not a part of the enacting clause, but that the exceptions constitute matters of excuse or defense.

In Fleming v. People, 27 N. Y. 329, the statute declared that every person having a wife living who shall marry any other person, "except in cases specified in the next section," shall be adjudged guilty of bigamy. The next section embraces six classes of persons and cases to which the preceding section did not extend, one of which was where the former spouse shall have been absent for five years without being known to the party accused within that time to be living; another case was where the accused and his former wife had been divorced. The court held that in matters of pleading as well as of proof it was unnecessary to negative the exceptions found in the second section. At page 335 of the opinion, the court, basing its statement upon Chitty's Criminal Law, says: "It is not necessary to allege that the defendant is not within the benefit of the provisos of the statute, though the purview should expressly notice them, as by saying that none shall do the act prohibited except in the cases hereinafter excepted. This rule is precisely applicable to this statute, and so are the cases." The court then quotes from a number of authorities.

In the case of Commonwealth v. Jennings, 121 Mass. 47, 23 Am. Rep. 249, the court passed on this question. The statute there considered made every marriage during the life of the first spouse a crime, but provided that the statute should not apply to certain cases enumerated in another section. The court said: "The offense of polygamy is fully defined by Gen. St. c. 165, § 4, as consisting in the defendant's, while having a prior husband or wife living, marrying or continuing to cohabit with another person in this state. The words 'except in the cases enumerated in the following section' are not so incorporated with the enacting clause that the one cannot be read without the other, but are inclosed in a parenthesis, inserted after completing the enumeration of the elements necessary to constitute the crime, in the midst of the conclusion which declares its denomination. That the former husband or wife has been absent for seven years and unheard from is a matter of defense or excuse rather than a limit of the definition of the crime."

So in the case of Stanglein v. State, 17 Ohio St. 453, the failure of an indictment for bigamy to allege that "the former wife had not been continually and willfully absent for the space of five years together and unheard from next before the time of the second marriage charged in the indictment," was held no ground for arresting judgment, since such fact is a matter of defense to be proved by the accused.

In the case of State v. Abbey, 29 Vt. 60, 67 Am. Dec. 754, the indictment was for the crime of bigamy, and alleged simply a second marriage by the defendant while his former wife was still alive. The section defining the offense was followed by another which contained a proviso that the statute should not extend to certain specified cases. It was held that the indictment was not bad for omitting to negative the exceptions in the statute, it having averred both marriages and set forth that the first wife was living when the second marriage took place, the court observing, after discussing the question at length and citing many authorities from various jurisdictions: "The fifth section of the act on which this indictment is drawn contains the enacting clause, in which the exceptions are made of those cases which are specified in the sixth section. The cases excepted do not define or qualify the offense created by the enacting clause. If the facts are alleged in the indictment, and proved at the trial, that the respondent had a former husband or wife living, and married another person, * * * the offense is fully made out. * * * If in fact the former husband or wife of the respondent had been continually beyond the seas, or out of the state for seven years together, and the respondent had married again, not knowing the other to be living within that time, or if the respondent had been divorced, or the marriage had been declared null and void by the sentence of a court, or if the former marriage was within the age of consent and not afterward assented to, those facts should be relied upon and proved by the respondent on his defense." The views expressed in the Vermont case are strongly approved in Ex parte Hornef, 154 Cal. 355, 97 Pac. 891. See, also, State v. Williams, 20 Iowa, 98; Barber v. State, 50 Md. 170; 3 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 324.

[3] There is no merit in the respondent's contention that the information is defective in not alleging the date or place of the first marriage. It is immaterial when or where the first marriage took place if the accused, at the time of the second marriage, had a wife living. In People v. Giesea, 61 Cal. 53, 93 Am. Dec. 257, it is held that an allegation of the place of the first marriage is unnecessary. It has also been held expressly in a number of cases that it is unnecessary in a charge of bigamy to allege at what particular date the first marriage occurred. People v. Perriman, 72 Mich. 184, 40 N. W. 425; Faustre v. Commonwealth, 92 Ky. 34, 17 S. W. 189; State v. Armington, 25 Minn. 34; Hutchins v. State, 28 Ind. 34; State v. Bray, 35 N. C. 289. In Hutchins v. State, supra, it is said: "As the first marriage is not criminal, but its existence a condition which makes the second marriage a crime, it is of itself a fact, and there is no substantial reason why the averment of it should ever have been required except in general terms." So in the case of State v. Hughes, 35 Kan. 626, 12 Pac. 28, 57 Am. Rep. 195, the court, commenting upon an objection like the one here, said: "The offense as defined by the statute consists in marrying a second time while the husband or wife of defendant is still living. That the accused had a wife living at the time he contracted the second marriage is an essential allegation which should be stated with precision. * * * It is enough to allege and show that the marriage relation had been entered into and existed between the accused and his first wife at the time of the second marriage."

[4] The respondent also urges that the "information does not charge that the defendant knew that the alleged first wife was his lawful wife." This objection is hardly worthy of notice. A second marriage under an erroneous assumption that the first marriage was void, or had been annulled or dissolved, is not even a defense to the charge; much less need it be alleged in the information. People v. Hartman, 130 Cal. 487, 62 Pac. 823.

The respondent also urges the point that the information does not charge directly that the former marriage of defendant had not been pronounced void by a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, but what we have already said disposes of this contention.

[5] The point that the information does not follow the language of section 281 of the Penal Code, in that it does not allege that the defendant married "another person" other than his first wife, is answered by referring to section 950, subd. 2, and section 958, Penal Code, and to the information itself.

The order appealed from is reversed.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1020*)—APPEAL—JURISDICTION—ORDER QUASHING INFORMATION.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4, providing that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all criminal cases where a judgment of death has been rendered, and that the District Courts of Appeal shall have jurisdiction in all criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record, excepting criminal cases where a judgment of death has been rendered, an appeal from an order setting aside an information charging defendant with murder prior to any judgment should have been taken to the District Court of Appeal and not to the Supreme Court.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Benjamin K. Knight, Dist. Atty., for the People. W. G. Williams and D. C. Clark, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal to this court by the people from an order of the superior court of Santa Cruz county made before judgment, setting aside the information presented and filed therein charging the defendant with the crime of murder.

This court is without appellate jurisdiction in this case. While it is true that the information charges a crime punishable by death, neither judgment of death nor any other judgment has yet been rendered. The Constitution gives us appellate jurisdiction "in all criminal cases where judgment of death has been rendered," and gives to the district courts of appeal jurisdiction "in all criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record, excepting criminal cases where judgment of death has been rendered." Const. art. 6, § 4. It is clear that the appeal should have been taken to the District Court of Appeal for the First District, instead of to this court, and it must now be transferred to that court.

It is ordered that the cause be transferred from this court to the District Court of Appeal for the First District.

MERING v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(Sac. 1,846.)

1. Carriers (§ 155*)—Contract of Shipment—Validity.

Where a carrier did not refuse to transport freight, except under a special contract limiting liability for gross negligence, and then only to the extent of a valuation fixed in the contract, but such contract was thoroughly discussed before executed, and no objection was made to it by the shipper, who inserted in the contract in his own handwriting the valuation on the property, the contract was not imposed on the shipper and the carrier's liability was as fixed by it.

2. Carriers (§ 158*)—Contracts of Carriage—Construction.

A shipping contract voluntarily entered into, which fixes an agreed valuation of the property which forms the basis for the freight charges, is an agreement fixing the valuation of the property, and not a contract limiting the liability of the carrier, and under the contract the carrier is only liable as stipulated, and then only to the extent of the valuation fixed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 663–667, 699–703½, 708–718½; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

3. Carriers (§ 228*)—Carriage of Live Stock—Negligence—Burden of Proof.

Where an animal shipped in a healthy condition arrived at its destination 46 hours later in a dying condition, the carrier transporting it under a contract limiting its liability for gross negligence was prima facie guilty of gross negligence, and, to escape liability, it had the burden of showing that the death of the animal was not occasioned by such negligence, though the shipper did not accompany the animal, and though under the contract he assumed the duty of accompanying, feeding, and watering the animal, since the shipper's agreement did not relieve the carrier from the duty of properly caring for the animal during transportation, which proper care involved feeding and watering.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

Shaw, J., dissenting in part.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by E. B. Mering against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. B. Mering and J. E. Strong, for appellant. Arthur C. Huston, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal is before us on a hearing granted after a decision of the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District, affirming the judgment and order appealed from.

Plaintiff sued to recover from defendant the value of a certain mare shipped by him over the road of the defendant from the city of Woodland to Redwood City, in this state. The complaint alleged the shipment of the mare; that plaintiff did not accompany her and did not retain exclusive or any control over her in transit; that defendant in transporting said mare to said Redwood City was grossly negligent and grossly failed to properly care for said mare, by reason whereof said mare arrived at Redwood City about 46 hours after being shipped, in a gaunt and emaciated condition, and thereafter on the following day died from the effects of said treatment. Judgment was asked for the sum of $508, the alleged value of the animal.

The defendant in its answer admitted the shipment of the mare, denied the allegations of carelessness and neglect, and averred that the mare was shipped under a certain contract attached to the answer as part thereof, in which contract plaintiff had stated the value of the mare to be $20, agreed to accompany her and feed and water her, and further agreed that in no event "is first party (defendant) * * * to be liable for any loss or damage to said live stock not proven to have been caused by the gross negligence of the first party in performance of, or failure to perform, some duty which under the terms of this contract is due from first party to second party as to said live stock," and averred faithful and complete performance of said contract "and all of the obligations imposed upon it by law as a common carrier or otherwise," that "defendant assumed liability only to the extent of the agreed valuation of said mare as stated in said contract, to wit, the sum of $20, and that the compensation for the transportation of said mare was based on that value." The court found that the mare was shipped under the contract as alleged in the answer, found against plaintiff as to all of his averments of neglect and carelessness of the defendant, and also found that "it is not true that the condition of said mare or the death of said mare was due to any act or omission of said defendant, * * * or that the said mare died from the effects of any treatment of said defendant or from the effects of any act or omission of said defendant; * * * and it is not true that plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $508, or any other sum, by the defendant." Judgment was entered that plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that defendant recover its costs.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and asserts as grounds for a reversal the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain two findings made by the court.

The first attack is made on the finding that the mare was delivered to the defendant to be transported under a written contract between plaintiff and defendant attached to the answer under which defendant assumed liability for gross negligence, and for this only, and to the extent of the value of the mare as stated in the contract.

[1] The claim of appellant is that the evidence shows that the contract relied on was not freely and fairly made, but was forced and imposed upon him by the shipping agent of the defendant at Woodland. It is not pretended that the defendant refused to ship the mare under any other contract than by the special contract entered into; or that the alternative of shipping under an ordinary bill of lading which would have rendered the defendant liable for full damages was denied him. As executed the contract was entirely acceptable to the plaintiff at the time. Its provisions were thoroughly discussed between plaintiff, who was a practicing attorney, and the agent of the defendant, before it was executed. There was no objection on the part of the plaintiff as to any of the terms of the contract, the only discussion between himself and the agent being as to the valuation of the mare to be stated in the contract and as to the attention—watering and feeding—which would be given the mare in transit by the defendant, as the plaintiff did not intend to accompany her. These were the only matters discussed, and, fully understanding the terms of the contract and that it was left to himself to put a valuation on the mare and that the freight rates would be proportionate thereto and the liability of the defendant measured by such valuation, the plaintiff inserted in the contract in his own handwriting a valuation upon the mare of $20. Under these circumstances, there is no room for the claim that the contract was imposed upon plaintiff, or that it was not freely and fairly entered into.

[2] This contract so entered into between the parties is similar to the contract which was under consideration in Donlon Bros. v. Southern Pacific Co., 151 Cal. 763, 91 Pac. 603, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 811, where it was held that such a contract "is to be construed as an agreement fixing the valuation of the property shipped and not as a contract limiting the liability of the railroad company," that under such a contract the carrier would only be liable as stipulated for gross negligence, and then only as to the value of the animal to be shipped inserted in the contract. In the Donlon Case the railroad company was held liable to the extent of such stated valuation in the contract because it was guilty of gross negligence. In the case at bar as the agreed valuation of the mare under the contract between the parties was $20, this is the only amount the plaintiff could recover even if the defendant had been guilty of gross negligence in her transportation. The trial court found that defendant had not been so negligent, and this brings us to a consideration of the other point for a reversal insisted upon by the plaintiff, namely, that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

[3] It was alleged in the complaint, and not denied by the answer, that the mare arrived in Redwood City about 46 hours after being shipped. The evidence on behalf of plaintiff showed that the day the mare was shipped at Woodland she was well and in good condition, and that plaintiff placed a sack of hay in the car where she could reach it. A witness testified that, "when the mare arrived in Redwood City, she was very thin and gaunt and her sides were drawn. She was very thirsty, and he did not allow her to drink all she wanted. The colt looked well (there was a sucking colt five months old by her side). The next morning she refused to drink, and I called a veterinary, and he told me to take her out of the barn, or she would die, and soon after that she died." A veterinary surgeon at Woodland who had seen the mare the day before she was shipped, and who testified that she was then in good condition and well, replying to a hypothetical question which assumed that the mare was well when shipped, had been in the car 46 hours with a sucking colt by her side "and was taken off the car with her sides drawn and very thirsty and hungry, appearance dull and head drooping, and died the next day," answered as to the cause of the death of the mare, "I would say that it was probably due to not being fed or watered, but it could have been caused by other causes." This was the only evidence offered by plaintiff. Defendant offered no testimony as to whether the mare was fed or watered while in transit, or as to what care or attention she received during transportation.

It is insisted by appellant that this evidence made out a prima facie case on the part of plaintiff of gross negligence which cast upon defendant the onus of disproving the prima facie case so made, and we think this contention must be sustained.

It is not contended by respondent that if the mare had been shipped under an ordinary bill of lading, and was delivered at Redwood City in the dying condition which the evidence disclosed, that, on a showing by a plaintiff of her being in a healthy condition when shipped and arriving at her destination in an injured condition, the burden of proving that the injury or death of the animal was not occasioned by any want of care on the part of defendant would devolve upon defendant. Counsel for respondent, however, insists that under the special contract entered into between the parties and which provided that the defendant should not be liable for any loss or damage not proven to have been caused by the gross negligence of the defendant the burden of proving that the injury or loss resulted from gross negligence was upon the plaintiff.

But we think that the evidence offered by plaintiff was sufficient to make out a prima facie case of gross negligence on the part of defendant, casting the burden of proof on it to show that the death of the mare was not occasioned by such negligence on its part. While the plaintiff under the contract assumed the duty of accompanying, feeding, and watering the mare, he did not in fact accompany her. His agreeing to do so did not relieve the defendant from the duty of properly caring for the animal during her transportation, and proper care involved feeding and watering her during the long period which the evidence shows she was upon the cars. The evidence shows that, when the mare was shipped, she was well and in good condition, and that, after being en route for 46 hours, she reached her destination in a dying condition. The veterinary surgeon testified that her condition when taken from the cars at her destination "while it could have been caused by other causes * * * was probably due to her not having been fed or watered." While this testimony does not directly prove that the death of the animal was caused by a failure to feed or water her while in transit, it still amounts to a sufficient proof of facts from which a reasonable inference could be deduced that the dying condition in which she was delivered at Redwood City was attributable to a failure to feed and water her during the period of transportation. As the defendant was in exclusive control of the mare during transportation, the duty was cast upon it to feed and water her, and as a reasonable inference from the facts testified to, including the testimony of the veterinary surgeon, is that her dying condition when delivered was attributable to a failure to do this, there was a sufficient prima facie showing of gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff casting the burden of proof upon the latter to overcome the prima facie case against defendant so made.

In this view, the finding of the court complained of by appellant is contrary to the evidence, and for that reason the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgment, but I do not agree to the proposition that the contract limits plaintiff's damages to $20. I adhere to the views expressed in my dissenting opinion in Donlon v. S. P. Co., 151 Cal. 777, 91 Pac. 603, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 811.

HUMBOLDT SAVINGS BANK v. McCLEVERTY. (S. F. 5,572.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 7, 1911. Rehearing Denied Dec. 6, 1911.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 358*)—SALE OF PREMISES BY TRUSTEE IN DEED OF TRUST—CONTRACTS —VALIDITY.

The parties to a mortgage or deed of trust may contract that the premises shall be sold as a whole, in the absence of any statutory provision requiring the trustees to sell in subdivisions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 358.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 358*)—DEED OF TRUST—SALE BY TRUSTEE—DISCRETIONARY POWER.

A deed of trust which provides that the trustee may sell the premises as a whole or in his discretion in such reasonable parcels as he, in his judgment, may deem advisable, gives the trustee the discretion to sell as a whole or in parcels, and such discretion must be exercised in good faith for the best interests of the beneficiaries, including not only the creditor, but the debtor and his successors in interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1072, 1073; Dec. Dig. § 358.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 358*) — DEED OF TRUST — SALE BY TRUSTEE—DISCRETIONARY POWER.

A trustee in a deed of trust abuses his discretion to sell the property as a whole or in parcels, where he sells the property as a whole after a parcel has passed as a homestead on the debtor's death to his widow, as provided by Civ. Code, § 1265, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, since, as to the enforcement of the claim against the homestead, the widow is a surety with the right to have the other property first sold to pay the debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 358.*]

4. MORTGAGES (§ 369*)—SALES BY TRUSTEE—RIGHT TO SET ASIDE—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Where a trustee in a deed of trust abused his discretion by selling the property as a whole after a parcel had, as homestead, passed on the debtor's death to his widow, and the homestead was worth $5,000, while the balance of the property was worth $57,000, and the debt amounted to $57,618.30, the widow, seeking to set aside the sale as to the homestead, was not required to offer to pay the entire debt secured by the deed of trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

5. MORTGAGES (§ 369*)—SALES BY TRUSTEE—RIGHT TO SET ASIDE—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Where a sale under a deed of trust was improperly made, it should, as a general rule, be set aside on the application of the injured party, and a new sale ordered, but, where the creditor and the trustee placed the property in such a condition that a new sale could not be had, they must submit to such a decree as would most fairly redress the injury inflicted by them, and, where relief could not be given without compelling the creditor to accept the property wrongfully purchased at its true value, he must be held to have purchased at such value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1093-1100; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

6. MORTGAGES (§ 370*)—SALES BY TRUSTEE IN DEED OF TRUST—INVALIDITY—ESTOPPEL.

Where a widow of the grantor in a deed of trust was entitled to a decree protecting her homestead rights in a part of the property sold by the trustee, selling the property as a whole, she did not waive her right to such protection by failing to ask for a resale of the other property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 370.*]

7. MORTGAGES (§ 369*)—SALES BY TRUSTEES IN DEEDS OF TRUST—INVALIDITY—RELIEF.

Where neither the pleadings nor the findings disclosed any reason why the court, finding that the trustee in a deed of trust abused its discretion in selling the property as a whole, while a part had passed as homestead on the debtor's death to his widow, could not order a resale of the nonhomestead property, and, in case of a deficiency, a resale of the homestead, a decree setting aside the sale as to the homestead and adjudging that the value of the balance of the property should be considered in payment of the debt, and that the balance due should be secured by the deed of trust as to the homestead, was unauthorized.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1178*)—DISPOSITION OF CASE ON APPEAL.

Where it is probable that the facts authorizing the decree rendered exist, though the pleadings and findings do not disclose such facts, the court on appeal, adjudging the decree erroneous, will not order judgment for the party complaining, but will reverse the case, so that the facts can be established and a proper decree rendered.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Humboldt Savings Bank, substituted as plaintiff on the death of one Weber, the original plaintiff, against Mary C. McCleverty. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. E. Hatch and Alexander D. Keyes, for appellant. Fitzgerald & Abbott, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The action was brought to recover possession of a lot of land situated on Harrison street in the city of Oakland. This is the second appeal. Upon the first appeal a judgment in favor of the defendant was reversed and the cause remanded, with leave to the defendant to file amended or additional pleadings as she might be advised. Weber v. McCleverty, 149 Cal. 316, 86 Pac. 706. During the pendency of the action, Weber, the original plaintiff, died, and Humboldt Savings Bank has been substituted for him.

The land involved, together with another parcel of land situated on Broadway street in Oakland, had originally been owned by Charles McCleverty, the husband of the respondent. In January, 1901, McCleverty made his promissory note for $55,300 to Humboldt Savings Bank, and secured the same by a deed of trust of the two parcels of land. In May, 1901, the defendant Mary C. McCleverty made and recorded a declaration of homestead on the Harrison street lot. In July, 1901, default having been made in the payment of the note, the trustees named in the deed of trust, after notice duly given, sold both parcels, and conveyed the same to Adolph C. Weber, the original plaintiff, for $57,177.40, that being the highest sum bid. In the meanwhile McCleverty had died leaving a will wherein he named his widow, the defendant herein, as executrix, the will had been admitted to probate and letters testamentary issued. Before the sale took place, the defendant demanded of the Humboldt Savings Bank and of the trustees that in any sale to be made under the deed of trust the property which was not impressed with the homestead character should be sold first; but compliance with this demand was refused. These facts, together with the further one that the bank had failed to present a claim against the estate of McCleverty, appeared on the first appeal. The principal question there considered was whether, under section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the failure to so present a claim barred the creditor of its right to compel a sale of the homestead. Concluding that no such presentation was required as a condition to the enforcement of the rights created by a deed of trust, this court reversed the judgment in favor of the defendant. With reference to the claim that the two properties should not have been sold as a whole, we said that the pleadings were not sufficient to entitle the defendant to defeat the action on this ground, but, as above stated, permission to file amended or further pleadings was accorded to her.

Upon the return of the case to the lower court, she availed herself of such leave by filing an amended answer and a cross-complaint, in which she averred, in addition to what has already been stated, that at the time of the sale, the Broadway property (i. e., that not covered by the homestead) was worth more than $57,177.40, the sum realized at the sale for both parcels; that if said parcel had been sold first, and separately from the homestead, it would have brought a sum in excess of the debt secured, and would have made it unnecessary to sell the homestead. It was alleged, further, that Weber, the purchaser, was the president of the Humboldt Bank, that he purchased the property as agent for the bank, and that before purchasing he had full knowledge of the facts concerning the declaration of homestead, the death of McCleverty, the defendant's demand for a sale in parcels, and the value of the respective parcels. There were also allegations to the effect that the homestead premises had been the community property of McCleverty and his wife, that the latter had remained in possession of the same at all times after her husband's death, and that such title to the said premises as had been acquired by Weber for the bank still remained in the bank.

The court found that the Broadway property was at the time of the trustees' sale of the value of $57,565, "and would and could be sold for said sum of $57,565, at public auction if sold separately as demanded by defendant." The amount then due on the note was $57,618.30. If the Broadway property had been sold first and separate from the homestead property, it would not have been necessary to sell the latter except for the deficiency of $53.30, the difference between the amount due and the value of the Broadway property. In all other respects the findings are in favor of the defendant's allegations in her answer and cross-complaint.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

From these findings the court drew the conclusions of law that the trustees' sale and conveyance to Weber, so far as they concern the homestead property, are invalid, and that the deed as to said homestead property be vacated and set aside; that the amount of $57,565, the value of the Broadway property, be applied and considered in payment of the sum of $57,618.30 due to the bank; that the balance of $53.30, with interest, be and is secured by the deed of trust as to the homestead property; that, if defendant pay such balance within 10 days, then the whole of the debt secured by the deed of trust shall be deemed paid and satisfied, and a reconveyance shall be made to defendant, and said property shall vest in her absolutely, but, in the event of her failure to make such payment, the homestead premises shall be subject to sale under the deed of trust to satisfy said deficiency. A judgment was entered accordingly, and from this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The facts are not in dispute; none of the findings being attacked. The appellant's position is that the court drew erroneous conclusions from these facts, and entered a judgment which is not supported by them.

[1] 1. The first contention is that under the express terms of the deed of trust the trustees were authorized to sell the property as a whole, and that the failure to sell in parcels, as demanded, afforded to the defendant no ground for setting the sale aside. The deed of trust contained this provision relative to the powers of the trustees: "They may sell said premises, as above described, as a whole, or in their discretion, in such reasonable parcels or subdivisions as they, in their judgment, may deem advisable." We do not doubt that the parties to a mortgage or a deed of trust may contract that the premises shall be sold as a whole, and that their agreement to this end is enforceable. This court has so held in the case of a mortgage, notwithstanding the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (sections 694 and 726) that upon an execution on foreclosure, several known lots or parcels must be sold separately. Bank of Sonoma v. Charles, 86 Cal. 322, 24 Pac. 1019. The right of a debtor to waive a sale by parcels applies equally to a deed of trust (Brown v. Mortgage Co., 86 Miss. 388, 38 South. 312), and the validity of an agreement for a sale in bulk follows a fortiori, where, as in this state, there is no statutory provision requiring the trustees to sell in subdivisions. Dunn v. McCoy, 150 Mo. 548, 52 S. W. 21.

[2] But in the case at bar the parties did not make an absolute stipulation that the property should be sold as a whole. The provision above quoted gave the trustees a discretion to sell as a whole or in parcels. This discretion they were bound to exercise in good faith for the best interests of their beneficiaries, who included, not only the creditor, but the debtor and his successors in interest.

[3] At the time of the sale, the Harrison street property did not belong to the estate of McCleverty, the debtor. It had, by virtue of its homestead character, passed, upon McCleverty's death, to his widow. Civ. Code, § 1265; Code Civ. Proc. § 1474. With respect to the enforcement of the bank's claim against this property, she stood, therefore, in the situation of a surety, and, as such, had the right to have the principal debtor's property first sold to pay the debt. Civ. Code, § 2850; McLaughlin v. Hart, 46 Cal. 638; Blood v. Munn, 155 Cal. 228, 100 Pac. 694. In view of the relations of the parties to the different parcels covered by the deed of trust, a sale as a whole, in disregard of the homestead claimant's demand and right to have the principal debtor's property first applied to the payment of the debt, was a manifest abuse of the discretion reposed in the trustees. This consideration alone, without regard to the fact, admitted by plaintiff at the trial, that the property would have realized a larger sum if the parcels had been sold separately, entitled the defendant to disaffirm the sale.

[4] 2. It is urged that the defendant was bound, as a condition precedent to her right to have the sale set aside, to offer to pay the entire debt secured by the deed of trust. It has often been held that an action to set aside a sale by trustees or on foreclosure for irregularities of any kind should ordinarily be accompanied by an offer to redeem by paying the sum due. Sav. & L. Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 538, 39 Pac. 922; Copsey v. Sacramento Bank, 133 Cal. 659, 66 Pac. 7, 204, 85 Am. St. Rep. 238. The plaintiff is held to compliance with the old maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity. Marvel v. Cobb, 200 Mass. 293, 86 N. E. 360; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Rink, 110 Ill. 538; Garland v. Watson, 74 Ala. 323; Sloan v. Coolbaugh, 10 Iowa, 31. On the other hand, there are not a few cases holding that, where a party has the right to avoid a sale, he is not bound to tender any payment in redemption. Brewer v. Harrison, 27 Colo. 349, 62 Pac. 224; Lewis v. Hamilton, 26 Colo. 263, 59 Pac. 196; Meyer v. Jefferson Ins. Co., 5 Mo. App. 245; Briggs v. Hall, 16 R. I. 577, 18 Atl. 177. Whatever may be the correct rule, viewing the question generally, it is certainly not the law that an offer to pay the debt must be made, where it would be inequitable to exact such offer of the party complaining of the sale. Benedict v. Gammon Theological Seminary, 122 Ga. 412, 50 S. E. 162. Under the circumstances disclosed by this record, the defendant would be subjected to very evident injustice and hardship if her right to attack the sale were made dependent upon an offer by her to pay the whole debt. The debt was not hers, and she was not liable for any part of it. Her only interest was in the homestead property, which, with other land, was held as security for McCleverty's note. The property which she was seeking to save from the effect of the sale was worth, according to the finding of the court, $5,000, while the property in which she had no interest was worth over $57,000. The debt amounted to $57,618.30. It must be apparent from a mere statement of these facts that there is no equity in the claim that, in order to be enabled to attack an unauthorized sale of her $5,000 homestead, she must pay, or offer to pay, a debt of $57,000, for which she is in no way liable.

3. The decree set aside the sale, not as an entirety, but only so far as it affected the homestead property. The Broadway parcel was treated by the court as if it had actually been sold separately for the sum which the court found to be its actual value at the time of the sale. To this mode of disposing of the controversy, the appellant makes two objections, which, while they are argued under distinct heads, may well, we think, be treated together. It is contended, first, that by compelling the plaintiff to take the Broadway property at what is found to be its actual value the court is imposing upon the purchaser at the sale a bargain to which he, or his principal, never assented; and, second, that, the sale of both parcels having constituted a single transaction, the defendant is not entitled to ratify a part of the sale, while disaffirming the rest, but must, by reason of her ratification of the sale of the Broadway piece, be held to have confirmed the entire transaction.

[5] Ordinarily, where it appears that a sale was improperly made, it should, on the application of the injured party, be set aside and a new sale ordered. Wright v. Bruschke, 62 Ill. App. 358; Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 252; Mason v. Martin, 4 Md. 124; Imboden v. Hunter, 23 Ark. 622, 79 Am. Dec. 116; Tompkins v. Tompkins, 39 S. C. 537, 18 S. E. 233; Duncan v. Home Co-op. Co., 221 Mo. 315, 120 S. W. 733. This is the normal and proper remedy for the wrong inflicted. The creditor is entitled to have the property sold. The attempted sale has been conducted in an unauthorized manner. The rights of all parties are protected by setting aside the action taken, and directing a new sale which shall be in accordance with the law and the agreement of the parties. But there may be cases in which a new sale is impossible. A part or all of the property may, for example, have passed into the ownership of third parties, who have purchased for value and without notice of any infirmity in the sale. But, if the party entitled to avoid the sale is not by reason of laches or otherwise chargeable with responsibility for this condition, the fact that a resale is impracticable should not deprive him of all remedy for the wrong which he has suffered. It has always been the pride of courts of equity that they will so mould and adjust their decrees as to award substantial justice according to the requirements of the varying complications that may be presented to them for adjudication. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 28, 439; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 60. And so, if, in a case like this, the creditor and the trustees have put the property in such condition that a new sale cannot be had, they must submit to such decree as will most fairly redress the injury which they have inflicted. If relief cannot be given without compelling the creditor to accept the property wrongfully purchased by him at its true value, he may be held to a purchase at such value. This is, in effect, the principle applied in Blood v. Munn, 155 Cal. 228, 100 Pac. 694. There a mortgagee of property which included a homestead had released the property other than the homestead upon payment of $425. The property so released was worth $1,100 and over. In an action to foreclose the mortgage, it was held that the owners of the homestead were entitled to a credit upon the mortgage debt of the real value of the property released. This result necessarily followed from the fact, common to that case and the one before us, that the homestead property was only secondarily liable for the debt, and that any other holding would deprive the owner of the homestead of the right to have the property primarily liable first exhausted. There, as here, the creditor was held to a bargain (i. e., the release of $1,100 of his demand) to which he had never assented, but this was not deemed an obstacle to granting to the defendants the only relief which was possible. In Drury v. Cross, 74 U. S. 299, 19 L. Ed. 40, the Supreme Court of the United States approved a decree which, in form and effect, was very like the one here made. There the directors of an insolvent railroad corporation had, in order to relieve themselves of liability on indorsements made by them, combined with certain creditors and bondholders to have the assets of the road sold on foreclosure. By a fraudulent contrivance, the amount of bonded indebtedness outstanding was made to appear far greater than it was, and, as a result, the favored creditors succeeded in destroying competition at the sale and purchasing the property at a price greatly below its real value. The decision of the court was that the purchasers must be held liable to other creditors for the full value of the property purchased.

[6] These authorities furnish ample support for the right of a court of equity, under appropriate circumstances, to grant the form of relief embodied in the decree appealed from. What we have said is also, we think, a sufficient answer to the point that a ratification of the sale of the Broadway parcel is a ratification of the entire sale. This point is, indeed, but a statement, in another form, of the proposition first discussed. If the defendant is entitled to a decree protecting her rights in the homestead, notwithstanding the fact that the sale of the other property cannot be annulled, it must follow that she does not waive her right to such protection by failing to ask for a resale of both parcels. Furthermore, it is not entirely accurate to say that the defendant has ratified the sale of the Broadway property. The only sale was one of both parcels for $57,177.40. The Broadway piece was not sold for any specific part of this amount, and the defendant did not ask that any actual sale be permitted to stand. What she did seek and obtain was a decree that the bank be put in the position which it would have occupied if it had purchased the Broadway piece for the sum which would have been realized on a sale properly conducted. This is not a ratification of the sale which was in fact made.

But the difficulty with the case before us is that the record does not show the existence of any circumstances which would render it impracticable to order a new sale of the entire property. As has been said, a decree requiring the purchaser at the trustees' sale to take the Broadway parcel at its true value can be justified only on the ground that it is, under the circumstances, the only relief that equity can give. It is a substitute for the natural relief of ordering a new sale, and is resorted to because such new sale cannot be had.

[7] Neither the pleadings nor the findings disclose any reason why in this case the court could not have ordered a sale of all the property according to the rights of the parties; that is to say, a sale, first of the Broadway property, and, in the event of a deficiency after crediting the debtor with the rents and profits of this piece, a sale of the homestead. The pleadings of the defendant allege that the title to the homestead, conveyed to the purchaser by the trustees, still remains in the plaintiff, and the court so finds. But there is no averment or finding that the title to the Broadway parcel is not in a like situation. It is true that the plaintiff in its answer to the cross-complaint alleged that it had parted with the Broadway property to bona fide purchasers for value, and that it had lost the means of accounting for the rents and profits, but these allegations were on motion of the defendant herself stricken from the answer. She cannot, of course, after having induced the court to eliminate these averments from the issues, rely upon them as establishing a state of facts which she should have pleaded and proved as a foundation for the decree obtained by her. The pleadings and findings, as they stand, do not justify the conclusions of law and the judgment.

[8] But, inasmuch as it is more than probable that the facts authorizing the decree rendered actually exist, we cannot assent to the claim of appellant that judgment in its favor should be ordered on this appeal. An amendment to the answer and cross-complaint, together with evidence establishing the truth of such amendment, would authorize the granting to defendant of the relief embodied in the decree here appealed from.

4. The plaintiff relies, in response to defendant's cross-complaint, upon the defense of laches, and that of the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 343, 338, subd. 4. It is conceded in the reply brief that, "if the defendant was entitled to have the sale set aside as to the homestead alone without vacating the sale as to the Broadway piece, the plea of the statute of limitation and of laches ought to be overruled." We have already seen that the defendant may be entitled to this very relief. In that aspect the question of limitation and laches need not be further considered. We shall not at this time undertake to decide whether, if it should turn out that a resale of both parcels is the only remedy open to respondent, she should be held barred of her right to seek this relief. If this question should ever arise, which is hardly probable, it will be time enough to then dispose of it.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court, after permitting the defendant to amend her pleadings, to take such further proceedings as may not be inconsistent with this opinion.

Where, in an action to quiet title to a relocated mining claim, there was evidence that defendants' grantor under the prior location did not complete the required assessment work for the years 1907 and 1908, and that complainant relocated the land in December, 1908, an instruction that, if a proper amount of assessment work was not performed in either 1907 or 1908, complainant was not required to wait until the expiration of the latter year before locating the claim, was proper.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Suit by Wallace Galbreath against Manuel S. Simas and another. Judgment for complainant, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Taylor & Tebbe and James D. Fairchild, for appellants. C. J. Luttrell and L. F. Coburn, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet his title as against defendants to a certain placer mining claim known as the "Smugler," and to restrain said defendants from cutting wood or making excavations on said property. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff. From this judgment and from an order denying their motion for new trial the defendants appeal.

The court found that the Smugler claim was a valid mining location made in accordance with the statutes of the United States, and that it covered a large part of the territory to which defendants asserted title and known as the Blue Jay placer mine; that the alleged title of defendants under deed from one Gallagher, who had located the Blue Jay in December, 1905, was invalid as against plaintiff, who located the Smugler claim in December, 1908, because neither Gallagher nor his successors in interest had performed the required assessment work on the Blue Jay claim; and that the land covered by the Smugler claim was open to location when Galbreath located thereon in December, 1908.

[1] The main contention of appellants is that the findings are not supported by the evidence. They maintain (1) that Gallagher's citizenship at the time he located the Blue Jay placer claim was clearly proven; (2) that the proper amount of assessment work was done by Gallagher in 1907; and that (3) more than $100 worth of work was done on the property by Gallagher or those in privity with him during the year 1908 and before the 29th day of December of that year.

Upon the first point little discussion is necessary, because the other two questions were determined adversely to defendants upon conflicting testimony. Gallagher was permitted to testify fully with reference to the years he had spent in the United States, his naturalization, the fact of his registration in California in 1908 by presentation of a certified copy of his naturalization papers to the county clerk of the county in which he lived, and of his participation in elections ever since. Whether or not this was the best evidence need not be considered here, for it seems to have been introduced without objection. Respondent concedes that it was sufficient, if believed, to justify the jury in the conclusion that Gallagher was a citizen, but calls the attention of the court to the impeachment of Gallagher as a witness, which, he asserts, was so complete that probably nothing which Gallagher said was accepted as verity by the jurors.

Regarding the work done on the Blue Jay claim in 1907 and 1908, the evidence, as we have said before, was conflicting. Gallagher himself testified that in the year 1907 he performed more that $100 worth of work, giving in detail the items of labor. He was contradicted by other witnesses in regard to the details of the work which, according to his statement, was performed by him during that year. David Ream testified that no work was done on the Blue Jay in 1907. Zoll contradicted Gallagher with reference to the alleged removal by ground sluicing of a quantity of earth 24 feet long, 9 feet wide, and 3 feet thick from the Blue Jay claim. Gallagher stated that he was accustomed to go by way of a certain shaft on the property into a tunnel where there was water and that he frequently performed work in said tunnel, but according to the witness Ream there was no connection between the shaft and the tunnel. The tunnel itself was on the Hawkins claim, and not within the lines of the Blue Jay at all; and there was no water in said tunnel. Similar testimony was given by witness Le May. There were certain other contradictions of Gallagher's testimony which need not be considered here in detail. It is sufficient to say that they were of enough importance to justify the jury in finding against the defendants with reference to the value of the work performed upon the claim in 1907.

Appellants do not say that Gallagher performed $100 worth of work on the Blue Jay claim in 1908, but they do most positively assert that they, as the equitable owners of the property, put work upon it as the representatives of Gallagher to an amount greatly in excess of $100. They say that there was an oral agreement between themselves and Gallagher which amounted to a lease with the privilege of purchasing; the understanding being that appellants were to do the requisite amount of work which was to apply on the price to be paid for the property. The Blue Jay claim was adjacent to the patented claim which was called by all the witnesses the "Hawkins." This was the property of the appellants. The Blue Jay was on higher ground than the Hawkins. In 1908 the appellants built a reservoir which was partly on the land covered by the Blue Jay claim, and dug a ditch through that territory for a distance of more than 800 feet. Respondent contends in opposition to this that appellants had no contract with Gallagher; that the work done on the Blue Jay was not for the benefit of that claim, but merely to get a better head of water for mining operations on the so-called Hawkins claim; and that the jury was justified in the conclusion that the work performed by appellants in 1908 on the Blue Jay was of a value less than $100.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

One witness testified that while Rose was at work on the reservoir he was asked if he was not working on Gallagher's land. He replied with an uncomplimentary reference to Gallagher who, he said, claimed "the whole country," but did not work on anything. Witness Le May told while on the stand of a conversation which he had had with Gallagher in October, 1908, wherein Gallagher admitted, in effect, that his assessment work had not been done, and made no reference to any contract to sell his property; but the most important evidence offered by plaintiff to show that no contract existed for the sale of the property by Gallagher to the appellants was that which indicates that a line was run between the Hawkins and the Smugler claims by a surveyor who had been engaged for that purpose, establishing the boundaries between these claims to the satisfaction of the parties hereto. The surveyor Nolan testified that appellant Simas, respondent Galbreath, and Ream (who claimed an interest in the Smugler with Galbreath) were present when he ran the line and were satisfied with it. He was corroborated by both Ream and Galbreath, the last-named witness also testifying that appellant Rose suggested the employment of the surveyor and agreed to pay half the expense of establishing the line between the two claims. It seems hardly credible that, if Simas and Rose were the equitable owners of the Blue Jay, they would have thus recognized Galbreath's right in the Smugler which included practically the same territory as the Blue Jay and at a time long subsequent to the performance by them of the work which as they asserted at the trial had been done for the purpose of perfecting Gallagher's title. There is also much force in the position of respondent that the work of Rose and Simas was for the benefit of the Hawkins claim. Much of the Blue Jay is uphill from the reservoir, ditch, and penstock which were constructed by appellants, and the water could be advantageously used on a small part only of that claim.

Upon the subject of the value of the improvements constructed by appellants in 1908 there was a wide diversity of testimony. Both Rose and Perry testified that the reservoir was 70 feet long and from 25 to 35 feet deep, and that the ditch was approximately 600 feet long, 20 inches in width, and 20 inches in depth. The cost of the ditch and the dam they asserted was $200. Appellants' witness Graves, a civil engineer, estimated that the dam constructed by them contained 48.6 cubic yards of earth. Ream testified that the dam could be built for $40 and the ditch for $25. Witnesses Le May, Mathewson, and Utne, all experienced men in such matters, made estimates somewhat lower.

[2] It will thus be seen that there was a distinct conflict of evidence upon the subject of the value of work done by the appellants in 1908, and we cannot say that the jury was not justified in concluding that the improvements made that year were worth less than $100. There is no merit in appellants' contention that no evidence was offered by Galbreath of the posting of his original notice of location and the recordation of a copy thereof. Galbreath and one other witness testified to these facts.

On the cross-examination of Galbreath, he was asked if Ream had not previously located the Smugler claim and an objection to the question was sustained. This ruling was proper, but, even if it had been erroneous, it was cured by subsequent testimony that Ream had been a former claimant and had forfeited his right to the property long before any of the transactions connected with this case occurred. Ream was also permitted, over an objection, to testify how one of the corners of the Hawkins claim was marked according to his observation made at the time Mr. Nolan was running the line between the Hawkins and Smugler claims. If this was error, we cannot see how appellants could possibly have been harmed by it.

Appellants complain that Gallagher's answer to a question on direct examination was stricken out. He had answered in the affirmative the question: "Are you the locator of this claim?" On cross-examination, however, he was compelled to answer the question: "How did you happen to locate this claim that had been located and held by Dave Ream and others?" Even conceding that the rulings of the court on these two matters were not consistent, we cannot say how appellants were prejudiced for subsequently Gallagher testified fully regarding all his acts with reference to the location of the Blue Jay.

[3] Appellants also complain of an instruction in which the jury was told that respondent did not have to wait until January 1, 1909, before relocating the claim, unless the assessment work had been fully performed in 1907. The language criticized is not properly subject to objection when taken in connection with the preceding portion of the instruction which was in part as follows: "If you find that the defendants did construct the reservoir in Stewart Gulch, and did construct the ditch testified to in the year 1908, under an agreement with Gallagher to do his assessment work upon the Blue Jay claim, but that such work was not of the value of $100, and that they did not continue to, in good faith, complete such assessment work, but, on the contrary, did cease work on or about the month of November, then I charge you that the plaintiff had the right to go upon said land and locate it on or about the 29th day of December of that year." By this instruction the jury was told that, if a proper amount of assessment work was not performed in either 1907 or 1908, respondent did not have to wait until the expiration of the latter year before relocating the claim. Applied to the facts of the case we find no error in the instruction.

[4] By another instruction the jurors were told that only citizens or those who had properly declared their intention of becoming such citizens can locate mining claims upon vacant unappropriated public land of the United States, and that, if a person not a citizen go through the form of locating a claim and selling it to others, he has nothing to sell and the buyers acquire nothing by the purchase. The instruction then proceeds as follows: "If, therefore, you find that defendants hold the ground in dispute herein by virtue of a sale from P. J. Gallagher, who held it by a pretended location, but who was not a citizen of the United States at the time he made such pretended location, then I charge you that the defendants have no title whatever to said premises and you must find for the plaintiff." Appellants contend that by this language the jurors were told that Gallagher's location was a pretended one, and that this was an instruction upon a matter of fact. A reading of the quoted language in view of that which immediately precedes it entirely destroys this argument. The jury was instructed that Gallagher's claim was a "pretended one" only in the event of their finding that he was not a citizen of the United States. There was nothing misleading in the instruction.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CAMPBELL et al. v. MORAN et al.
(L. A. 2,732.)

1. Taxation (§ 679*)—Tax Title—Irregularity in Assessment or Sale—Mailing Notice.

Pol. Code, § 3897, as amended by St. 1907, p. 697, requires that a tax collector, making a resale of land under authority from the state, shall not only give notice of the sale by publishing a notice in a newspaper for a specified time, but that he shall also mail a copy of such notice, postage prepaid and registered, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale at his last known post office address, and sections 3780 and 3817 give the owner of land sold to the state for taxes the right to redeem it before the state disposes of it. Property was assessed in 1902 to James Moran, and on nonpayment of taxes was sold to the state in 1903, and after the lapse of five years from such sale the tax collector attempted a resale of it. The last assessment before the sale was in 1908 and was to "Nellie S. Moran," whose address as written on the assessment book was "833 S. Spring St.," to whom no notice of the sale was ever mailed, but a notice of such sale was sent by registered mail, addressed to James Moran, 249 South Spring street, Los Angeles, Cal., which returned to the tax collector before the sale without having been delivered. Held, that the provision as to notice by mailing, being for the benefit of the previous owner, was a jurisdictional prerequisite to a valid sale by the state, and that the sale was ineffectual; so that the purchaser acquired no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 679.*]

2. Taxation (§ 679*)—Tax Title—Notice of Sale—Persons to be Notified—"Last Known Post Office Address."

Under Pol. Code, § 3650, which requires an assessor to state in the assessment of property the name and post office address, if known, of the person to whom the property is assessed, the address shown on the last assessment constitutes the last known post office address so far as the tax records are concerned, and, in the absence of other information, the tax collector must take notice of the address so shown and mail the notice of resale to such address.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 679.*]

3. Taxation (§ 788*)—Tax Deeds—Effect as Evidence—Notice of Sale.

The recital, in a deed from the state on a resale of land sold to it for taxes, as to the mailing of a copy of the notice prescribed by Pol. Code, § 3897, as amended by St. 1907, p. 697, is made, by section 3898, only prima facie evidence of the facts recited.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to quiet plaintiffs' alleged title to the land described in the complaint, being a lot in the city of Los Angeles. Defendant Nellie Skinner Moran had judgment that plaintiffs have no interest in the property, and that, as against them, she is the absolute owner thereof. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

It was stipulated at the trial that plaintiffs have no title to the property except such as they may have acquired by virtue of an attempted sale by the state on account of nonpayment of state and county taxes for the year 1902, and that, unless the title to the property be shown to be vested in plaintiffs by virtue of such attempted sale, the title to the property in controversy is vested in said Nellie Skinner Moran.

[1] For the purposes of a decision herein, it will be necessary to consider only one of the many points made by respondents in support of the determination of the trial court.

The assessment of the property for the year 1902 was to "James Moran." The tax thereon not having been paid, the property was sold to the state on July 1, 1903, and, no redemption having been made within five years from the date of such sale, a deed of the property was made to the state by the tax collector on July 2, 1908. Pol. Code, § 3785. Thereafter, in the year 1909, it was attempted to make a sale of this property through the tax collector of Los Angeles county as authorized by and in accord with the provisions of section 3897, Political Code. The attempted sale was had on February 19, 1909, and plaintiffs were the purchasers at such sale. The last assessment of this property "next before the sale" was in the year 1908 and was to "Nellie S. Moran," defendant herein, and the address of said defendant, written on the assessment book, was "833 S. Spring St." It was definitely shown by the evidence that no notice or copy of notice of this sale was ever mailed by the tax collector to said Nellie S. Moran, or to any person at the address shown by the last assessment. A notice of such sale, with the postage thereon prepaid, and registered, had been mailed, addressed to "James Moran, 249 South Spring street, Los Angeles, California," and this had been returned by the postmaster to the tax collector on February 8, 1909, without having been delivered. As we understand the record, this was the only notice by mail of the sale that was ever attempted to be given, and is the notice by mail referred to in the deed from the state as having been given. No claim to the contrary is made by counsel for plaintiffs.

Upon these facts it must be held, in view of the findings of the trial court in favor of defendants, and in view of the decision of this court in the recent case of Smith v. Furlong, 117 Pac. 527, that the attempted sale by the state was ineffectual for any purpose, and that consequently plaintiffs are without any interest in the property. It is required by section 3897, Political Code, as amended in 1907, that the tax collector making the sale under authorization from the state, shall not only give notice of the sale by publishing a notice in a newspaper for a specified time, but also that he shall "mail a copy of said notice, postage thereon prepaid and registered, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale, at his last known post office address." The owner of land sold to the state for taxes being given by statute the right to redeem the same at any time before the state shall have disposed of it (Pol. Code, §§ 3780 and 3817), it was held that this provision as to notice by mailing, enacted by the Legislature, was a substantial requirement for his benefit, compliance with which was essential to the validity of a sale by the state; in other words, that "the giving of notice by mail, as section 3897 requires, is a jurisdictional prerequisite to a valid sale by the state," at least in all cases where the address of the party is not unknown.

[2] As section 3650, Political Code, requires the assessor to state in the assessment of property "the name and post office address, if known, of the person to whom the property is assessed," it was substantially held in the same case that the address shown on the last assessment constitutes the last known post office address, so far as the tax records are concerned, and that, in the absence of information of a different address, the tax collector must take notice of the address so shown and mail the notice thereto. In this case, as we have seen, not only was no notice mailed to any person at the address so shown, but no notice was mailed to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale, at any address, and the notice in fact mailed, addressed to another person, was returned undelivered to the tax collector.

[3] The recital in the deed from the state as to the mailing of a copy of the notice, even if assumed sufficient to show such mailing as the statute requires, was only prima facie evidence of the facts recited (Pol. Code, § 3898; Smith v. Furlong, supra), and it was open to defendant to show that the recital was untrue, and that the statutory requirement in this regard had not been complied with. This was certainly sufficiently shown to warrant the conclusion of the trial court that the requirement had not been complied with, a conclusion we must assume the court reached, in view of its general findings in favor of defendants.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SMITH v. BOSTON. (L. A. 2,744.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1911.)

1. Taxation (§ 811*)—Action to Quiet Tax Title—Judgment—Findings.

A finding, in an action to quiet title under a tax deed, that the plaintiff was not the owner of the premises mentioned in the complaint nor of any part thereof and has no interest in such premises, is sufficient to support a judgment for defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 811.*]

2. Taxation (§ 788*)—Tax Deeds—Effect as Evidence—Recitals.

A recital in the deed of a tax collector, given on a resale of lands by the state, is prima facie evidence of the fact recited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1555-1569; Dec. Dig. § 788.*]

3. Taxation (§ 788*)—Action to Try Tax Title—Tax Deed—Effect as Evidence.

Pol. Code, § 3897, requires the tax collector, before selling for the state land sold to it for taxes, to mail a copy of notice of sale to the person to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale at his last-known post office address. A deed of a tax collector recited that as the address was unknown, the collector did not mail a copy of such notice to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before such sale, and there was no evidence in conflict therewith or proof of actual notice. It appeared from the record that the property on the year next before the sale was assessed to "Andrew J. Boston, Santa Monica," and that the year previous to that the address was given as "232 S. Ocean avenue, Santa Monica, Cal." Held sufficient to warrant a conclusion by the trial court that the recital in the deed of the tax collector, to the effect that the address of the party to whom the property was last assessed was unknown, was false.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1555-1569; Dec. Dig. § 788.*]

4. Taxation (§ 679*)—Tax Title—Effect of Irregularity in Sale—Notice.

The giving of notice by mail, to the party to whom the property was last assessed before the tax sale, of a resale of land, after deed to the state for nonpayment of taxes, is a jurisdictional prerequisite to a valid sale by the state, and a sale without such notice, where the address was not unknown, is invalid and passes no title to the purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 679.*]

5. Taxation (§ 810*)—Action to Try Tax Title—Evidence.

Evidence, in an action to quiet title under a tax deed, held sufficient to support a finding that plaintiff had no interest in the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 810.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action to quiet title by J. H. Smith against Andrew Boston. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walter J. Horgan and C. A. Stice, for appellant. Tanner, Taft & Odell, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial in an action brought by him to quiet his alleged title to a lot of land in the city of Santa Monica, Los Angeles county.

It is admitted that plaintiff has no title to the property except such as he may have acquired by virtue of an attempted sale by the state on account of nonpayment of state and county taxes for the year 1901. If plaintiff acquired no title thereby, admittedly defendant, who is shown by the evidence to have acquired the property in the year 1902 and to have ever since been in possession thereof and living thereon, paying all taxes levied thereon, was entitled to judgment against plaintiff.

It will be necessary to notice but one of the many points made in support of the judgment.

[1] It was found as a fact by the trial court, in response to the issue made by the complaint and answer, that the plaintiff is not the owner of the premises mentioned in the complaint, nor of any part thereof, and has no interest in or to said premises. The finding is in no way dependent upon or inconsistent with other findings of certain specific facts, and without regard to such other findings constitutes sufficient support for and compels the judgment that was given. This finding is fully sustained by the evidence, as we shall proceed to show.

[2, 3] The attempted sale by the state, through the tax collector of Los Angeles county, was in the year 1908, and the last assessment "next before the sale" was in the year 1907. The transcript on appeal shows that the property was then assessed, as it had been for the year 1906, to "Andrew J. Boston," and that his address was given in such assessment of 1907 as "Santa Monica," and in the assessment of 1906 as "232 S. Ocean avenue, Santa Monica, Cal." It furthermore showed "tax statements and receipts to Andrew J. Boston" for the years 1904 and 1905. It was claimed on a motion by plaintiff to amend the transcript, heard at the time of the argument of this appeal, that the engrossed and settled statement on motion for new trial states that the assessment for the year 1907 was to "Andew J. Borton," instead of "Andrew J. Boston." This was denied by defendant, and the case was submitted for decision with the understanding that, if it was found to be a material matter, the submission would be set aside and an opportunity given plaintiff to substantiate his claim. We are satisfied that a determination of this question regarding the correctness of the transcript is not essential to a proper disposition of this appeal, and that it may be assumed that the name of the property owner was given in the assessment of 1907 as "Andrew J. Borton." It still remains that the record shows that the address of the person to whom the property was assessed was given on the assessment as "Santa Monica."

It is established prima facie by the deed of the tax collector, and there is no evidence in conflict therewith, that no copy of the notice of sale was mailed, as required by section 3897 of the Political Code, "to the party to whom the property was last assessed next before the sale, at his last-known post office address"; it being recited in the deed, exactly as it was recited in Smith v. Furlong, 117 Pac. 527, "and whereas the address being unknown, W. O. Welch, tax collector, as aforesaid, did not mail a copy of said notice, postage thereon prepaid, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before such sale." It thus appears that a copy of the notice was not mailed to "Andrew J. Borton" at the address shown by the assessment or at all. It was further shown by uncontradicted evidence that a copy of the notice was not mailed to Andrew J. Boston at all, so that if we assume that the transcript is correct and that the assessment for the year 1907 was to him instead of to Andrew J. Borton, as claimed by plaintiff, nevertheless the notice by mail required was not given. In either event, the requirement of section 3897 of the Political Code that a copy of the notice be mailed, with the postage thereon prepaid, and registered, "to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale (who was either Borton or Boston), at his last-known post office address," was not complied with, although in such assessment an address was shown. Even if the assessment was, as claimed by plaintiff, to "Borton," instead of "Boston," it is apparent from the record that the use in the name of the letter "r" instead of "s" was a mere clerical error, and it may be that the mailing of a notice to "Boston" would have been sufficient; but as to this it is unnecessary to decide. No notice was mailed to either "Boston" or "Borton." It furthermore appears that Boston never had any actual notice of such proposed sale. It is established by Smith v. Furlong, supra, that the evidence hereinbefore stated was sufficient to warrant a conclusion by the trial court that the recital in the deed of the tax collector to the effect that the address of the party to whom the property was last assessed was unknown was false, and that such post office address was by legal intendment known to the tax collector; the court saying: "It is evident, therefore, that if the address was unknown to the tax collector it was because he had failed to avail himself of the ample means of knowledge readily accessible to him and furnished by law for that purpose, one of these books being the record of the assessment from which his authority to make the deed was derived." It is further established by Smith v. Furlong, supra, that such evidence fully supports a conclusion that the requirement of section 3897 of the Political Code as to mailing a notice of the sale has not been complied with.

[4] It is still further established by that decision that a failure to comply with the requirement renders the attempted sale by the state invalid and ineffectual to pass any interest in the property to the purchaser. See, also, Campbell v. Moran (L. A. No. 2,732, decided November 9, 1911) 119 Pac. 89.

[5] It is therefore manifest that, without regard to any of the other points made in support of the judgment of the lower court, plaintiff was not shown to have any interest in the property, and that the finding to that effect is fully supported by the evidence.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

WHITTIER v. HOME SAVINGS BANK OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 2,641.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 417*) — PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING CONTRACT.

A construction company contracted with a city to improve certain streets, and defendant M. advanced the contractor money, taking as security assignments of the contracts. Afterwards defendant bank made other loans to the contractor, taking assignments of the same contracts, subject to M.'s rights. Plaintiff did part of the work for the construction company, and in payment received orders from it upon M. and the bank, directing them to turn over to plaintiff bonds to cover the amount of the work done, and the bank indorsed on each order, "Accepted for whatever the equity of the" construction company "may be." Thereafter, on March 1, 1909, the construction company being unable to complete the improvements, it, M., and the bank executed a written contract with plaintiff, which recited the latter's interests in doing the work on the remaining two streets to be repaired, and that plaintiff agreed to do the work for the sum of $2,600. The work was done by plaintiff, and that sum paid to him by the bank and M. Held, in an action against the bank for money received by it, which plaintiff claims should have been applied to his claims under his orders, that evidence that, when plaintiff presented his orders to the bank for acceptance, he was informed of an agreement by it with the construction company to advance further sums to that company, if necessary, on the security of the contracts assigned, did not vary the terms of the conditional acceptances of plaintiff's orders.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 516*)—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in an action for money received by defendant bank, which plaintiff claimed should have been applied to his claims under orders given to him upon the bank, and accepted by it in payment for work done in repairing streets, held to show that plaintiff and the bank contemplated that the acceptance should only apply to the equities of the general contractor existing at the completion of all the contracts.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 425*) — PAROL EVIDENCE—COLLATERAL CONTRACT.

Defendants, who were creditors of an insolvent contractor for city work for money advanced, and who held an assignment of the contract as security therefor, agreed in writing with plaintiff, a subcontractor on the work, who had received orders on defendants for payments due him, accepted by defendants to be paid out of any "equity of" the principal contractor, that plaintiff should complete the contract, for which defendants would pay him $2,600, which was done. Held, that evidence of an oral agreement between the parties that the $2,600 should be retained by defendants for their reimbursement out of the first collections on the work done by plaintiff was not objectionable, as varying the written contract for the completion of the contract by plaintiff.

The action for money had and received will not lie against a party into whose hands the money is not shown to have come.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by F. W. Whittier against the Home Savings Bank of Los Angeles and others. From a judgment for plaintiff for a less amount than claimed, he appeals. Affirmed.

Crouch & Crouch, for appellant. Scarborough & Bowen (H. M. Barstow, of counsel), for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued for something over $6,000 on a count for money had and received to his use and benefit. Judgment was given in his favor against the Bank of Los Angeles for $428.51. From this judgment he appeals.

The Tamped Oil Roads Company, a corporation, had entered into contracts to improve five streets in the city of Los Angeles known as Budlong avenue, Griffin avenue, Matthews street, Scott street, and Montana street. Defendant S. A. McCready had loaned to the corporation certain sums of money, and had taken as security for such loans assignments of certain of the contracts with the city. Subsequently the defendant Bank of Los Angeles made loans to the Tamped Oil Roads Company, and took assignments of the same contracts, subject, however, to the claims of S. A. McCready. During the progress of the work, F. W. Whittier, the plaintiff in this action, was awarded the contracts for the cement work upon all of these streets. In payment of his claims for such work, orders were given by the Tamped Oil Roads Company to Whittier. Four of these orders were dated October 31, 1908, and by each of them S. A. McCready and the Bank of Los Angeles were instructed to turn over to F. W. Whittier sufficient bonds to cover the bill of Whittier for the work done on the street mentioned in the order; the approximate amount being specified in each demand, respectively, as follows: $1,046.90 for Budlong avenue, $1,107.54 for Griffin avenue, $1,084.60 for Matthews street, and $2,948.44 for Montana street; amounts aggregating $6,187.48. On each claim the proper officer of the Bank of Los Angeles wrote, "The above order accepted for whatever the equity of the Tamped Oil Roads Company may be." These acceptances were written on the date of the orders themselves, October 31, 1908. Some time in December, 1908, the Tamped Oil Roads Company gave to Whittier a similar order for cement work done on Scott street. The amount demanded was $3,956.55, and the order was accepted precisely as the others had been. It will be seen that orders, aggregating something over $10,000, had thus been provisionally accepted by the Bank of Los Angeles prior to the year 1909. Before the acceptances of October 31, 1908, McCready and the Bank of Los Angeles had advanced to the Tamped Oil Roads Company on its interest-bearing notes secured by assignments of contracts, sums amounting in all to approximately $15,000. Between that date and December 12, 1908, the Tamped Oil Roads Company gave to the Bank of Los Angeles its notes for sums which amounted in the aggregate to $1,500.

By March 1, 1909, it had become apparent that the Tamped Oil Roads Company was insolvent and unable to complete its contracts with reference to Montana and Scott streets, and on that day an agreement was made, whereby Whittier undertook to finish the work on said streets. This contract was in writing. In it the Tamped Oil Roads Company, McCready, and the Bank of Los Angeles appeared as parties of the first part, and Whittier as the party of the second part. It recited the existence of the contracts for the work on the two streets, specified that McCready and the Bank of Los Angeles had certain interest in said contracts for money loaned for constructing said work, recited that the work had not been fully accomplished, and declared that the parties of the first part desired Whittier to complete the contracts for the street work. Then follows Whittier's engagement to do the work for the sum of $2,600. It was further agreed that this contract should in no wise affect or change the rights of Whittier under his arrangement with the Tamped Oil Roads Company to furnish the cement work for the two streets. The work under this agreement was done by Whittier, and he was paid $2,600, furnished by the Bank of Los Angeles and McCready in equal portions. This money was advanced ostensibly to the Tamped Oil Roads Company on the note of Thomas S. Hutton, its general manager, and was secured by a pledge of the capital stock of the company.

On August 6, 1909, the plaintiff owed the Bank of Los Angeles and McCready $3,244.51, and this indebtedness was paid on that date, at Whittier's request, from the proceeds of the Scott street contract. On August 9, 1909, the Tamped Oil Roads Company gave the Bank of Los Angeles written instructions, which were in part as follows: "We desire, direct and instruct that the various obligations of the Tamped Oiled Roads Company to S. A. McCready and to your bank, be paid (so far as the funds remaining after the reservations below mentioned will permit) in the order of their dates—the oldest first. In the application of the various funds of the Tamped Oiled Roads Company now in your hands and yet to be received by you, to the payment of your various indebtednesses, you will pay the said indebtednesses from the following sources: (1) Take all but $1,046.90 of the proceeds of Budlong Ave. (2) Take all but $1,107.54 of the proceeds of Griffin Ave. (3) Take all but $1,084.60 of the proceeds of Matthews St. (4) Take all but $2,948.44 of the proceeds of Montana St. These various reservations are for the purpose of paying the orders of Mr. F. W. Whittier, dated October 31, 1908. If, after making the above applications and reservations, there should be an unpaid balance on the Tamped Oiled Roads Company's indebtedness to you incurred prior to October 31, 1908, then you shall pay any such deficiency thus remaining from the amounts above reserved for F. W. Whittier."

[1, 2] Appellant's principal contentions are (1) that plaintiff's orders should have been given priority over the $2,600 advanced March 1, 1909, for the completion of the work on Montana and Scott streets; and (2) that they should have taken precedence also of the notes, aggregating $1,500, given to cover advances made after the provisional acceptances of the orders of October 31, 1908. On the trial Witness Callander, who was an officer of the Bank of Los Angeles, testified, over appellant's objection, that at the time of the making of the contract with Whittier for the completion of Scott and Montana streets there was a parol agreement between the parties to the written contract that the $2,600 advanced by McCready and the bank, for the purpose of paying appellant, should be repaid from the first collections that might come in for the finished work upon those two streets. Appellant insists that the admission of evidence of such parol agreement was in violation of sections 1624, 1625, and 1698 of the Civil Code, and section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As there was at the date of the written agreement sufficient money in the possession of the Bank of Los Angeles, collected on work performed on the four streets, exclusive of Scott street, to pay all of appellant's claims covered by the orders of October 31, 1908, appellant contends that this money was equitably his own, and that any agreement, whereby he should be obligated to permit the repayment of the note signed by Hutton out of that fund, would necessarily be in writing in order that it might be available against him; and that the introduction of parol testimony to establish such a contract is an endeavor to make him responsible for the "debt, default, or miscarriage" of another, by proof of a verbal agreement. Section 1624, subd. 2, Civ. Code. Respondent's answer to this is that Whittier's orders were accepted, subject to the equity of the Tamped Oil Roads Company, and that he took the acceptances with full knowledge that there might not be any surplus to which such orders could attach. On October 19, 1908, when the bank made a loan on a note from the Tamped Oil Roads Company for $3,500, accompanied by a second assignment of all contracts theretofore assigned, there was also a separate written assignment of the Scott street and Matthews street contracts, which was "given as a partial security for a loan made by the Bank of Los Angeles to the Tamped Oil Roads Company"; said loan bearing even date therewith. At the same time, there was a verbal agreement between the same parties that advances should be made, if necessary, up to $5,000, secured by the contracts so assigned. Such verbal agreement was not one by which the terms of the written contract were sought to be varied, but, as the court below aptly said, was admissible in evidence "to show a separate agreement about collateral on the loans thereafter to be made." When Whittier presented his orders for acceptance, he was informed of the engagement of the bank to furnish further sums for the completion of the contracts. There was ample testimony upon this point, and it was not improperly admitted, as varying the terms of the conditional acceptance, because that writing itself could not be understood without an explanation of the equities involved. Mr. Pirtle, an officer of the bank, testified that in informing Mr. Whittier why the bank would not accept his orders, except subject to the prior repayment of money loaned the contractor: "We told him it was because of the money due from the Tamped Oil Roads Company to Mr. McCready and the Bank of Los Angeles, and that we didn't know how much money it would require to complete those streets; that we couldn't tell what amount of money the Tamped Oil Roads Company would have over and above the amount furnished to complete them. Consequently we couldn't put ourselves in the position of assuming something, or accepting something, unless we knew that the money would be coming in to pay it." We think, in view of this testimony, that Whittier and the defendant Bank of Los Angeles contemplated an acceptance applicable only to the equities which might exist at the completion of all the contracts. Therefore we cannot regard Whittier as the equitable owner of the unapplied moneys collected and held by the bank when he made the verbal contract of March 1, 1909, that the $2,600 advanced should be repaid from the first collections for the finished work on the streets. It was necessary to the preservation of the security of the bank, McCready, and appellant that the street work should be finished, and it was in view of their common interest that the written contract of March 1, 1909, was made.

[3] But appellant most emphatically insists that any verbal contract made at that time must have been merged in the written agreement (Civ. Code, § 1625), and that the verbal agreement, if made, was of no avail because it sought to alter the terms of a written contract. Section 1698, Civ. Code, and section 1856, Code Civ. Proc. This would undoubtedly be true, if the written contract dealt in any way with the matter of the recoupment of the bank and McCready for their outlay of $2,600; but it does not treat of that subject. It is in its essence merely an engagement on the part of Whittier to finish the work on two streets, and the promise of the other parties to pay him $2,600. He fulfilled his engagement, and they performed their promise. In support of his position, appellant cites such cases as Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 328, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469; Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 315, 81 Pac. 964; Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 586, 96 Pac. 319; Beall v. Fisher, 95 Cal. 568, 30 Pac. 773; McDonald v. Poole, 113 Cal. 438, 45 Pac. 702; and Stone v. Harris, 146 Cal. 555, 80 Pac. 711. The first three of these are all cases in which evidence was offered to show sale by sample of commodities, mentioned in written contracts, and this court held that such evidence was not admissible to vary the terms of written contracts. The fourth case was one in which a judgment was reversed, because the plaintiff had been permitted to testify to prior agreements flatly contradicting the terms of a deed which he had accepted from defendant. The fifth case was one in which the price of certain street work was fixed by written contract, and defendant sought to establish a different price by oral testimony. Stone v. Harris was a case in which it was held that "a clause of the contract, giving to the trustees power to act as may be directed by a majority of the owners in acreage, cannot be construed to empower such majority to authorize a lien for any work not incidental to the levee system described in the contract." Respondent contends that the verbal agreement proven in this case comes under the principle laid down in such cases as Savings Bank of So. Cal. v. Asbury, 117 Cal. 103, 48 Pac. 1083, in which it was said: "The rule that an agreement in writing supersedes all prior or contemporaneous oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter has no application to a collateral agreement, upon which the instrument is silent, and which does not purport to affect the terms of the instrument." See, also, Wolters v. King, 119 Cal. 173, 51 Pac. 35; Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 519, 32 Pac. 571; Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 635, 30 Pac. 786. We think that this is the correct view of the matter. The consent to the repayment of the $2,600 which had enabled Whittier to complete the work, and thus protect his own security and that of the bank and McCready, was a most natural collateral agreement, and one that did not need to be in writing. The default of their common debtor made it highly desirable for Whittier and the other interested parties to have the work on the streets finished. Plaintiff received $2,600 for the work actually done under the written contract, and accomplished the payment of his notes for more than $3,000 from the money collected on the Scott street work. What more natural than that the creditors whose additional advances made such work possible should desire that their contributions to the common cause should operate as a first lien on the moneys collected from the city? And what more natural than a collateral agreement, whereby Whittier should consent to such an arrangement, when the advancement by the bank and McCready placed him in a position to make valuable his contingent claims, which the default of the original contractor, unless remedied by prompt measures to complete the unfinished work, might have rendered entirely valueless? There was no error in permitting proof of the oral agreement.

What has been said about the repayment of the $2,600 applies in large measure to the notes aggregating $1,500. We have previously discussed plaintiff's knowledge of the fact that the assignment of all contracts for street work as of October 19, 1908, had been made to secure future as well as past advances, and we have shown that his equities were to depend upon and be determined at the time of a final settlement. Therefore the advances equal to the sum of $1,500, although made after the signing of the provisional acceptances, created liens upon the moneys obtained from the city and those liens were payable prior to his claims.

[4] Appellant contends that the judgment should have run also against the Home Savings Bank, but, although it was shown that the Home Savings Bank had taken over certain assets of the Bank of Los Angeles there was no showing that the contracts and collections involved in this suit were among such assigned matters. Nor was there any error in refusing to give judgment against S. A. McCready and A. W. McCready, her attorney in fact, even if it be conceded that the Bank of Los Angeles acted as their agent. A. W. McCready testified positively that he never saw one of Whittier's orders from the Tamped Oil Roads Company until the morning of the trial, and doubtless the court believed him. Additionally it must be remembered that this was an action for moneys had and received, and according to the uncontradicted testimony the Bank of Los Angeles had collected all payments made by the city on contracts for street work. There was no evidence that either of the McCreadys had received any of these moneys. No further alleged errors require notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re FITZGERALD'S ESTATE.

(L. A. 2,958.)

1. Wills (§ 647*)—Construction—Restraints on Marriage.

A will which gives to testator's widow the residue of his estate for life, "except as hereinafter qualified," and on her death the remainder to his son absolutely, and which declares that in the event of the remarriage of the widow the estate shall be divided, and one-third shall go to the widow and two-thirds to the son absolutely, gives to the widow all the residue during widowhood, and is not invalid, as in restraint of marriage, within Civ. Code, § 710, providing that conditions imposing restraints on marriage, except on the marriage of a minor, are void, but not affecting limitations, where the intent is not to forbid marriage, but only to give the use until marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1533–1538; Dec. Dig. § 647.*]

2. Executors and Administrators (§ 315*)—Distribution of Estate—Construction of Will—Conclusiveness.

Where the construction of a will is necessarily presented for decision on a petition for final distribution, a decision, construing the will, is conclusive on the beneficiaries.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Proceedings for the final distribution of the estate of Frank A. Fitzgerald. From a decree of final distribution, Edward B. Fitzgerald appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Thos. C. Ridgway, for appellant. Hass, Garrett & Dunnigan and Charles S. Burnell, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a decree of final distribution.

The deceased died testate, leaving him surviving his wife, Lillian A. Fitzgerald, and a son, Edward B. Fitzgerald, and leaving an estate, consisting of real and personal property, valued at about $13,000. His will, after providing for the payment of debts, expenses of last sickness and burial, and costs of administration, and the payment of a legacy of $500 to his son, Edward B., provided as follows:

"3rd. To my wife, Lillian A. Fitzgerald, I give, devise and bequeath the entire use of the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real and personal and wheresoever situated, for the term of her natural life, except as hereinafter qualified, and upon her death the remainder of my estate shall go to and vest absolutely in my son, Edward B. Fitzgerald.

"4. In the event, however, that my said wife shall mary again, then I will and direct that the provisions made in paragraph three, shall immediately cease and terminate, and my estate be divided as follows: to my wife, one-third and to my son two-thirds thereof absolutely and in fee simple, and in such case, the five hundred dollar legacy to my son named in paragraph two shall be estimated as a part of my estate in making said division, and if previously paid shall be deducted from the share to be received by him.

"5th. In the event that my said son shall die before me leaving no issue, I give, devise and bequeath to my wife, Lillian A. Fitzgerald, all my estate, real and personal and wheresoever situated, absolutely and without condition after the provisions of paragraph one have been met and satisfied. However, should my wife come into the possession of my entire estate as herein provided, and not marry again, or having married again have no issue, it is my desire and request that she will dispose of what may remain of my estate at her death in favor of my brother James E. Fitzgerald or his children, but this request shall in no way limit or affect her rights or power of absolute disposition of said estate."

By the will, the wife was appointed executrix without bonds.

The will having been admitted to probate, the administration of the estate was proceeded with to the settlement of the final account and distribution of the residue of the estate, valued at something over $12,000; all charges of administration, debts, and the legacy to the son, having been paid. The contest on distribution was between the widow, who has not married again, and the son; the widow claiming that the fourth provision of the will is void, as being a prohibited condition in restraint of marriage, and that she was entitled to have distributed to her the whole residue of the estate for the term of her natural life, with the remainder over on her death to the son. The lower court adopted this view, and distributed the residue of the estate accordingly, viz., "to said Lillian A. Fitzgerald for the term of her natural life, she to have the entire use thereof during said term, with the remainder on her death to Edward B. Fitzgerald." This is an appeal by said Edward B. Fitzgerald from such decree.

[1] In this state, the rule in regard to conditions imposing restraints upon marriage is to be found in our Civil Code; section 710 thereof providing as follows: "Conditions imposing restraints upon marriage, except upon the marriage of a minor, are void; but this does not affect limitations where the intent was not to forbid marriage, but only to give the use until marriage." The main contention of appellant is that, in the case at bar, taking all of the provisions of the will together, there was no intent to forbid marriage, but simply an intent to give the use of all of the property until marriage, and that the provisions of the will should be construed as giving merely the use of all the property until marriage, and not an estate upon condition subsequent.

Learned counsel for the widow admits that all the authorities compel the conclusion that a gift to a wife "during such time as she shall remain my widow," or "until her second marriage," without other words indicating a life estate, would be a valid disposition, both under the common law and under section 710, Civil Code, and that the estate thus given would terminate ipso facto upon the remarriage of the wife. It is admitted that in such a case there would be no taking of a larger estate, determinable upon condition subsequent, but simply a valid limitation. But it is urged that the will is so written that a life estate in the residue was first given, and that it was then sought to make this life estate subject to a condition subsequent, working a divestiture in the event of remarriage.

Taking all of the provisions of the will together, the general intention of the testator is very clear. There is not the slightest indication that there was any design on his part to deter his wife from contracting another marriage, or that he had any objection whatever to her so doing. All of the provisions are consistent only with the idea that he felt it was fair and necessary that she should have the use of all the residue of his estate for her support and maintenance so long as she remained his widow, but that if she married again, thus presumably obtaining other means of support, the son ought properly to receive his fair share of the property at once, and the residue should be at once divided between the wife and the son in such proportions as seemed equitable. If she never contracted another marriage, the use of all the residue would be necessary to her during the term of her natural life, and the only thing he could fairly do for the son was to give him the remainder upon her death. If she did marry, her right to the use of all the residue should at once cease, and she would take absolutely and in fee one-third of such residue, and the son should take in the same way the remaining two-thirds. If the son should die before the testator, leaving no issue, thus leaving the wife as the sole person as to whom obligation existed to make provision for, she was to take absolutely and without condition the whole estate after payment of debts, etc., even though, as was expressly recognized, she might marry again. This was clearly the intended scheme of the testator, a scheme absolutely fair, and to which, in view of section 710, Civil Code, there can be no legal objection. Practically the only question here is whether this clear intent has been expressed in such legal form that the courts may carry it into execution. Respondent would have us, in an endeavor to defeat this intention, construe the provisions of the will as showing that the testator has adopted a prohibited mode of accomplishing his purpose, viz., that he gave his wife an estate for her natural life, and then attempted to make this life estate subject to a condition subsequent against remarriage. We do not think that such a construction of the language is at all necessary or reasonable.

The third and fourth provisions of the will before us, which must be read together, may certainly be reasonably construed as giving the use of the residue to the wife only to the time of her marriage. What is said in the third provision as to the use for the term of her natural life is immediately followed therein by the words "except as hereinafter qualified," and the qualification is, "in the event, however, that my said wife shall marry again," then the "provisions made in paragraph three shall immediately cease and terminate." It is precisely as though he had written "for and during her natural life, unless she shall marry again, in which case this provision shall immediately cease, and my estate be divided as follows," etc., which was substantially the language considered in Mann v. Jackson, 84 Me. 400, 24 Atl. 886, 16 L. R. A. 707, 30 Am. St. Rep. 358. The court there, noting the recognized distinction between conditions in restraint of marriage annexed to testamentary dispositions, and restraint on marriage contained in the very terms of the limitation of the estate given, and the policy of the courts, when not restrained by compulsory rules, "to seek to discover the intention of the testator from the whole instrument, rather than from any particular form of words," had no difficulty in deciding that, in view of the clear intent of the testator, evidenced by all the provisions of the will, "if it is here necessary and proper to recognize and maintain the distinction between a limitation and condition subsequent, the language of this will should be held to constitute a valid limitation, and not an illegal condition." In Holbrook v. Bunker, 213 Pa. 93, 62 Atl. 368, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 545, 110 Am. St. Rep. 537, the gift was to a niece of the testatrix "during the term of her natural life, or so long as she remains unmarried," with a gift over "in case of her death or marriage." It is apparent that there is no substantial distinction between this language and the language used in the will before us. It was the view of the court that it was the intent of the testatrix, not to prohibit marriage, but simply to provide an income to the legatee so long as she was unmarried and presumably dependent on her own exertions for her maintenance. It was substantially said that it would be a reproach to the law that, of two donors intending to do exactly the same thing, one shall succeed, and the other fail as a violator of law, merely because one scrivener knew what he was about, and wrote "so long as the donee shall remain unmarried," and the other was ignorant or careless, and wrote "for life, if so long the donee remains unmarried." The words of the will were held appropriate to show an intention, not to prohibit or restrain marriage, but simply to provide for the use of the property by the donee so long as she remained unmarried, and the provision was upheld as a valid limitation. As we have seen, the plain intent of the testator here was not in any degree to restrain or even to discourage marriage by his widow, but simply to postpone any division of the residue of his estate between her and his son while she remained unmarried, and to give to her during such time the sole use thereof. The language that he has used, taking all the provisions of the will together, is appropriate to show and does show this intention, and we are satisfied that there is nothing in any of the particular words used that requires us to hold that there is any prohibited condition imposing a restraint upon marriage.

Estate of Alexander, 149 Cal. 146, 85 Pac. 308, relied on by respondent, is not in point. The will in that case, by reason of its own peculiar language, was construed as showing the intent to give the property to a daughter "on condition that she remains unmarried." It was said that the language used imported a condition, and no reason appeared why it should be given any other construction. In this regard, the provisions of the will differed materially from those of the will before us, and the construction there given does not assist here. Assuming that the will did give to the daughter, on condition that she remains unmarried, it was simply held that the condition of remaining unmarried was given full operation by referring the time of its performance to the death of the testator, and that the daughter, not having married at that time, took an absolute fee in the property, free of condition. The portion of the opinion quoted by respondent, reading as follows, viz., "But if it be said that the intent was that this language should constitute a condition subsequent, terminating her estate in fee, and vesting it in others on her marriage at any time, the condition would be void, as in restraint of marriage," is, of course, correct; but it has no bearing whatever on the questions presented by the case at bar.

[2] It is not to be doubted that the question here discussed was necessarily presented for decision on the petition for final distribution, or that any decision reached thereon will be conclusive as to the respective rights of the devisees and legatees. See Jewell v. Pierce, 120 Cal. 79, 52 Pac. 132.

It follows from what we have said that the residue of the estate of deceased should be distributed in accord with the third and fourth provisions of the will.

The decree appealed from is reversed, and the matter remanded for proceedings, not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

THOMSON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MENDOCINO COUNTY et al.

(S. F. 5,821.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 155*)—APPEAL—"RENDITION OF JUDGMENT."

Within Code Civ. Proc. § 974, authorizing appeal from a justice within a certain time after the "rendition" of the judgment, judgment is not rendered till it is "entered," and mere entry of memorandum of the verdict is not enough; as, while section 891 provides that in case of trial by jury judgment must be entered by the justice "at once," in conformity with the verdict, section 893 provides that it must be entered substantially in the form required by section 667, and that "no judgment shall have effect for any purpose till so entered."

In Bank. Certiorari on the petition of Henry T. Thomson, directed to the Superior Court of the County of Mendocino and J. Q. White, judge thereof. Writ dismissed.

Preston & Preston, for petitioner. McNab & Hirsch, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. A writ of certiorari was issued from this court, directed to the superior court of Mendocino county and the judge thereof, requiring the certification here of the proceedings in the case of Ed. Gibson v. Henry T. Thomson et al., appealed to the said superior court from the justice's court of Round Valley township, county of Mendocino. In his petition, Thomson prayed for a writ of certiorari and for mandate, to compel the setting of the appealed case for trial in the superior court.

The action in the justice's court was in claim and delivery. Trial was had before a jury, and a verdict in favor of the plaintiff was rendered on June 25, 1910. On the same day, the justice of the peace made an entry in his docket as follows: "June 25. Court called and a jury of twelve men sworn to try the case. After hearing the evidence they brought in a verdict for plaintiff for the return of the horse or $100.00 in lieu thereof, and costs of suit." On June 27th plaintiff served and filed his memorandum of costs. On June 30th defendant Thomson's attorneys prepared his notice of appeal to the superior court, and served it upon plaintiff. Thomson's attorneys also caused an undertaking on appeal in the sum of $300 to be prepared. About July 18th the notice of appeal was sent to the justice of the peace by the attorneys for Thomson, accompanied by a letter, in which he was requested to make sure that the judgment was entered as of June 25, 1910, and to file the notice of appeal before filing the bond. Similar directions were sent with the form of appeal bond to the defendant, who caused it to be signed by two sureties. It was then given to the justice for filing. The undertaking, however, was filed July 18, 1910, and the notice of appeal on July 20th, 19 days after service of said notice on the plaintiff. On the 15th of August, 1910, the justice of the peace entered in his docket a formal judgment.

These proceedings were duly certified to the superior court, and respondent in that cause moved said court to dismiss the appeal upon the grounds that (1) it was premature, as no judgment had been entered on June 25, 1910, and no appeal had been taken within 30 days after the entry of judgment of August 15, 1910; and that (2) no undertaking on appeal had been filed with the justice of the peace. The motion was granted upon both grounds; the court basing the ruling as to the second ground upon the circumstance that the undertaking was filed before and not within 30 days after the filing of the notice of appeal. The superior court also denied appellant Thomson's motion to set the cause for trial. In the answer to the petition herein, counsel for respondent point out the fact that the undertaking on appeal, although it contains a form of verification, signed by both sureties, shows no signature to the jurat by the justice of the peace, or any other person empowered to administer and certify oaths.

The most important question for consideration is whether or not the entry of the verdict by the justice of the peace on June 25, 1910, was a sufficient compliance with the law's requirement that the judgment shall be entered. Section 893 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "The judgment of a justice of the peace must be entered substantially in the form required in section 667, and where the defendant is subject to arrest and imprisonment thereon, the fact must be stated in the judgment. No judgment shall have effect for any purpose until so entered." The last sentence was added to the section in 1907. Respondent contends that by the addition of the final sentence the Legislature intended to place appeals from justices' courts upon the same footing as those taken from judgments of the superior court, and to make the section above quoted analogous to section 664 of the same Code. He insists, therefore, that an appeal taken from a judgment in a justice's court prior to the final entry of such judgment is premature, and must be dismissed; citing McHugh v. Adkins, 117 Cal. 228, 49 Pac. 2; Bell v. Staacke, 137 Cal. 307, 70 Pac. 171; Estate of More, 143 Cal. 493, 77 Pac. 407. In reply to the contention that the memorandum of the jury's verdict in the docket is practically an entry of the judgment, he insists that, since section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to which reference is made by section 893 of the same Code, prescribes the form of a judgment, the form has become substance, citing Simmons v. McCarthy, 118 Cal. 624, 50 Pac. 761. Our attention is also called to the fact that the justice is required to enter in his docket separately "the verdict of the jury and when received," and "the judgment of the court specifying the costs included and the time when rendered." Subdivisions 8 and 9 of section 911, Code Civ. Proc.

Petitioner calls our attention to Lynch v. Kelly, 41 Cal. 233, and Montgomery v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 407, 9 Pac. 720, as having settled the question here presented. But respondent insists that those decisions are not now in point, because they dealt with the law as it existed before the mandatory provision contained in the last sentence of section 893, Code of Civil Procedure, had become a part of that section. The former case was one in which there was an attempt to set aside a sale, made under an execution issued from a justice's court, on the ground that no formal entry of judgment had been made prior to the issuance of execution. Whether there could be an appeal from a judgment when no judgment had been entered was not considered. The case of Montgomery v. Superior Court, supra, was considered by the District Court of Appeal of the Third appellate district, in the recent case of June v. Superior Court, 116 Pac. 293. The court was considering a case exactly like the one before us in the particular that an attempted appeal from a judgment of a justice's court had been dismissed for want of jurisdiction, where the transcript of the justice's docket showed only an entry of the verdict of the jury. The court, by Mr. Presiding Justice Chipman said: "Section 974, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that: 'Any person dissatisfied with a judgment rendered in a civil action in a police or justice's court, may appeal therefrom to the superior court of the county, at any time within thirty days after the rendition of the judgment.' And the notice must state whether 'the appeal is taken from the whole or a part of the judgment.' Section 891, Code of Civil Procedure, reads: 'When a trial by a jury has been had, judgment must be entered by the justice at once, in conformity with the verdict.' And the judgment 'must be entered substantially in the form required in section six hundred and sixty-seven. * * * No judgment shall have effect for any purpose until so entered.' Section 893, Code Civ. Proc. It seems to us that the appeal was prematurely taken, and that the superior court did not acquire jurisdiction thereby. Montgomery v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 407, 9 Pac. 720, is cited by petitioner in support of the claim that the verdict was a judgment, within the meaning of the statute. In that case the justice's docket contained the following entry: 'Jury fees paid by defendant and judgment entered for the defendant for costs of suit. Defendant's costs being $25, for witness and jury fees, and also the sum of $1.75 for constable fees, total $26.75. Plaintiff's costs being $17.' It further appears that the petitioner went to trial in the superior court, and, without objection to the regularity of any proceedings, defended the case on its merits. Said the court: 'Having thus taken the chances of obtaining a verdict in his favor, we think his objection now comes too late.' It was also held that the court had jurisdiction, because the justice's record showed 'that a judgment had been entered in conformity with the verdict, and appears to be in all respects regular and sufficient.' We do not think that the justice must formulate a judgment with that particularity required of judgments required to be entered in the superior court; but that he should make some entry in his docket, showing that he has rendered judgment on the verdict, we do think is essential to a substantial compliance with the statute. His duty to enter judgment is in a sense ministerial, and its performance could probably be enforced by mandate; but nevertheless the statute requires this of him. Until such entry is made, there is no judgment from which an appeal may be taken, and, if the appeal is taken before the justice enters judgment on the verdict, it confers no jurisdiction on the superior court." We see no escape from the conclusion reached in the above case.

Our attention has been called to the difference between section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 974 of the same Code; the one providing that an appeal from a judgment in a court of record may not be taken until after the entry of judgment, while the time for an appeal from a judgment in a justice's court begins to run upon its rendition. We think it is apparent from an examination of the section of our Code, relating to justices' courts, that a judgment therein is not "rendered" until it is "entered," or can legally be held to be "entered." There is no other way of "rendering" a judgment in such a court. See sections 891, 892, and 893, Code Civ. Proc. It is in this sense that the word should be held to be used in section 974, Code of Civil Procedure. Doubtless it is the justice's duty to enter the judgment promptly. Section 891, Code Civ. Proc. But, until he does so, there is no "rendition" of the judgment, in the sense used in section 974. If he refuse, he may be compelled to act.

Our conclusion upon the point discussed above makes it unnecessary to review the other questions presented by the record.

Let the writ be dismissed.

LANG v. LILLEY & THURSTON CO. et al.

(S. F. 5,925.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 7, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 607*)—RECORD—MANNER OF PROCURING.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 941a, 941b, 941c, enacted by St. 1907, p. 753, authorizing the taking of an appeal by the filing of a notice of appeal in the office of the clerk of the trial court, and sections 953a, 953b, 953c, enacted by St. 1907, p. 750, providing that when an appeal is taken a typewritten transcript may be made and filed, are independent, and where an appeal is taken under the first sections appellant may file a printed transcript and copies thereof as required by the rules of the Supreme Court, or he may file the typewritten transcript, or where he takes an appeal by serving and filing a notice of appeal and undertaking, as authorized by section 940, he may support it either by a transcript prepared and filed under sections 953a, 953b, 953c, or by a transcript printed and filed as directed by the rules of the Supreme Court.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Joakim Lang, as administrator of Albert Lang, deceased, against the Lilley & Thurston Company and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

Costello & Costello, for appellant. Samuel Rosenheim and Bernard Silverstein, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The respondents move to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no proper transcript on appeal was filed within the time allowed by the rules of this court. The appeal is from the judgment only.

The facts upon which the motion to dismiss is based are that the appeal was taken in the manner provided in sections 941a, 941b, and 941c of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the transcript is printed and filed in this court in accord with our rules; and that no notice was given to the clerk to prepare a transcript on appeal, and it was not prepared in the manner provided in sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of said Code.

The act of 1907, enacting sections 941a, 941b, and 941c as new sections of the Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1907, p. 753), provides that an appeal may be taken by the filing of a notice of appeal in the office of the clerk of the superior court. Under this mode of taking an appeal, no undertaking on appeal need be given, and the notice of appeal need not be served upon the adverse party.

The act of 1907, enacting sections 953a, 953b, and 953c as new sections of said Code (Stats. 1907, p. 750), provides that, when an appeal is taken, a typewritten transcript on appeal may be made up, as therein directed, and may be filed without printed copies.

These two statutes are entirely independent of each other. If an appeal is taken under sections 941a, 941b, and 941c, the appellant may follow it up by filing a printed transcript and copies thereof, as required by the rules of the Supreme Court, or, at his option, by filing the typewritten transcript authorized by sections 953a, 953b, and 953c. Conversely, if he takes his appeal as provided in section 940, Code of Civil Procedure, by serving and filing a notice of appeal and undertaking on appeal, he may support such appeal either by a transcript prepared and filed under sections 953a, 953b, and 953c, or by a transcript printed and filed as was customary previous to the enactment of those sections and as directed by the rules of this court.

The consequence is that the motion of the respondents is not well taken. The court has jurisdiction of the appeal by the filing of a notice either under section 940 or under sections 941a, etc., and that jurisdiction is not ousted by the method of preparing or filing the transcript. It may be gotten up and filed under the old method or under the new method, as the appellant may choose.

The motion is denied.

ERGO v. MERCED FALLS GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (Sac. 1,751.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 9, 1911.)

1. Master and Servant (§ 236*)—Injury to Servant—Contributory Negligence.

A servant who momentarily forgets a known danger, merely because he fails to exercise his memory, and where nothing has happened to confuse or distract him, is guilty of contributory negligence, precluding a recovery for injuries received in consequence thereof.

2. Master and Servant (§ 236*)—Injury to Servant—Contributory Negligence.

Where a servant knew that electric wires of his master were dangerous, and that for that reason he deemed it necessary to avoid them, and that his coming in contact with them was not due to ignorance of the danger, but due to his forgetfulness at the moment of doing a particular work in the line of his service, he was, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by D. J. Ergo against the Merced Falls Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. G. Ostrander and C. H. Wilson, for appellant. F. W. Henderson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendant has appealed from the judgment below, and also from an order denying a new trial.

Plaintiff sued to recover damages caused by an electric shock received by him while he was in the service of the defendant. The basis of his complaint is that he was directed by defendant to work in a place where he would be in close proximity to the defendant's wires, charged with a high power and dangerous electric current, and that defendant negligently failed to inform him that the electricity was then turned on to the wires, or of the dangers therefrom; that he did not know the current was on, and was ignorant of the dangers thereof and of the means of avoiding shocks therefrom; and that, while working in that place as directed, he received a severe shock of electricity from said wires, causing the damage sued for.

The defendant denied that it had directed the plaintiff to work in the dangerous place alleged, and alleged that it gave the plaintiff directions to avoid the wires in question, and instructed him in regard to the dangers from the electricity carried by them; and that the accident was caused by his failing to observe due care with respect thereto, while in proximity to the wires. Inasmuch as we have concluded that the latter defense is established by the plaintiff's own testimony, we shall not refer to the place in which he was at work further than is necessary to elucidate his testimony.

The defendant is supplying electricity to the city of Merced and its inhabitants by electricity from a generating plant at Merced Falls, on the Merced river. It is carried on three wires to a transformer house in Merced, whence it is distributed to the consumers. The accident occurred at the transformer house, which was then in course of construction. Plaintiff was working for defendant as a plumber's helper, putting water pipes in said transformer house to connect with perforated cooling pipes on the roof thereof. The house had three roofs, but we are concerned with only two, which we shall call the main roof and the upper roof. The main roof covers the entire house. The upper roof covers only eight feet in width of the main roof, four feet on each side of the comb thereof, and is nearly five feet above the main roof, with walls extending from its eaves down to the main roof, both at the ends and sides. The cooling pipes were situated on the upper roof, one on each side of the crest. The plaintiff and a plumber named Bone were laying pipes to connect the water main with these cooling pipes. The three power wires, from one of which plaintiff received the shock, extend from a pole near the south end of the house into the space between the two roofs, and were there fastened to three insulators, 15 inches apart, on a cross arm, from which they were carried to the transformers. As plaintiff understood and undertook to execute the directions of the defendant with respect to the manner of attaching these connecting pipes, it was necessary to run the pipe into the space between these two roofs, and there, by means of an elbow, continue it by a so-called standpipe, about five feet long, through the roof to a connection with the cooling pipes. It was while he was engaged in attaching this standpipe to the elbow below, after it had been handed to him by Bone, who was on the upper roof above, through a hole which Bone had made in the roof for that purpose, that the plaintiff received the injury. On the north end of the house, there were other wires passing from the house, for the distribution of the current.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In answer to special interrogatories, the jury found that the plaintiff believed that the wires at the point where he was then engaged were free from electric current and harmless, and that he had not been warned of the danger which might result from coming in contact with said wires sufficiently to enable him to appreciate the extent of the danger. It also found specially that he had not been warned to be careful of said wires. In view of the evidence, this finding must have been intended to mean that he had not been warned to be careful with respect to the wires entering the south end of the house. The evidence showed without conflict that he had been warned with regard to the wires at the north end.

In regard to the warning given to him by the defendant, plaintiff's testimony was as follows: One Parker, defendant's foreman in charge of a gang of men laying water mains, directed Bone and the plaintiff how they should lay the pipes. In doing so, he first placed a ladder at the north end of the house, going up the ladder to the top of the roof; plaintiff following next up the ladder, and Bone coming last. The wires passing out of the north end of the house came within about 18 inches of the ladder. As they ascended the ladder, Parker said, "Look out for the wires." These wires were then in plain sight, and no others were visible from that point. This was the only warning that was given to the plaintiff. Parker, it is true, said that he told Bone and Ergo how to lay the pipes, and directed them "to keep away from all wires, as they were dangerous." In view of the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, we must regard the plaintiff's testimony on this subject as correct, so far as it is inconsistent with that of Parker. It may be conceded that this warning would not have been sufficient to a person who was himself ignorant of the characteristics or dangers of electricity when carried on such wires. It appears, however, from the whole of the plaintiff's testimony that he was not so ignorant as to be unaware of this danger, although he endeavored to impress the jury with the fact that he was. The pleadings admit that at that time he was 23 years of age.

His testimony in chief on this point was in effect as follows: At the time he went into the space between the roofs to attach the standpipe, he did not know that there was a current of electricity passing over the wires at that end of the building, and did not think that there was. He did not know what the wires were. He knew they had nothing but common wire. He did not know that there were any electric wires, or anything about the wires, or that there were wires conducting the electricity from the plant of the defendant to the transformer. He had never had any experience in electrical work, and knew nothing about the handling of electrical wires.

His testimony on cross-examination was as follows: When 12 years of age he went to work as cashboy in a big Chicago department store, which was lighted by electricity. The city of Chicago was also lighted by electricity at that time. He knew that electricity furnished light, but did not know it caused the light. He had never heard that, and had never paid any attention to it. He had lived six months in Alameda, which city was lighted by electricity, and had electric cars running. He had ridden on them often, and had seen the motormen stop and start the cars, but had never asked any questions about it, and did not know how they were propelled. He had seen them climb the hills in San Francisco, and had thought it singular that they could do it without horses, but made no inquiry, and knew not how it was done, nor what the power was. The city of Merced was lighted with electricity, and he had lived there four or five years immediately prior to the accident. He had seen pumps working in Merced with wires connecting with them, but did not make any inquiry about them. He was absolutely ignorant of what is meant by a current of electricity, or a live wire, and he did not know that electric wires carried a force of electricity or power that was used for power and lights. When he was cautioned to look out for the wires, he understood that it was dangerous to come in contact with them, and that he must keep away from them. When Parker showed him how to lay the pipe at the south end of the building, where the injury occurred, he gave no warning to be careful of the wires. When he went in between the two roofs to attach the standpipe, he saw the three wires leading in there, and was careful to avoid them. Being asked "Why?" he said, "In case there was electricity in them, and in case there was not," and added that if there was he would avoid the wire, but that he did not know that it would be dangerous if he came in contact with it, nor whether the caution given applied to the wires at the south end or not. At the moment he was attaching the standpipe to the elbow, he did not pay any attention how close he was to the nearest wire. He was then busy getting the pipe together, and wanted to be quick, because he and Bone had been told that they were slow, and that they were to hurry the work. This, he supposed, caused him to forget everything about the wires at the moment of adjusting the pipe, although he had thought of them a moment before. He saw the wires above him after he got in between the roofs, but when Bone passed the piece of pipe through the hole in the roof down to him he took hold of it, and then the wires passed out of his mind entirely. He attempted to insert the pipe into the elbow, received the electric shock, and was rendered unconscious. The jury found that the piece of standpipe, in order to extend from the roof above to the elbow, must be passed within 7 inches of one or more of the wires.

[1, 2] It is obvious from this testimony that the defendant was aware of the fact that the wires at the south end of the transformer house were dangerous, and that for that reason he deemed it necessary to avoid them, and that his coming in contact with them was not due to ignorance of the danger, but to his forgetfulness thereof at the moment of attaching the pipe. The case is not like Giraudi v. Electric Imp. Co., 107 Cal. 125, 40 Pac. 108, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114, and similar cases, where it is said that a momentary failure to recollect something which had been observed some time in the past, when there is no reason or occasion to take note of it, does not, as matter of law, constitute negligence, but may or may not be negligence in fact according to the circumstances, and that in such a case it is for the jury to consider whether or not it was negligence. There was nothing unusual or unexpected in the work the plaintiff was then doing. The complaint that they were slow and the order to hurry up was made to them in the afternoon of the previous day. There was no emergency or unexpected event at the moment of attaching the pipe to confuse or agitate him; no sudden necessity for haste or hurry in that particular operation, or at that moment, to distract his attention from the wires. He had them in mind the moment before, and avoided them. It is negligence for one thus to remember and avoid a known danger in one moment, and forget it the next, when nothing has happened to confuse or distract him, or cause such forgetfulness, except his own failure to exercise his memory. The case is not one of the exceptional kind, in which such forgetfulness may not be incompatible with reasonable care. Brett v. Frank, 153 Cal. 272, 94 Pac. 1051. It follows therefore that the injury the plaintiff received was caused in part at least by his own contributory negligence. Such being the case, he cannot recover from the defendant the damages caused thereby.

[3] The defendant claims that the court erred in instructing the jury as to what constitutes a preponderance of the evidence. A part of the instruction complained of is as follows: "If the weight of all the evidence in the case tending to prove the fact is of greater weight than all the evidence tending to disprove the fact, then the fact is said to be proven by a preponderance of the evidence." This passage taken alone is erroneous. It is obvious that the evidence tending to prove a fact might be so slight that it would fail to satisfy the jury of the existence of the fact, and yet it might be of greater weight than other evidence introduced, which would tend to disprove the fact. In such case the fact could not be said to be proven, either by a preponderance of the evidence or at all. But this passage cannot be thus taken from the context, nor separated from the other instructions given. It was contained in an instruction pointing out to the jury the difference between the proof, beyond a reasonable doubt, that was necessary to justify a conviction in a criminal case, and the proof by a preponderance of the evidence, necessary in a civil case. In instruction 10, given at the request of the defendant, the court charged that: "The rules applicable to a case of this character cannot be given you in a single sentence, and that there must necessarily be many exceptions and modifications to many of the rules of law that I give to you. For that reason, you must consider this charge as a whole, and so apply it as a whole to all the evidence in this case. You are not at liberty to judge the evidence by some single rule that you may pick out from this charge, and which seems to meet with your approval, but you must judge the evidence by all of the rules, with their exceptions and modifications, as I give them to you in this charge." Other instructions declare that all the facts necessary to establish the plaintiff's case must be proven by a preponderance of the evidence. Instruction 31, given at the request of the defendant, was in part as follows: "The burden of proving carelessness or negligence rests on the plaintiff, and in this case, before plaintiff is entitled to your verdict, he must produce a preponderance of the evidence; that is to say, show to a moral certainty, or, in other words, introduce that degree of proof that produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind, that the defendant was guilty of carelessness or negligence directly causing the accident and injury complained of. * * * All that is required of defendant is that it produce evidence enough to offset the effect of plaintiff's evidence, and if, at the end of the case, the plaintiff has not shown by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant was guilty of carelessness or negligence directly causing the accident or injury complained of, or if the evidence is equally balanced, or if you are satisfied from the evidence that the accident was due to the carelessness or negligence of the plaintiff, or that by the exercise of ordinary care plaintiff could have guarded against or prevented the same, then I instruct you that your verdict in this case must be in favor of the defendant." In view of these latter instructions, we cannot say that the passage from the instruction first quoted would have been sufficiently injurious of itself to have justified the reversal of the order denying a new trial. But for the reasons heretofore given the motion should have been granted.

The judgment and order are reversed.

MARRE et al. v. UNION OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 895.)

1. Injunction (§ 135*)—Remedy in Damages—Denial.

Where an owner of land granted defendant the right to lay pipe lines for carrying oil and telephone and telegraph lines, to be used in connection with the operation of such pipe lines, and defendant was not insolvent, it was not an abuse of discretion to refuse a preliminary injunction restraining the laying of the pipe lines, on the ground that they were to be used to carry water, and not petroleum, where in the affidavits of defendant it was stated that the pipe line would be used to transport oil and its products, and other fluids defendant might require in the conduct of its business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 135.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 954*)—Discretion of Trial Court—Injunctions.

The issuance of a preliminary injunction rests in the discretion of the trial court, and will not be interfered with in the absence of an abuse of such discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by Gaspar O. Marre, individually and as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Luigi Marre, and another, against the Union Oil Company of California and another. From an order vacating a temporary restraining order, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

S. V. Wright, for appellants. Paul M. Gregg, for respondents.

JAMES, J. [1] Plaintiffs brought this action for the purpose of securing an injunction to prevent defendants from laying a pipe line along and across a certain strip of land in the county of San Luis Obispo for use in the conveyance of water. Upon the filing of a verified complaint an order was issued to defendants requiring them to appear before the court, and show cause why an injunction pendente lite should not be granted. A temporary restraining order was made to prevent the doing of the acts alleged as being threatened to be done on the part of defendants. The matter came on to be heard, the plaintiffs resting their application upon an amended complaint filed at the time of the hearing on the order to show cause. Dedefendant resisted the application for a temporary injunction, and filed in evidence two affidavits and two certain deeds, whereupon the court denied said application and vacated the temporary restraining order theretofore made. From this order the plaintiffs have appealed.

It appears without dispute by the amended complaint of plaintiffs, and the affidavits submitted on the part of defendants, that the strip of land along which the pipe line was threatened to be constructed was included within a certain right of way acquired for railroad purposes in 1883 by the Pacific Coast Railway Company, and over which said company was then operating a line of railroad. The fee title to this land was admittedly in the estate of Luigi Marre, deceased, represented by the plaintiff Gaspar O. Marre as administrator thereof. In January, 1906, plaintiff Gaspar O. Marre as administrator, after due proceedings had authorizing him so to do, deeded to the defendant corporation certain lands, said deed including within its terms a grant of a right of way to defendant across and along land which included the right of way theretofore granted to the Pacific Coast Railway Company. This latter grant authorized defendant to "lay pipe lines for the carrying of petroleum oil and its by-products, and telephone and telegraph lines to be used in connection with the operation and maintenance of said pipe lines." over and along the property just mentioned. The contention of plaintiffs is that they were entitled to a temporary injunction because it was not denied on the part of defendant that the use to which the pipe line about to be constructed by it was to be put was to have water conveyed through the same and not petroleum oil or any of its by-products. It seems very clear to us from the recitals in the deed of conveyance by which the right of way for pipe lines was acquired by defendant that the uses for which the way was granted did not include the use of a pipe line for the conveyance of water. However, in one of the affidavits submitted on the part of defendant, the following statement appears: "That for the purpose of transporting oil and its products, and for the purpose of transporting such other fluids as it may require in the proper conduct of its business and have the right to transport by means of pipe lines, said defendant is now engaged in constructing a four-inch pipe line from Port San Luis to its said lands at Avila, which said pipe line is to be constructed of standard wrought iron capable of standing high pressure, and is adapted to and capable of being used for the transportation of any and all fluid substances." With this affidavit before it, the trial court then had evidence that a part at least of the uses to which the pipe line was to be put were those which could properly be claimed as the right of defendant under the terms of the conveyance made to it. It may be said that there was no sufficient denial of the fact asserted by plaintiffs, that among other uses the defendant proposed to have water conveyed through said pipe line. The relief asked for in the action included an injunction to restrain the laying of the pipe, as well as the transportation of water therethrough. Upon the evidence before it the court was justified in concluding that there was insufficient ground to entitle plaintiffs to an injunction to prevent the laying of the pipe. While it may be admitted that, if the facts as shown to the court had constituted the whole of the evidence considered upon a final trial of the action, a sufficient showing would then be made out to entitle plaintiffs to an injunction to prevent water from being conveyed through the pipe line constructed in the manner proposed by defendant. Still it cannot be said that in denying the temporary writ the trial court abused the discretion committed to it. It does not appear that defendant is insolvent or could not respond to a claim for any damages which might be caused to plaintiffs by the commission of any of the acts complained of pending trial of the action, nor that any judgment which the court might finally make in favor of the plaintiffs would be rendered ineffectual because of the failure of the court to issue a temporary injunction.

[2] It is uniformly held that the matter of the issuance of a preliminary injunction is one resting in the sound discretion of the court, and that an appellate court will not interfere with the action of the trial judge in such a case, except where a palpable abuse of discretion is shown. REEG v. McARTHUR et al. (Civ. 999.)

1. GUARANTY (§ 4*)—CONTRACTS—LIABILITY INCURRED.

A contract for an exchange of lands signed by defendant and codefendant required defendant to execute a note as a guaranty that the other party would realize the amount of a note out of certain personalty. Held, that any liability against codefendant concerning the note is limited to liability upon defendant's failure to execute the note, and that codefendant is not a guarantor of the payment thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by George Reeg against Mrs. L. M. McArthur and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hanson, Hackler & Heath, for appellant.
M. E. C. Munday, for respondents.

JAMES, J. [1] This action was brought by plaintiff to recover certain sums of money from the defendants; separate causes of action being set forth in four different counts in the amended complaint. These alleged causes of action were founded upon an agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendants, whereby certain real property in the state of Minnesota belonging to C. W. McArthur was agreed to be exchanged for certain real property belonging to one Mary K. Reeg, which was located in the county of Los Angeles. The plaintiff, George Reeg, prosecuted this action as the assignee of the said Mary K. Reeg. A demurrer to the amended complaint interposed on behalf of defendant Mrs. L. M. McArthur was sustained by the court without leave to amend, and judgment followed accordingly. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The agreement for the exchange of the real property is attached to the amended complaint as an exhibit, and recites the conditions which were to affect the transaction. Among other things, it is provided that the title to the land of C. W. McArthur was to be conveyed clear, except that a certain mortgage of $3,000 was to be assumed by Mary K. Reeg, and the following condition was then inserted in the agreement: "Said C. W. McArthur to execute a note for $500 payable on or before 1 yr. after date. Said note is to be given as a guarantee that she (meaning Mary K. Reeg) will receive $500 out of person property such as hay, grain, horse and buggy and amt. of rent still due from tenant, all of which is now on the 1st above des. piece of property." The agreement was signed by C. W. McArthur, the latter also affixing the name of L. M. McArthur thereto, which we must assume was done with authority of the latter. The first cause of action set out in the complaint refers to the matter of price obtained for the personal property, and it is there alleged that $40 only was all that Mary K. Reeg received upon a sale of said personal property, leaving a balance of $460 which it was alleged was due from defendants on that account. In the cause of action referred to it is alleged that the defendant C. W. McArthur executed the $500 note in accordance with the terms of the agreement. If the defendant Mrs. L. M. McArthur had any liability imposed upon her with respect to this promissory note, it was only a liability which might accrue upon the failure of C. W. McArthur to execute the note which he had agreed to execute. Under none of the conditions stated in the writing, can it be said that Mrs. L. M. McArthur became a guarantor of the payment of the note of C. W. McArthur. The amended complaint, therefore, considering the first count thereof alone, stated no cause of action against defendant L. M. McArthur, and the demurrer thereto was properly sustained by the court.

[2] In the other three counts of the amended complaint, plaintiff made claim for certain moneys alleged to be due as interest on a mortgage, unpaid taxes, etc. The aggregate money demand of said causes of action did not amount to the sum of $300, and therefore the superior court had no jurisdiction to entertain them. By the demurrer interposed by defendant L. M. McArthur the ground of want of jurisdiction was assigned as an objection; and with the first cause of action eliminated from consideration, as it must be for the reasons we have stated, the demurrer was properly sustained on the latter ground also.

[3] There was no error in the order made by the court denying plaintiff leave to amend, for the reason that it manifestly appeared that by no amendment could a sufficient cause of action be stated against Mrs. L. M. McArthur of which the superior court had jurisdiction.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA MUSIC CO. v. SKINNER. (Civ. 963.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 2, 1911.)

SALES (§ 479*)—CONDITIONAL SALE—ACTION—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

In an action to recover a money judgment, the complaint alleged that defendant in 1909 purchased a piano from plaintiff, executing his note and an agreement in payment therefor. The note was due in four years, and the agreement provided that defendant should pay in installments of $8 per month and that on default in any installment plaintiff might rescind the contract, and if such monthly payment was unpaid for more than 60 days the plaintiff might declare the whole sum due. The complaint further alleged that the defendant had defaulted and that plaintiff had declared the balance of the sum due. Held, that the complaint did not state a cause of action upon the note, for it was not due for four years, and no facts were alleged under which it might be declared due prior to the date provided, and it did not state a cause of action on the agreement because there was no allegation that defendant had been in default for 60 days.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 1436; Dec. Dig. § 479.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Music Company against M. W. Skinner. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

F. C. Spencer, for appellant. George Clark, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover a money judgment. The complaint alleges a sale by plaintiff to defendant of a piano for the sum of $405; that on July 15, 1909, defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff his promissory note and agreement in payment therefor, a copy of which, it is alleged, is attached to the complaint; that no part of said sum of $405, other than the sum of $25, has been paid; that defendant has defaulted in his payments as provided in the agreement, and plaintiff has declared the balance of said sum due, no part of which balance has been paid. It is further alleged that by the terms of the note defendant agreed that should suit be brought to enforce the payment thereof 10 per cent. thereof should be added to any judgment rendered thereon as attorney's fees in said action. Following the complaint, as appears from the record, is a promissory note as follows: "380.-00. Los Angeles, Cal., July 15, 1909. Forty-eight months after date, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of Southern California Music Co. at their office in Los Angeles, California, three hundred and eighty dollars in lawful money of the United States, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum until paid. Should suit be brought to enforce the payment of this note it is agreed that 10 per cent. be added for attorney's fees, [Signed] M. W. Skinner." Following this, as shown by the record, is an agreement signed by defendant, by the terms of which he agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $405 for the piano in the following manner, to wit: $25 cash on delivery of the instrument, and the balance in installments of $8 per month, payable on the 15th day of each month. It is further provided that, in case defendant fails to pay either of the monthly installments when due, plaintiff may rescind the contract and take possession of the piano, or, if such monthly payment remains due and unpaid for a period of 60 days, plaintiff may declare the whole sum still unpaid under the contract due and payable. Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also upon the ground that the same was uncertain, in that it could not be determined therefrom whether plaintiff's cause of action was based upon the promissory note, or upon the alleged agreement, or upon both. The demurrer was submitted to the court without argument and overruled, and upon the trial of the case the court gave plaintiff judgment for the sum of $380 and interest thereon, together with $38 attorney's fees, in accordance with the provision of the promissory note. Defendant appeals from this judgment.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

We think the demurrer should have been sustained upon both grounds. Not only is the complaint uncertain, as alleged in the demurrer, but, however it may be regarded, it clearly fails to state a cause of action. The suit was instituted some six months after the date of the note, but the note by its terms was not due until four years after the date thereof. The agreement contains no reference whatever to the note, and the complaint is silent as to any allegation of fact under which it might be declared due prior to the date when by its terms it was made payable. Hence no facts are alleged which could entitle plaintiff to a judgment upon the promissory note.

The complaint alleges "that defendant has defaulted in his payments as in said contract provided, and plaintiff has declared the balance of the said sum now due." It was no doubt the intention of plaintiff to allege facts which under the terms of the contract gave it the right to declare the whole sum due; but the agreement contains no provision under which the whole amount could be so declared merely because defendant had made default. The provision of the contract is that "if payments to be made under this contract shall be due and unpaid for a period of 60 days the plaintiff may at its option declare the balance still unpaid under this contract due and payable." To constitute a cause of action for a breach of the contract, assuming that such right exists, the complaint should not only allege that defendant has made default in the payment of one or more of the installments, but that such default has continued for the period of 60 days. It does not appear from the complaint that any installment, the payment of which was required under the terms of the contract, had been due and unpaid for such period.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and the trial court instructed to make an order sustaining defendant's demurrer.

BARBREE et al. v. KINGSBURY, Register of State Land Office. (Civ. 869.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 29, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 27, 1911.)

PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*)—PATENTS—VALIDITY OF APPLICATION—AMOUNT APPLIED FOR.

Pol. Code, § 3495, provides that one desiring to purchase a tract of school lands, not less than the smallest legal subdivision mentioned in a certain section, must make affidavit whether the land is suitable for cultivation, and, if not, that applicant has not entered any part of such lands which, together with that now sought to be entered, exceeds 640 acres; and further provides that land unsuitable for cultivation may be sold in quantities not exceeding 640 acres to any one person. More than 25 years ago, petitioner's predecessor applied in good faith for school land; his affidavit being true, except that it called for an excess of 2.24 acres more than 640 acres. The price was paid in full in 1909. Held, that the "rule of approximation," requiring the acreage covered by the application to conform as nearly as practicable to the maximum prescribed by the statute, and permitting the claim, where the excess over the statutory amount is less than the deficiency would be, should a subdivision be excluded, should, under the circumstances, be applied, so that the excess in acreage covered by the application and affidavit would not render the application void, so as to prevent the issuance of a certificate for a patent.

Wallace M. Pence, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Malcolm C. Glenn, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an appeal from an order denying an application for a writ of mandate to require respondent, pursuant to section 3519 of the Political Code, to issue the usual certificate to the Governor for the issuance of a patent for certain school lands. Petitioners claim the right to the patent, as the successors in interest to one Alfred Warren, the original applicant for said lands. On January 6, 1886, Warren filed his application or affidavit to purchase the lands therein described, and the controversy here grows out of the following averments in the said affidavit: "That said land is not suitable for cultivation. That he had not entered any portion of any lands mentioned in section 3,494 of the Political Code (to wit, the unsold portion of the 500,000 acres granted to the state for school purposes, the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, and the lands selected in lieu thereof), which, together with that now sought to be purchased, exceeds 642.24 acres. * * * That the township within which said land is situate was and had been surveyed and sectionized by the United States prior to the date upon which said affidavit was made or filed in said land office, and that said section 16 lies in one body in the form a square, and contains, according to said survey of the United States, 642 $^{24}/_{100}$ acres, and had no legal subdivision of said section 16 contains less than 40 acres or more than 42 acres."

Section 3495 of the Political Code prescribes the method for the purchase of state school lands, and provides that "any person desiring to purchase any portion not less than the smallest legal subdivision of any of the lands mentioned in section thirty-four hundred and ninety-four, situated in any township which has been surveyed by the United States must make an affidavit" containing certain averments, among them, "whether the land is or is not suitable for cultivation," and if the land is not suitable for cultivation the affidavit must state "that the applicant has not entered any portion of such lands, which together with that now sought to be entered, exceeds six hundred and forty acres." The section further provides that, "Lands unsuitable for cultivation may be sold in quantities not exceeding six hundred and forty acres to any one person."

No question is raised that Warren acted in good faith, that his affidavit was true in every respect, and that it was in proper form, except that it called for an excess of 2.24 acres over the quantity of land that the statute provides can be sold to one person. It is the contention of the respondent that only one construction is possible of said section of the Political Code, and that contention places the limit of purchase at 640 acres, which cannot be exceeded in any case. The logical conclusion of the contention would seem to be that Warren's application was and is nugatory and void, since it did not contain one of the important and essential elements required by the Code. It would follow that no patent could be legally issued to him or to his successors for any part of said land.

In Hildebrand v. Stewart, 41 Cal. 387, it is held that: "When the law, under which public lands are sold, requires certain acts to be performed as a prerequisite to the right to purchase, the courts cannot dispense with the performance of those acts by legalizing an entry made without complying with them." To the same effect are Woods v. Sawtelle, 46 Cal. 391; Botsford v. Howell, 52 Cal. 158; Millidge v. Hyde, 67 Cal. 5, 6 Pac. 852; and McKenzie v. Brandon, 71 Cal. 209, 12 Pac. 428.

The Hildebrand Case involved a contest between two claimants to the same land, arising before the Surveyor General, and transferred to the district court for adjudication, and it was held by the Supreme Court that the application to purchase by defendant was invalid and ineffectual to vest in him any right to the land by reason of the absence of the notice to the occupant or claimant of the house and corral then located upon said land, as required by the act under which defendant's attempted location was made.

In Woods v. Sawtelle, supra, at the time defendant made his application to purchase the land, plaintiff was in possession thereof, and he had been for more than three years. The defendant's application was approved by the Surveyor General, and a certificate of purchase was issued to him, and plaintiff's application made subsequently was rejected. The statute provided that if there was an adverse occupant for more than 60 days at the time an application to purchase was made the applicant must so state. There was an omission in that respect in defendant's said application, and the Supreme Court held that, by reason of his application being in proper form, plaintiff, who was the prior occupant, but the subsequent applicant, had the better right to make the purchase.

The contest in the Botsford Case, supra, was decided by the lower court in favor of plaintiff, but it was reversed by the Supreme Court, on the ground that the facts required by the statute must be stated in the application directly and positively; whereas plaintiff had stated them in the alternative form.

In Millidge v. Hyde, it was held that the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained for the reason that plaintiff's application failed to state, as required by the statute, that: "There is no valid claim to such land other than that of the applicant; that he has not entered any land in part satisfaction of the unsold portion of the 500,000 acre grant, or of the grant in lieu of the sixteenth or thirty-sixth sections, which together with that now sought to be purchased exceeds 320 acres."

In McKenzie v. Brandon, supra, it was held that plaintiff stated in his affidavit what was not true, when he declared that there was no actual possession of the lands adverse to him, and it was decided that he had no claim to the title. These cases all involved contesting applicants, and it was rightly determined that the claimant complying with the requirements of the statute should be preferred to the one who was remiss.

It is undoubtedly true, also, as asserted by respondent, that "it has not been the policy of the state to sell large tracts of land, but rather, on the other hand, has it been the policy to encourage settlers to live on state lands, and to sell lands in small tracts." It is equally true, however, that the state should not assume the attitude of a wrongdoer, nor should the letter of the statute be applied in favor of injustice, where it is possible, by a liberal spirit of interpretation, to reach a righteous conclusion. The facts here, it may be said, are peculiar and persuasive in favor of the claim of petitioners. The application to purchase was made more than 25 years ago; the requisite portion of the purchase price was then paid, and for all these years the interest on the balance has been regularly tendered and accepted, and finally, on October 25, 1909, the balance of the purchase price was paid. The good faith of the transaction has not been questioned; there is no contesting applicant; no one has been wronged, and the excess of the land over 640 acres is so trifling, and of such little value, as to be scarcely worth considering.

When the application was made, and when it was approved by the Surveyor General, the agent of the state, and when he issued the certificate of purchase, it was probably considered by the purchaser and the seller that, under the peculiar circumstances, the "rule of approximation" should apply. This rule requires the acreage to conform, as nearly as practicable, to the maximum amount prescribed by the statute, but permits the claim, where the excess over the statutory amount is less than the deficiency would be, should a subdivision be excluded.

It is contended by appellants that the rule was adopted by the Land Department of the United States at an early date, and has been followed since. In re H. P. Sayles, 2 Land Dec. Dept. Int. 88, and other cases cited. It is pointed out that section 2304 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1413), relative to homesteads for soldiers and sailors, provides that "not exceeding 160 acres" shall be selected, but the rule of approximation is applied to that section (In re Dotson, 13 Land Dec. Dept. Int. p. 275); furthermore, a special act, relative to Nebraska lands, limits the amount of land for one individual to 640 acres, but the said rule is applied to this also. Circular 34, Land Dec. Dept. Int. 546. It is therefore argued that: "This rule of approximation was well known at the time of the amendment to section 3495, supra, and it must be presumed that the legislators were familiar with it, and that it was a matter of common knowledge at the time of the passage of the amendment in 1885, and that therefore the amendment was enacted with the intention that it would be interpreted according to the existing decisions of the department. U. S. v. Union Pac. R. R. Co., 91 U. S. 72 [23 L. Ed. 224]."

While not desiring to hold that the Surveyor General should be governed by this rule in all cases, nor even that he should give it effect at all in approving original applications for purchase, considering the equities involved herein, the small quantity of the excess over the statutory maximum, and the conduct of the state's officers through all these years, we think that justice requires the application of the rule here.

It is not necessary either to hold that the doctrine of equitable estoppel, growing out of the conduct of its officers, binds the state, as it does individuals under similar circumstances; but it must be apparent that justice and good conscience, which, Professor Pomeroy says, are the foundation of said doctrine, should not be laid out of view in interpreting the statute. If the contention here were between individuals, no court would hesitate to grant the petition, and we can see no reason why the said statute may not be construed in harmony with those equitable principles that are admittedly the basis of our jurisprudence, and which are recognized as controlling by all upright men.

The desire of respondent to require a strict observance of the statute is, of course, commendable, and if this were an application to purchase a different situation would be presented; but, in view of the facts already related, we think the patent should issue. The judgment is therefore reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

17 Cal. App. 184

In re DE VRIES' ESTATE. (Civ. 894.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 29, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§ 634*)—ESTATE DEVISED—"VESTED" REMAINDER—"CONTINGENT."

The second clause of a will provided: "I give, devise, and bequeath all the property of which I may die seised and possessed * * * to my beloved wife for her natural life, the remainder thereof to my sons hereinafter named in proportions, for the time and upon the conditions hereinafter expressed." The fourth clause provided that, upon the termination of the wife's life estate, "I give and devise unto my son M. all those certain lots. * * * If my son M. should precede in death his wife and leave him no lawful issue surviving, and should such death of my son M. occur before the property herein devised and bequeathed to him vests in him, then, all the interests herein devised and bequeathed to said M. shall pass to and vest in" his wife absolutely. Other provisions showed that testator clearly understood the legal significance of words of present devise unqualified by other language. Civ. Code, § 694, provides that a future interest is vested when there is a person in being who would have a right to immediate possession upon the ceasing of the precedent interest. Section 695 provided that a future interest is contingent while the person in whom or the event upon which it is limited to take effect remains uncertain; and section 1341 provides that devises and bequests are presumed to vest at testator's death. Held, that son M. took a vested remainder in the estate devised to him immediately upon testator's death.

3. WILLS (§ 634*) — CONSTRUCTION — ESTATE DEVISED—VESTED REMAINDER.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1317, and the following sections, relating to the interpretation of wills, in determining whether a future interest is vested or contingent, testator's intention thereon must be gathered from the language of the will construed in view of established rules of construction.

4. WILLS (§ 634*)—ESTATE DEVISED—VESTED REMAINDER.

The test of whether a future estate devised is vested is whether there exists in an ascertained person a present fixed right of future enjoyment of the estate limited, which will take effect in possession immediately on the determination of the precedent estate, irrespective of any collateral event.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William H. De Vries, deceased. From an order denying a petition for a decree of partial distribution, Marion De Vries appeals. Reversed.

Marion De Vries, in pro. per. Nutter & Orr, for respondent.

HART, J. The single question submitted on this appeal, which is prosecuted from an order or decree denying the petition of the appellant for a decree of partial distribution of the estate of William H. De Vries, deceased, is whether the remainder to said appellant, provided for by the fourth clause of the last will and testament of said deceased, is vested or contingent. The court below, two of the judges thereof presiding at the hearing and concurring in the conclusion therein reached, held the remainder so devised to the appellant, Marion De Vries, to be contingent. The decision of the question presented here must obviously rest on the intention of the testator, and, in turn, such intention must be gathered from an interpretation of the language of the last will and testament of the testator.

The language of said testament particularly pertinent to this inquiry reads:

"Second. I give, devise and bequeath all the property of which I may die seised and possessed, both real and personal, to my beloved wife, Mary Jane De Vries, for her natural life, the remainder thereof to my sons hereinafter named in proportions for the time and upon the conditions hereinafter expressed: * * *

"Fourth. Upon the termination of the life estate hereby created in my wife, Mary Jane De Vries, I give and devise unto my son, Marion De Vries, all those certain lots, pieces and parcels of land, situate. * * *

"If my son, Marion De Vries, should precede in death his wife, Minnie L. De Vries, and leave him no lawful issue surviving, and should such death of my son, Marion De Vries, occur before the property herein devised and bequeathed to him vests in him, then, all the interests herein and hereby devised and bequeathed to said Marion De Vries shall pass to and vest in and become the property of said Minnie L. De Vries, my son, Marion's wife, absolutely and forever."

The contention of the appellant is that, under the terms of said will, that portion of the estate so devised to him vested in him, by virtue of the provisions of section 694 of the Civil Code, immediately upon the death of the testator. Reproduced in the transcript on appeal is the written opinion of the learned trial judges, in which they set forth their reasons for the conclusion reached by them adversely to the contention of appellant, and from said opinion we gather that their position is planted principally on their interpretation of the language of the clause of the testament devising to appellant out of the life estate a certain interest in remainder. The argument appears to be that the words,

"Upon the termination of the life estate hereby created in my wife, Mary Jane De Vries, I give and devise to my son, Marion De Vries, all those certain lands," etc., clearly imply an intention on the part of the testator to fix "the time when said estate is to vest not only in interest but also in possession" as at the termination of the life estate. In other words, it is held by the court below that by use of the words "upon the termination of the life estate" the testator intended to say that the interest in remainder to Marion De Vries should not vest until after the determination of said life estate, and this construction of the testament, in so far as it affects the devise to the said Marion, is sustained, so the reasoning proceeds, by the provision for the wife of said Marion in the event that the latter should precede in death the former, leaving "him no lawful issue surviving."

[1] We are unable to assent to the construction thus given the instrument in question and the conclusion arrived at by the court below therefrom.

It is, of course, to be conceded that great difficulty often arises in determining whether a vested or contingent remainder was intended by the language of an instrument whose manifest purpose is to carve out of the same estate two or more separate and distinct interests—the one the right to the possession of which is to be enjoyed in præsenti and the others in futuro. Indeed, it is manifestly a much more simple task to formulate, as the law writers and the Legislature have done, a general distinction between vested and contingent future interests than to apply, in many instances, a distinction to concrete cases.

[2, 3] The general definitions of vested and contingent remainders, as given by the law writers and our Code, are sufficiently clear and explicit, yet, after all, the real point of decision in all cases where the question is whether a future interest created by devise or otherwise is vested or contingent is as to the intention of the testator or grantor in that regard, and such intention, as before stated and as is obviously true, must, in cases where construction is necessary, be gathered from the language of the instrument viewed by the light of established and accepted canons of construction. Section 1317 et seq., Civil Code.

In the case at bar, however, we have, upon a careful scrutiny of the whole testament by the aid of the rules to which we have referred and the reflected light of the adjudicated cases, found much less difficulty in reaching a conclusion as to the intention of the testator with regard to the fourth clause of his will than a mere glance at the instrument seemed to indicate.

But, before proceeding to an examination of the instrument itself, we may, with propriety, state a few general rules which apply to inquiries of the nature of the one presented here. "A future interest is vested," says our Civil Code, § 694, "when there is a person in being who would have a right, defeasible or indefeasible, to the immediate possession of the property, upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent interest," and, continues the same Code, "a future interest is contingent, whilst the person in whom, or the event upon which, it is limited to take effect remains uncertain." Section 695.

[4] In the case of the Estate of Washburn, 11 Cal. App. 735, 741, 106 Pac. 415, 418, this court, through Chipman, P. J., approves the definition of a vested remainder as it is given in 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 389, as follows: "The true criterion of a vested remainder is the existence in an ascertained person of a present fixed right of future enjoyment of the estate limited in remainder, which right will take effect in possession immediately on the determination of the precedent estate, irrespective of any collateral event, provided the estate in remainder does not determine before the precedent estate." In Haward et al. v. Peavey, 128 Ill. 430, 21 N. E. 503, 15 Am. St. Rep. 120, the subject of remainders is thus spoken of: "A remainder is said to be vested when a present interest passes to a party, to be enjoyed in the future, so that the estate is invariably fixed in a determinate person after the particular estate terminates, while a contingent remainder is one limited to take effect, either to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon a dubious and uncertain event. 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, 168. * * * But it does not necessarily follow that every estate in remainder which is subject to a contingency or condition is a contingent remainder. The condition may be precedent or subsequent. If the former, the remainder cannot vest until that which is contingent has happened, and thereby become certain. If the latter, the estate vests immediately, subject to be defeated by the happening of the condition" —citing cases. "It is," says Kent, 4 Commentaries, 202–206, "the uncertainty of the right of enjoyment, and not the uncertainty of its actual enjoyment, that renders the remainder contingent." The foregoing formulas, as before stated, are, of course, clear and easy of apprehension, but the important and often the difficult question then arises whether a present fixed right of future enjoyment of the estate limited in remainder exists in "an ascertained person."

[5] While it will always seek to effectuate the wishes of the testator, "the law prefers to consider future estates as vested." Estate of Washburn, supra. As is said in Farnum v. Farnum, 53 Conn. 278, 2 Atl. 327; "That the courts will incline in doubtful cases to construe a devise or legacy as vested rather than contingent is a familiar and well-settled rule. In some instances courts seem to have gone so far as to say that they will if possible construe it as vested. It is enough for our present purpose to say that we ought to give this will that construction if its language will fairly admit of it." After reviewing the decisions of the courts of many jurisdictions, 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 392, says: "The courts have always regarded contingent estates with disfavor, and from the earliest times have inclined towards that construction which holds a remainder vested rather than that which considers it contingent, when the question is doubtful. It has even been said that, if there is the least doubt, advantage is to be taken of the circumstance occasioning that doubt to hold that the remainder is vested, and not contingent." In Williams v. Williams, 73 Cal. 99, 14 Pac. 394, our Supreme Court says: "The law favors the vesting of interests, and every interest will be presumed to vest, unless a contrary intention is clearly manifested." And, lastly upon this proposition, section 1341 of our Civil Code provides that "testamentary dispositions, including devises and bequests to a person on attaining majority, are presumed to vest at the testator's death." We have discovered no language anywhere in the testament before us that is inconsistent with the view that by the devise to Marion De Vries the testator intended to create in the former a vested future interest.

It will first be noted that the second clause of the testament under present consideration reads: "I give, devise and bequeath all the property of which I may die seised and possessed, both real and personal to my beloved wife, Mary Jane De Vries, for her natural life, the remainder thereof to my sons hereinafter named," etc. It is declared by the learned trial judges in their written opinion that, if the foregoing "were the only provision of the will relating to the disposition of the testator's property, the question would be free from doubt." It is, of course, to be conceded that, if the devises subsequently made by the testator are inconsistent with the language of the second clause of the testament just quoted, such devises must prevail. In other words, while the language of the second clause of the will clearly indicates an intention to create vested remainders over to the sons, yet, if the specific devises in remainder to the sons subsequently created out of the property from which the life estate is carved are made subject to such contingencies as to the right of enjoyment as to clearly disclose an intention to create contingent remainders, then the devises so made would, of course, control the general language of the second clause of the testament, and would therefore prevail. On the other hand, if we find no inconsistency between the general language of the second clause and the language in which the specific devises are declared, or if the language by which the specific devises are created is so ambiguous as to make it uncertain whether therein and thereby the testator intended to create vested or contingent future interests, and there are no other circumstances arising from the testament itself to compel a contrary view, then the general language of the second clause of the testament to which we have referred becomes of signal and, indeed, controlling importance as an aid in the ascertainment of the intention of the testator with regard to the time of the vesting of the right of enjoyment of such future interests. But, apart from any consideration of the general language of the instrument, we think that, as before declared, from the language of the fourth clause itself, and through no strained or unnatural construction thereof, no serious difficulty need confront the court in reaching the conclusion that the intention of the testator as therein and thereby expressed was to create in his son, Marion, a vested remainder.

It will be observed that the fourth clause of the testament is divided into two paragraphs: The first involving the devise to Marion; the second, to the latter's wife. It will further be observed that the first paragraph uses words of present devise—that is, the language of the testator is: "I give and bequeath," etc. Thus far there could not arise any question but that the testator intended by the use of those words the vesting in Marion De Vries a present fixed right. But, as we have seen, the contention is that the language immediately preceding the quoted words, "Upon the termination of the life estate hereby created in my wife, Mary Jane De Vries," refers the vesting of the right to the time of the death of the life tenant or the termination by her death of the life estate, and that, therefore, the effect of said language is not only the postponement of the time of the actual enjoyment, but also of the time of the vesting of the right of enjoyment of the future interest thus created. But we think that where, as here, words of devise refer to the present or are in the present tense, the words, "upon the termination of the life estate" or "after" such termination, relate to the time of the possession or actual enjoyment of the interest so devised, and not to the time at which such interest shall vest or become in the donee a fixed right. It will not for a moment be questioned that words of present devise, such as are used here, are inconsistent with language which may be construed to postpone the immediate vesting of such right, and, as suggested, if the language immediately preceding the words of present devise in the fourth clause of the testament here may be held to be inconsistent with the present vesting of the interest, then at least a serious doubt arises as to what the testator actually intended should be the effect in legal contemplation of the devise to Marion. Therefore, whether we may hold that the words of present devise as employed by the testator themselves irresistibly import an intention to create a vested remainder, or the language of the fourth clause, as a whole, is so uncertain and ambiguous as to leave in serious doubt what the testator's specific intention in that respect was, in either case, under the uniformly accepted rules of construction, the conclusion must be the same. But manifestly, if the construction contended for by the respondent and sustained by the court below be sound, the language, "I devise and bequeath," or "give and devise," is controlled entirely by the words immediately preceding it. We can perceive no reason for such construction, and, indeed, we are of the opinion, as before declared, that, when we consider the language of the clause in question in connection with other parts of the testament or with what appears clearly enough to us to be the general scheme of the testator, such construction would fall far short of discovering the intention of the deceased with respect to the devise to Marion. But we are not without eminently respectable authority for the foregoing views.

[6] The general rule as to the employment of words of present gift or devise, in immediate connection with the use of the prepositions "upon," "after," and "at," expressive of the time at which the intermediate estate must terminate, in instruments disposing of property, is laid down by 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 768, as follows: "The use of words of present gift, or language which has the same import or effect, is expressly recognized as operating, in the absence of other controlling circumstances, to create a vested interest in the beneficiary." Many cases may be found where that rule has been applied to a state of facts strikingly similar to the circumstances of the present case. We shall here notice a few of those cases.

In the Matter of Elliott, 27 Misc. Rep. 258, 58 N. Y. Supp. 603, the testator gave to his widow, during her life or until remarriage, his real and his residuary personal estate. Upon her death or remarriage the executors were directed by a codicil to sell and convey the realty, convert the personalty into money, and out of the proceeds pay a son $1,500 and to one Alphrona Town, $800, "which said amounts," so the testament read, "I do hereby give and bequeath unto them to be paid only as aforesaid." Alphrona Town died during the lifetime of the widow. The contention was that the bequest to Alphrona Town lapsed by reason of her death during the lifetime of the testator's widow. The referee sustained that contention, holding that said bequest was contingent, and that it could only become vested or effective by the legatee's surviving the happening of the death or remarriage of the widow. Reversing the findings of the referee, the surrogate court said: "His (the referee's) decision is principally based upon the circumstance that the testator directed the conversion of the real estate at a future time and the payment of the legacy from the proceeds." The surrogate then refers to a number of cases by the light of which the referee construed the testament, and proceeds: "The rule declaring that, where the gift consists only in a direction to divide or pay at a future time, the vesting as well as the time of payment is postponed, which is referred to in the cases above cited, and which doubtless acquires greater pertinency and significance from the direction for conversion contained in the wills considered in some of them, has been repeatedly stated to be not an inflexible or arbitrary rule, but one readily yielding to the intention of the testator, and sometimes evidence of a very slight character has been resorted to by the courts, and taken as expressive or indicative of such intention. [Citing cases.] Almost invariably accompanying the declaration of the rule mentioned is found the statement of another rule or principle similarly formulated for the purpose of aiding in discovering the intention of the testator, and that is that where there is a direct or immediate gift, the subject of which cannot come into possession or enjoyment of the legatee until some future time, the gift is, nevertheless, to be regarded as indefeasibly vested. This latter rule seems to me to more fitly accord with the intention of the testator in the present case, and I think it should control its disposition. Words of present gift are here clearly used. The testator says: 'I do hereby give and bequeath.' The use of such language, or language of the same import, or effect, is expressly or impliedly recognized by the authorities as effective, in the absence of other controlling circumstances, to create a vested interest or estate in the beneficiary." Seeley, 47 Hun (N. Y.) 109; Matter of Gardner, 140 N. Y. 122, 35 N. E. 439.

In the Matter of Conger, 81 App. Div. 493, 80 N. Y. Supp. 933, the will giving a life interest to the testator's wife and daughter provided that, "after the death of my said wife and daughter, I give, devise and bequeath unto," etc. Construing said will and interpreting the language quoted for the purpose of discovering whether it was the intention of the testator that the remainder so created should operate to vest the right or title to such future interest in the remainderman upon the former's death, the court says: "If the testator had said, 'I give, devise and bequeath unto the legatees named certain shares of stock, such bequests to take effect in enjoyment after the death of my life tenants,' there could be no question about the meaning or validity of the clause. We think it requires no particular straining to hold that when he said, 'after the death' of said life tenants, 'I give, devise and bequeath' unto the same persons, he meant the same thing, namely, a present, immediate bequest and gift of the property, subject only to delay in payment and enjoyment until after the death of those who had a prior right to the enjoyment as life tenants. The vesting of title was to take effect immediately; the actual division and delivery of the certificates of stock was to occur in the future."

In Farnam v. Farnam, 53 Conn. 261, 2 Atl. 325, 5 Atl. 682, a testamentary trust was created, by the terms of which certain sums were to be paid by the trustees annually to the widow of the testator and to his children, and "at the decease of the last survivor of my said children, if my said wife shall not then be living, but if living, then upon her death, this trust shall cease; and I give, devise and bequeath all the estate which shall then be held in trust under this will to my grandchildren who shall then be living, to be equally divided among them per capita and not per stirpes, and to their heirs forever." It is then provided that if any grandchild of the testator shall have died, leaving a child or children surviving at the expiration of said trust, such child or children shall take the share that "his, her or their parent would have been entitled to if living," etc. The attack upon the testament was upon the ground that the fourth and fifth clauses (the latter the one just referred to) were inoperative for the reason that they were in violation of the Connecticut statute against perpetuities. The main question thereupon arising was whether the estate in the grandchildren was a vested or contingent remainder. The court held that the interest so created was a vested remainder, saying: "The words, 'I give, devise and bequeath' import a present interest unless other provisions in the will clearly manifest a different intention."

In the Matter of Seaman, 147 N. Y. 69, 41 N. E. 401, the sixth and seventh articles of the testament read as follows: "All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real and personal, I give, devise and bequeath to my executors, hereinafter named, in trust to apply and pay over the income of one equal undivided half part thereof to my said adopted daughter and niece, Elizabeth Seaman, during her natural life, and upon her decease I give, devise and bequeath said equal undivided one-half part of my estate so held in trust for my said adopted daughter and niece to the children of my nephew, George A. Seaman, living at the time of her death, share and share alike. Seventh. I direct and order my said executors hereinafter named to apply and pay over the income of the other equal undivided half part of my estate so held in trust by them to my said adopted son and nephew, George A. Seaman, during his natural life, and upon his decease, I give, devise and bequeath the said equal undivided half of my estate, so held in trust for my said adopted son and nephew, to the children of my said nephew, George A. Seaman, living at the time of his death, share and share alike." The New York Court of Appeals held that the words, "I give, devise and bequeath," as thus used, were words of present gift and denoted a vested interest at the death of the testator, and, differentiating the case before it from other cases cited, among other things said: "Here there are words of present gift, for the phrase 'upon her decease,' like the expression 'from and after,' does not prevent the legacy from vesting"—citing Nelson v. Russell, 135 N. Y. 137, 31 N. E. 1008.

"In applying the rule which favors the construction of remainders as vested," it is said, in the second edition of 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 395, "a distinction has been made between certain words as importing time and contingency respectively. Accordingly, the adverbs, 'when,' 'then,' 'after,' 'until,' 'from,' etc., in a devise of a remainder after a precedent estate determinable on an event which must necessarily happen, are construed to relate merely to the time of the enjoyment of the estate, and not to the time of the vesting in interest. Words denoting contingency, on the other hand, are 'if,' 'in the event,' and the like." See Matter of Watts, 68 App. Div. 357, 74 N. Y. Supp. 75; Hersee v. Simpson, 154 N. Y. 496, 48 N. E. 890; McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 380, 5 Sup. Ct. 652, 28 L. Ed. 1015; Cropley v. Cooper, 19 Wall. 167, 22 L. Ed. 109—in each of which the rule of construction contended for by appellant here is applied. See, also, Estate of Cavarly, 119 Cal. 406, 51 Pac. 629; Dunn v. Schell, 122 Cal. 627, 55 Pac. 595; Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 546, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70; Estate of Campbell, 149 Cal. 717, 87 Pac. 573.

But, as we have seen, the conclusion of the court below, it is argued, is supported by the construction which respondent places upon the language of the second paragraph of the fourth clause, wherein and whereby the testator, for the benefit of the wife of Marion, guards against a contingency that might happen before the vesting in Marion of the interest devised to him. We are unable to see wherein said second paragraph or the contingent provision therein made for Marion's wife exercises any influence upon or in any way limits or qualifies the interest devised to Marion. Indeed, we are of opinion that a careful examination of the language of said paragraph will disclose to the mind considerations which negative rather than sustain the conclusion to which the learned trial judges were persuaded as to the intention of the testator with respect to the devise to Marion. Said second paragraph of the fourth clause of the testament, it will be remembered, reads: "If my son, Marion De Vries, should precede in death his wife, Minnie L. De Vries, and leave him no lawful issue surviving, and should such death of my son, Marion De Vries, occur before the property herein devised and bequeathed to him vests in him, then all the interest herein and hereby devised and bequeathed to said Marion De Vries shall pass to and vest in and become the property of said Minnie L. De Vries, my son, Marion's wife, absolutely and forever."

It seems clear to our minds that the fourth clause of the testament, read together, means this: That the testator intended to and did devise to Marion De Vries a present interest in remainder in the property described in said clause; that, counting upon the certainty of death, but the uncertainty as to the time thereof, and therefore the possible contingency of Marion preceding his wife in death, he desired and intended that in the event that that contingency happened before the remainder to Marion vested in him—that is, before the death of the testator—then the estate so limited to Marion should go to the latter's wife. In other words, the testator devised to Marion a vested future interest and to his wife a contingent future interest in the same property. We think, as previously suggested, that this construction is fully sustained by these considerations deducible from the second paragraph itself: (1) Assuming, as is the contention, that the interest to Marion was not intended to vest until the determination of the life estate, if Marion should precede in death his wife, leaving lawful issue, before the termination of the life estate, the result in that case would not only be that Minnie L. De Vries would and could take nothing under the contingent devise to her upon the death of the life tenant, but that devise of the testament would absolutely fail and the interest devised necessarily be remitted to administration, for it will be noted that there is no provision as to whom the property devised to Marion should go in the event Marion died, leaving issue, prior to the death of his wife and before the remainder to him became a vested interest. We cannot persuade ourselves, in view of the evident care with which the whole testament was prepared and executed, disclosing a clear design to thus specifically dispose of all interests in his property, that the testator would have so arranged his disposal of one part of his estate, of which undoubtedly he sought to make specific disposal, as to admit of a possible lapse thereof. We are of the opinion, rather, that the testator, having intended Marion's remainder should vest upon his (testator's) death, must have further had in mind that, in case Marion leaving lawful issue should precede both his wife and the testator in death, the latter would still have the opportunity and ability to make such disposition of the interest he intended for Marion as would accord with his (testator's) wishes with respect to Minnie L. De Vries and such issue. In any event, considering the fact that the testator displayed an unquestioned and unquestionable wish to provide for Minnie L. De Vries, in the event of the happening of the contingency upon which she was to take, we think it would be the more reasonable view to hold that he did not intend that any circumstances should arise, in the testamentary disposition of his estate, whereby it could happen that the interest which is the subject of the devise to Marion De Vries should go undisposed of by his last will.

The second proposition plainly deducible from the second paragraph of the fourth clause and which, we think, clearly confirms the position that the devise to Marion should operate as a vested remainder, arises from the language itself of said second paragraph. Therein, as we have seen, the testator provides that, upon the happening of the condition upon which Minnie L. De Vries shall take, "then all the interest herein and hereby devised and bequeathed to said Marion De Vries shall pass to and vest in and become the property of said Minnie L. De Vries," etc. Thus it will be noted that the words of action—"devise" and "bequeath," as used in the preceding paragraph of said clause—are used in the second paragraph in the past tense; that is, as denoting action already taken. In other words, to paraphrase the fourth clause in its entirety, the testator has therein declared: "I devise and bequeath to Marion De Vries the property herein described, the possession, however, to take effect on the determination of the estate for life in said property to my wife, Mary J. De Vries. But should my son, Marion, die, leaving no lawful issue, before the death of his wife, Minnie L. De Vries, and prior to the vesting in him of the estate or interest so devised to him, then the property which I have already devised and bequeathed to said Marion shall pass to and vest in and become the property of said Minnie L. De Vries," etc. In short, it appears reasonably clear to our minds that by the use of the language in the second paragraph "then all the interest herein and hereby devised and bequeathed to said Marion De Vries," etc., the testator intended to emphasize his intention as clearly implied from the employment of words of present devise in the first paragraph that the right of enjoyment of the interest devised to Marion should take effect or vest upon and coincidently with the beginning of the life estate, or in other words, at the death of the testator.

That the testator had a clear conception of the legal significance of words of present devise, unqualified by other language or expressions, is indubitably shown, it appears to us, by the language of the devise to his son, Lee De Vries. Therein he likewise uses words of present devise, but qualifies the same with, "To have and to hold the same (the property) for and during all his natural life only, and thereafter to vest as hereinafter stated, or to be taken by him absolutely, dependent upon the following events and conditions." Then follows a provision that should Lee De Vries "die before I die, and leave him lawful issue surviving, then and upon the termination of the life estate herein created in my wife, if such lawful issue shall survive my said wife, then the said described real property hereby devised to my said son, Lee De Vries, shall vest absolutely in fee simple in such lawful issue of my said son, Lee De Vries." It is then provided that if the wife of Lee De Vries die before him, and Lee De Vries should "survive me and my wife, then and in that event, and upon the termination of the life estate hereby created in my wife, all of the said real property hereby devised to my son, said Lee De Vries, shall absolutely vest in my son, said Lee De Vries, unaffected by any life estate therein." It will be noticed that the initial language of the devise to Lee De Vries, like the devise to Marion, contains words of present devise; but the testator later qualifies or limits the effect of those words by annexing to said devise certain conditions upon which the interest therein created is to vest. Indeed, by express language the testator suspends the vesting of the fee in the interest devised to Lee De Vries, for he specifically provides as a condition upon which such interest to Lee shall vest that the latter must survive, not only the testator, but the life tenant. It will likewise be noticed that in providing for an interest in the issue of Lee De Vries, the testator postpones, by express words, the vesting of said interest in such issue until the termination of the life estate; that is, the provision is that the issue of Lee must survive the life tenant before the interest so devised shall vest in them. It will further be observed that in all the instances of the postponement of the vesting of the interest devised to Lee De Vries apt words of suspension, such as "then," "then and thereupon," "then and in that event," immediately vest," and "absolutely vest" are used as indicative of an intention to suspend the vesting.

From the foregoing considerations, it is very manifest, we think, that the testator, in preparing and executing the testament before us, fully appreciated the necessity for the use of express language by which to make clear and unquestionable his intention to postpone or suspend the vesting until the determination of the life estate in those instances where words of present devise are used but where he did not intend the creation of vested interests. It is, therefore, very plain to our minds that the testator employed words of present gift in the devise to Marion advisedly and with the express purpose of creating the nature of the interest, as to the time of the vesting of the right thereto, which those words naturally import; that, had he intended that the interest so devised should constitute a contingent remainder or vest only at the conclusion of the life estate by the death of the life tenant, he would then, as in the case of the devise to Lee, have so declared in express language or by words so clear and apposite as to have left no room for doubt upon that proposition.

[7] It may be remarked that it is extrajudicially declared in the brief of appellant that it was held by the court below that the provision of the testator's will for his son, William G. De Vries, vests his remainder in him on the death of the testator. In other words, the court below, as we understand counsel for appellant, has construed the devise to William G. to create a vested future interest. The devise to said son reads: "Unto my son, William Garland De Vries, upon the termination of said life estate, I give, devise and bequeath all those certain lots," etc. There is no other provision, conditional or otherwise, contained in the testament with respect to the interest thus devised to William G. De Vries, and clearly the court was right in holding that the interest so devised was a vested remainder. And, with the exception of the contingent provision for Marion's wife, there is, in practical effect, no ground of distinction between the devise to Marion and the devise to William G. The only difference, as will readily be observed, consists in the transposition of the words with which the two interests are devised. Manifestly, therefore, if the devise to William G. creates a vested interest, it must be true that the devise to Marion creates a like interest, unless it may be held that the contingent provision for Marion's wife exercises some such influence on or control of the language in which the devise to Marion is expressed as to make the interest so devised a contingent remainder, and this we have shown cannot reasonably be held to be the effect of that provision. While this part of the discussion is merely argumentum ad hominem, we notice the proposition that calls it forth because we have, after a careful examination of the principal question presented here, been curious yet unable to perceive the method of reasoning by which the learned court below has discerned the slightest distinction between the devise to Marion and that to William G. De Vries.

But we have pursued the discussion sufficiently. As stated, the only contingency whatever that we have been able to find in the fourth clause of the testament relates solely to the provision for Minnie L. De Vries. As to the devise to Marion, we find here "the existence in an ascertained person of a present fixed right" of future enjoyment. In other words, we can here "point to a person who, if the life estate should cease, would eo instante et ipso facto have an immediate right of possession," and this, as the Court of Appeals of New York says, in Moore v. Littel, 41 N. Y. 80, "is a vested remainder, and, by necessary consequence, all the contingencies which may operate to defeat the right of possession are to operate, and only to operate, as conditions subsequent."

We are satisfied for the reasons herein given that the testator intended a vested interest in his son, Marion De Vries, and the order or decree appealed from is, therefore, reversed.

In re BONDS OF SOUTH SAN JOAQUIN IRR. DIST. (Sac. 1,939.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 15, 1911.)

1. Waters and Water Courses (§ 216*)—Irrigation Districts — Organization — Statutes—Constitutional Law.

The irrigation act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 254), authorizing the creation of irrigation districts, is not unconstitutional, because section 1 authorizes a majority of the holders of title of lands, according to the equalized county assessment roll for the year last preceding, to propose organization, on the theory that the apparent owners by the assessment roll may not be the present owners, since the Legislature could provide for the formation of districts without giving property owners any voice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

2. Statutes (§ 64*)—Partial Invalidity.

The validity of the irrigation act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 254) providing for the organization of irrigation districts, etc., is not impaired as a whole through unconstitutionality of its provision for an appeal to the superior court from a determination of the board of supervisors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 58–66; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

3. Waters and Water Courses (§ 216*)—Irrigation Districts — Bonds—Constitutional Law.

Irrigation Act 1897 (St. 1897, p. 265) § 34, is not unconstitutional for authorizing those appearing as owners upon the equalized assessment roll to petition for an election on the question of incurring indebtedness; the question being decided by a vote of the electors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

4. Constitutional Law (§ 63*)—Irrigation Districts — Statutes — Constitutional Law.

The irrigation act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 254) is not unconstitutional for delegating powers to and imposing duties upon certain county officers in connection with the assessment and collection of taxes for irrigation districts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 108–114; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

5. Statutes (§ 123*)—Title—Conformity of Subject-Matter.

Irrigation Act 1897 (St. 1897, pp. 276, 277) §§ 68–72, providing for proceedings to test the validity of irrigation district assessments, is not invalid, under Const. art. 4, § 24, as being foreign to the title of the act, "An act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts and to provide for the acquisition or construction thereby of works for the irrigation of lands embraced within such districts, and also to provide for the distribution of water for irrigation purposes."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 176–183; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Proceeding to determine the validity of bonds of the South San Joaquin Irrigation District. Upon appeal from the judgment. Affirmed.

Clary & Louttit, for appellant. L. L. Dennett and Nutter & Orr, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is a proceeding brought to determine the validity of bonds of the South San Joaquin Irrigation District, a proceeding authorized by the irrigation act of 1897. Stats. 1897, p. 254.

Upon this appeal it is urged:

[1] 1. That the law under which the district was created is itself unconstitutional and void. The contention herein is based on section 1 of the act, namely, that: "A majority in number of the holders of title or evidence of title of lands * * * such holders of title or evidence of title representing a majority in value of said lands according to the equalized county assessment roll or rolls for the year last preceding, may propose the organization of an irrigation district;" and, further: "Said equalized assessment roll or rolls shall be sufficient evidence of title for the purposes of this act." From this language appellant argues that the apparent owners by the last equalized assessment roll may not be the present owners of the land at the time of the formation of the district, with the result that persons who are not landowners may petition for the formation of such a district, and subject the land of the true owners to the burdens of an assessment without those owners having a voice in the matter. But if this were all true it would not render unconstitutional the section under consideration. The Legislature, having the unquestioned power to provide for the formation of such districts, might do so without giving the property owners any voice in the matter at all, and may, without question, do so, by authorizing the presentation of a petition, signed by a majority of those who, upon the last equalized assessment roll, appear as owners of the property. In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 320, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106; People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207. If between the time of the making of the last equalized assessment roll and the time of the petition for the formation of the district, any of these lands shall have changed hands, the new owners will be charged with knowledge that they purchase under conditions where those who appear to be owners by the assessment roll could petition for the formation of the district. Such a burden upon the land would, in its nature, not be dissimilar to the lien of taxes which follows land in the hands of the new purchasers after the first Monday in March of each year. In the latter case the new purchaser may protect himself in the payment of his taxes by arrangement with the seller. He may in the instance here before us likewise protect himself by a similar arrangement with the seller; in brief, by the seller's agreement not to sign such a petition.

[2] 2. The fact that the provision of the irrigation law of 1897 for an appeal to the superior court from the determination of the board of supervisors has been declared unconstitutional (Chinn v. Superior Court, 156 Cal. 478, 105 Pac. 580) does not destroy the act as a whole. The act would have been valid without such provision. The general machinery of the law provides ample protection to the landowner, and every reasonable opportunity to correct specific abuses (Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 Pac. 582), so that the act can well stand as an entire and complete scheme after the elimination of the provision touching appeal.

[3] 3. What has been said under the first head disposes of the objection to section 34 of the act; that objection being that it authorizes those appearing as owners upon the equalized assessment roll to petition the trustees of the district to submit to the qualified electors the question of whether or not the indebtedness shall be incurred. It is to be noted that the indebtedness is not imposed upon the district, excepting by a vote of the electors themselves; and that the provisions of section 34 go only to the method of invoking the action of the trustees for the calling of an election for this purpose.

[4] 4. No weight can be accorded to the contention that, because the act delegates powers to or imposes duties upon certain of the county officers in connection with the assessment and collection of taxes of the district, it is therefore unconstitutional. The argument is fully met and conclusively answered in Nevada Bank of San Francisco v. Board of Supervisors of Kern County, 5 Cal. App. 638, 91 Pac. 122.

[5] 5. The title is as follows: "An act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, and to provide for the acquisition or construction thereby of works for the irrigation of the lands embraced within such districts, and, also, to provide for the distribution of water for irrigation purposes." The body of the act (sections 68 to 72) contains provisions for the institution and prosecution by the district of the proceeding here brought to test the validity of an assessment. It is contended that these provisions are so foreign to the title of the act as to be void. Const., art. 4, § 24. To this view we cannot agree. It will be found repeatedly declared in our decisions that the purpose of the constitutional provision is, not to destroy legislation germane to the general object declared in the title, but to protect against the passage of clauses and provisions foreign to the title, subject, and purpose of an act—deceptive legislation, adroitly introduced and hidden in the body of the act. People v. Sacramento Drainage District, supra; People v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, 128 Cal. 477, 61 Pac. 86; Law v. San Francisco, 144 Cal. 388, 77 Pac. 1014. The matter of the proceeding to test the legality of the assessments and bond issues of a district under this broad and reasonable view comes clearly within the scope of the general purposes of the irrigation act. Anderson v. Grand Valley Irrigation District, 35 Colo. 525, 85 Pac. 313.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J

Parent and Child (§ 17*)—Duty of Parent to Support.

While it is the duty of a parent to support a child of tender years, yet he cannot be imprisoned for a failure to obey an order of court directing the support of such child, unless it is shown that he has the ability to comply with the order.

Petition by William Joseph McCandless for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

A. W. Sorenson, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner, as shown by the return, is in the custody of the sheriff by virtue of a commitment issued on account of petitioner's failure to make certain monthly payments by the superior court directed for the support and maintenance of his minor children. It nowhere appears in the record, nor in any order or judgment of the superior court in connection with the proceedings, that petitioner has the ability to pay the sum ordered. While it is the duty of a parent to support children of tender years, that he be imprisoned on account of the failure to obey an order of the court in connection therewith, it must affirmatively appear that he has the ability to comply with the order of the court. BARNHART v. CONLEY et al. (Civ. 1,031.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 773*)—DISMISSAL—FAILURE TO FILE BRIEFS.

Supreme Court rule 2, subd. 4 (78 Pac. vii), provides that the points and authorities must be filed within 30 days after the filing of the transcript. Appellant filed no points or authorities within 30 days after the transcript was filed, nor until after a motion to dismiss for failure to file briefs had been served, and no stipulation or order of court extending the time appeared. Held, that appellee was entitled to have the appeal dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 773.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Rose L. Barnhart against O. C. Conley and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Plaintiff's motion to dismiss appeal granted.

V. T. Watkins and Watkins & Blodget, for appellants. Gray, Barker, Bowen, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten and N. A. Bailie, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The transcript in this case was filed April 1, 1911. Appellants filed no points or authorities until after June 9, 1911, at which time a motion to dismiss the appeal on account of failure to file such points and authorities was duly served and filed. Thereafter, on June 26, 1911, appellants filed their opening brief. The affidavit in opposition to respondent's motion is insufficient to justify the court in refusing to grant the motion. Rule 2, subd. 4 (78 Pac. vii), of the Supreme Court, provides that the points and authorities must be filed within 30 days after the filing of the transcript, and, in the absence of stipulation, 20 days additional time may be granted by the court; good cause being shown therefor. No stipulation extending time or order of court in that regard appears. The rule above quoted, requiring the points and authorities on behalf of the respective parties to be filed within a specified time after the filing of the transcript, confers rights which may be enforced by litigants. McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 32, 72 Pac. 359. Respondent, therefore, possesses the right to have this appeal dismissed. The determination of such right being controlled by the facts existing at the time the notice of motion was given, the subsequent filing of points and authorities had no effect to restrict such right.

The motion to dismiss the appeal must be granted, and it is accordingly ordered.

Where defendant executed a note for a life insurance premium to a soliciting agent under a private agreement that defendant should not be called on to pay the same, and, the note having been transferred to the insurance company and payment demanded, defendant, after explaining the facts to defendant's general state agent, was informed by him that the company would look to the soliciting agent for settlement, and would give defendant no further trouble in the matter, the insurance company was not bound by such agreement; the same being beyond the local manager's authority and without consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Joseph Muller against F. W. Swanton and others. Judgment for defendant Swanton, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant F. W. Swanton, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. A former judgment in the same action in favor of said defendant was reversed by the Supreme Court. Muller v. Swanton et al., 140 Cal. 249, 73 Pac. 994. The action is on a promissory note for $1,222 which was executed by the defendant to W. B. Fonville and indorsed by Fonville to the New York Life Insurance Company, and by it, in turn, indorsed to the plaintiff merely for the purpose of collection. The answer does not deny the due execution of the note, nor that it was indorsed to the insurance company prior to maturity, but sets forth that there was no consideration for the note; that it was obtained by fraud; that the insurance company gave no consideration for the note, and took it with notice of the circumstances under which it was made.

The facts are these: W. B. Fonville was sent to this state by the home office of the New York Life Insurance Company to solicit insurance independently of the local office, of which the general manager was one A. G. Hawes. In carrying out this object, Fonville called on the defendant in Santa Cruz with a view to writing a policy of insurance on defendant's life or the life of some member of his family, and represented to defendant that, if he could do so, it would be a lead to others to apply for insurance in the company represented by him, as defendant's family was well known in that part of the state. He also told defendant that, if he succeeded in writing a named amount of large insurance, he would be installed in the position occupied by Hawes as the Pacific Coast representative of the insurance company, a position carrying a salary of $20,000 a year. After much solicitation on the part of Fonville, Swanton finally consented to allow him to write a policy insuring the life of defendant's father for $10,000, with the understanding that the note given by the defendant to Fonville for the premium would not have to be paid. In accordance with this arrangement Fonville procured the issuance of the policy by the insurance company, and the defendant made and delivered his promissory note for $1,222, the amount of the premium, and Fonville gave defendant a written agreement that one-half of the premium should be returned, and represented to him that, when the other half became due, he (Fonville) would be the Pacific Coast agent of the company, and out of his salary could well afford to pay it, and would do so. When the note fell due the company caused it to be presented for payment, whereupon the defendant called on Hawes and explained the circumstances under which the note was made; and, according to Swanton's testimony (which however, is disputed by Hawes), the latter said that Swanton need give himself no further trouble about the matter, that he would take it up with Fonville, and would look to him for a settlement.

The Supreme Court on the former appeal discussed at length the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding in favor of defendant, and the court there held that the issuance of the policy was a sufficient consideration for the indorsement of the note by Fonville, and that there was no evidence showing that the insurance company took the note with the knowledge of the circumstances under which the defendant executed it, and that, therefore, those circumstances did not constitute a defense to an action on the note by the company or its assignee.

[1] The defendant urges very strongly a point not made previously. He argues that even if the note were valid, and the defenses of fraud and want of consideration unavailing, nevertheless the insurance company and its assignee are estopped from enforcing the payment of the note by reason of what took place between him and A. G. Hawes when he called on Hawes, and explained the circumstances of the transaction with Fonville. This argument is founded upon a finding of the court which reads that Hawes "then and there assured the said defendant F. W. Swanton that it would be all right, and that he, acting for said company, would take the matter up with said Fonville, and would look to him, Fonville, for a settlement, and would give said defendant, F. W. Swanton, no further trouble in the matter." There was considerable delay after the conversation between the defendant and Hawes, during which the defendant possibly could have proceeded against Fonville, and, while the point does not lack plausibility, it has some serious defects which it will not be necessary to note, for the late Mr. Justice McFarland in the former opinion anticipated this point, and effectually disposed of it in this language: "The finding (which is based upon conflicting and very slight evidence) that, after the note was due and its payment demanded, the managing agent at San Francisco told respondent for the company that he would look to Fonville for a settlement, and would give respondent no further trouble about the matter, is immaterial; for, in the first place, he had no authority to bind the company by such a promise, and, in the second place, the promise was without any consideration."

The evidence on the second trial was in no material particular different from that given on the former trial. There is nothing new in the case, and the views expressed by the Supreme Court upon the former appeal must control, and we perceive no reason why the trial court did not give effect to those views by permitting plaintiff to recover on the note.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are reversed.

John H. Foley, for appellant. Charles S. Burnell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss appeal. The only reason suggested in support of said motion is the failure of appellant, before the filing of said motion, to cause to be transmitted to this court a copy of the judgment roll. It does appear that within seven days after service of notice of motion, and before the hearing thereof, appellant caused a transcript embracing such judgment roll to be filed. All that is essential to a review of the action of the superior court is now before this court. Under rule 15 (78 Pac. x) of the Supreme Court, respondent's motion may be considered as an objection to the transcript, affecting appellant's right to be heard, and the same was answered by filing the transcript embracing the judgment roll. "The object of the above-mentioned rule is to enable the appellant to remedy any defect or omission of the transcript for the purpose of enabling him to present his appeal upon the merits, and is to be liberally construed for that purpose." Where a court refuses to authenticate a record presented for appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default, because not filed within the statutory limit, and the failure to file is caused by the ignorance of the party's attorney of the time given, it cannot be said to be an abuse of the discretion given by Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Fred L. Blumer against Felix Mayhew. From an order denying relief under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 473, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank S. Adams, for appellant. Valentine & Newby, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order of court, denying defendant's motion for relief under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure.

On November 29, 1909, defendant's motion for a new trial and to have vacated and set aside a judgment theretofore rendered herein was denied. More than 60 days thereafter, and in the absence of any stipulation or order extending the time, he presented to the court what he termed a "Record on Appeal," consisting of copies of certain papers which he deemed necessary to constitute such record, together with a copy of the reporter's transcript of the testimony used at the hearing of the motion for a new trial, and, upon notice to plaintiff, applied to the court to have the same authenticated. Upon objection being made by plaintiff, the court refused to authenticate the papers, upon the grounds that the same were not presented within the time required by law. Thereupon defendant applied to the court to be relieved from his default, upon the grounds that the same was due to mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. His application was denied by the court, and from this order he has appealed.

In his affidavit in support of the motion, defendant's attorney states that he had been instructed by his client to take an appeal from the order denying his motion for a new trial; that affiant had never before undertaken to prosecute such an appeal to the Supreme Court, and was unaware that the matters in support of such motion should be authenticated in a bill of exceptions, as provided in section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that about 10 days after the date of the order of court, denying defendant's motion for a new trial, affiant was informed that under the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state the papers used upon such appeal should be embodied in a bill of exceptions, and the same authenticated by the trial judge, and thereupon he made an investigation of such decisions, and came to the conclusion that the Supreme Court based their opinions upon the ground that all of the records used in the court below had not been transferred to them, for which reason alone he concluded the court so decided said cases; that it would have been impossible to prepare the record within the time required by law; and that affiant did obtain an extension of 30 days time within which to file the record in the Supreme Court of California; he still being of the opinion at the time that no bill of exceptions was necessary.

[1] The making of an order granting or denying relief, when applied for by one who seeks to bring himself within the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, is a matter purely within the discretion of the trial court, and in reviewing such orders this court should refuse to interfere, unless it clearly appears there has been a plain abuse of such discretion. O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 222, 72 Pac. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105; Vinson v. Los Angeles Pac. R. R. Co., 147 Cal. 479, 82 Pac. 53. The courts have suggested by way of advice to the trial judges that all doubts as to the propriety of their rulings upon such applications should be resolved in favor of the moving party (Watson v. San Francisco & Humboldt B. R. R. Co., 41 Cal. 17; Miller v. Carr, 116 Cal. 381, 48 Pac. 324, 58 Am. St. Rep. 180), for the reason that such action tends to bring about a decision upon the merits. Notwithstanding this fact, however, the rule which prohibits interference, save and except in case of an abuse of discretion, has never been relaxed. Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 Pac. 165.

[2] In this case, upon the showing made in support of the application, it cannot be said that the court failed to exercise a proper discretion. Indeed, had the ruling been otherwise, noninterference by this court would have strained the rule, respect for which, as stated, prohibits the vacation of such order when it tends to give a hearing upon the merits of the case. The statutory provisions with reference to the procedure to be had and taken upon appeals from orders denying motions for new trial are of such long standing, so fully set forth in the Code of Civil Procedure, and have been so frequently passed upon and construed by the courts of this state "that ignorance of the time within which a statement or bill of exceptions must be prepared and served cannot be deemed the result of mistake or surprise or inadvertence, and the neglect to prepare and serve it within the time prescribed by the Code is not excusable." Ingrim v. Epperson, supra.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 232*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS—EVIDENCE—GENERAL OBJECTION.

Where a writing offered in evidence is material, as tending to prove the question in issue, and the only objection thereto on the trial was that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, it cannot be objected on appeal that it was not signed by the party by whom it was purported to be executed, but by his attorneys, who were not shown to have been authorized to sign it.

2. SALES (§ 359*)—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence of the gross sum paid for handling all the hay on a particular ranch, including the hauling, weighing, and expenses and salary of a solicitor and collector, was not sufficient to establish the cost of loading on the cars a portion thereof; one-half of the expense of which defendant agreed to pay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by Dr. J. Rollin French against the Atlas Mining Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hester, Merrill & Craig, for appellant. McKelvey & Sorenson, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover the contract price for 150 tons of hay alleged to have been delivered to defendant by Frank E. Kemp, plaintiff's assignor, pursuant to the terms of a contract for the sale and delivery thereof. The number of tons of hay delivered under the terms of the contract, as found by the court, was 141⅔ tons, for which, less a sum already paid on account of the purchase price thereof, it gave plaintiff the judgment from which defendant prosecutes this appeal.

Appellant insists the judgment should be reversed for the reason that the finding of the court fixing the number of tons of hay delivered is not supported by the evidence. There is no merit in this contention. Not only did the direct testimony of Kemp, the assignor of plaintiff, tend to prove the fact found by the court, but there was introduced in evidence a writing which purported to be executed by defendant, which, when considered with other evidence, is ample to support the finding.

[1] Appellant, however, insists that the court erred in permitting this writing to be admitted in evidence, for the reason that it was not in fact signed by defendant, but by its attorneys, who were not shown to have been authorized to act for it. When offered in evidence, no objection was made to its introduction upon such ground; the sole contention then being that the instrument was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. If defendant had desired the exclusion of the instrument upon the ground now for the first time urged, it should have made its objection based upon such ground at the time of the trial, when opportunity would have been afforded plaintiff to meet the same. Not having done so, it will not now be permitted to urge an objection not made at the time of the trial, when the writing was offered in evidence. That the evidence was material is shown by the fact that it tended to prove the question in dispute, viz., the number of tons of hay delivered to appellant by plaintiff's assignor. It appears that Kemp, the assignor of plaintiff, and one Hewitt, were copartners in the ownership of a lot of hay grown upon the ranch of W. K. Fogg, who was entitled to one-third of the crop as rental. After the hay had been harvested, these parties, by a writing, apportioned the tonnage of hay according to their respective interest; it being agreed that Fogg, the landlord, owned and was entitled to 224 tons, and that plaintiff's assignor, Kemp, owned and was entitled to 160 tons of said hay, and that Hewitt was entitled to the remainder thereof. Appellant had theretofore, in an action brought against Hewitt, caused the hay to be attached, and after the levy of the attachment, and the making of the agreement between said parties apportioning the tonnage of hay as aforesaid, appellant by the writing offered in evidence agreed and stipulated to dismiss and cause the levy of the attachment to be dismissed as to the 160 tons of hay so attached and claimed by Kemp, and agreed that he should remove said 160 tons of hay from the field, and at or about the same time, by a written contract made with Kemp, purchased said hay from Kemp upon the basis and agreement that his interest therein consisted of 150 tons, more or less, scale weight; it being understood that it was all of the hay contained in said field so belonging to Kemp, less 10 tons thereof, elsewhere sold. The agreement between Hewitt and Kemp that the latter was entitled to 160 tons of hay was thus approved and assented to by appellant, who, with full knowledge of all the facts, succeeded to the interest of Hewitt by purchase at a sale under execution.

[2] The contract made with Kemp for the purchase of his hay contained a provision to the effect that he would share equally with defendant the expense of loading the 224 tons of hay belonging to W. K. Fogg on the cars at Buena Park, and defendant in its answer alleged that it had paid on account of such expense and pursuant to the terms of the contract, the sum of $157.50, one-half of which sum it was claimed was chargeable to Kemp. The court found this allegation to be untrue. We cannot say that the court erred in so doing, for the reason that, while the evidence shows that the hay was loaded upon the cars, it fails to show the amount paid by defendant for the labor performed in doing the work. There was testimony tending to establish the gross sum paid for handling all of the hay received by defendant from that particular ranch, which included hauling, weighing, and the expenses and salary of a solicitor and collector. It cannot be determined from the evidence adduced what portion of the amount so paid should be applied to the cost of loading the hay belonging to W. K. Fogg.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action by Ellis Robinson against the American Fish & Oyster Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Webster & Webster (T. H. Selvage and J. J. Cairns, of counsel), for appellant. Otto C. Gregor and Kenneth Newett, Jr., for respondent.

HART, J. Plaintiff instituted this action for the purpose of recovering the sum of $815.60, with interest from October 23, 1909, said sum representing, it is alleged, the purchase price of fish sold and delivered by plaintiff and his assignors to the appellant. J. P. Meng, who was made a party defendant, was not served with summons, and the appellant was, therefore, alone proceeded against. Section 414, Code Civ. Proc. The cause was tried by jury, and a verdict returned awarding plaintiff the total sum declared upon, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 23d day of October, 1909, the date of the delivery of the fish to appellant, and judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the terms of said verdict. The appeal here is by the defendant, American Fish & Oyster Company, from the judgment so entered, the record being brought here by the method authorized by sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. The complaint contains 17 counts, of which 16 represent an equal number of distinct claims of persons and firms for fish sold and delivered to appellant and which claims were, it is alleged, assigned to plaintiff. The seventeenth count is for fish sold and delivered to appellant by plaintiff himself. The complaint is verified. The answer specifically denies, seriatim, the allegations of the several counts of the complaint.

It is charged that the court erred in its rulings as to certain evidence and misdirected the jury in matters of law; that the evidence is insufficient to justify and sustain a verdict awarding to plaintiff any sum whatsoever as against appellant; that it was error to allow interest on the amount returned by the jury in favor of plaintiff and against the appellant.

Of the foregoing assignments the first in importance is that involved in the claim that the evidence does not support the verdict, and to this we will first give attention. The particular contention in this regard is that the evidence shows that the fish delivered by plaintiff to appellant were the "first run of fish" (that is, fish caught on the first night of the season of 1909), and that the agreement was that fish so taken should be delivered to appellant on consignment (that is, upon the understanding that they were so delivered to appellant to be sold by it in San Francisco), and, after deducting a commission for selling said fish, the appellant was to return the balance to plaintiff, and that therefore "the plaintiff could only expect to receive what such fish brought in the market in San Francisco, to which point such fish had been shipped." While there is a conflict in the evidence as to the circumstances by which plaintiff and his assignors were employed to furnish fish to the appellant, there is, nevertheless, in our opinion, sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

1. The facts, as established to the evident satisfaction of the jury, are: The appellant is, as the complaint alleges, a corporation engaged in the business of packing and selling fish, with headquarters in the city of San Francisco. One J. A. Junta had for several years acted as its agent for the purpose of catching, buying, and shipping to it in San Francisco fish taken from Eel river, in Humboldt county. One J. P. Meng had also been for several years engaged in like business on Eel river, representing other San Francisco wholesale fish dealers. Either late in the year 1908 or at the beginning of the year 1909, Junta had a conversation with Meng in which he proposed to employ the latter to buy fish during the season of 1909 for him (Junta) or, more properly, for the appellant. Meng finally agreed to work for Junta upon the understanding that he would be paid for his services at the rate of half a cent per pound of fish so handled by him. The services of Meng were to and did consist in buying fish from a number of fishermen plying their occupations as such on Eel river, packing such fish in boxes and shipping them to appellant in San Francisco in the name of Junta. Meng was authorized by Junta to agree to pay the fishermen from whom he procured fish the price which would be paid during that season "down the river"—that is, whatever price those engaged in the fishery business at the mouth of the river fixed as the ruling price for fish taken from Eel river that year. Junta stated to Meng that he thought the price so paid would not be less than two cents per pound, and Meng so stated to the fishermen whose fish he engaged to purchase. (It was shown that the price per pound paid to fishermen for fish by those engaged in the business of buying fish "at the mouth of the river" during the season of 1909 was two cents.)

In brief, the testimony of Meng discloses that Junta, acting for and in behalf of appellant, employed him to buy all the fish that he could during the season of 1909 on the terms above set forth, and that, in pursuance of that arrangement, he (Meng) purchased, under special agreement with plaintiff and his assignors, the fish referred to in the complaint. Meng further testified, in direct contradiction to Junta, that the latter never at any time suggested or even intimated that the fish taken from the first night's run and purchased by him (Meng) should be shipped on consignment, and that the proposition as to shipping on consignment he never heard of until after this action was instituted. Indeed, Meng testified that, after a controversy arose between him and the appellant over the payment for the fish he had bought under his arrangement with Junta, he and the fishermen (plaintiff's assignors) held a meeting, at which Junta was present, for the purpose of discussing the situation, and that Junta then declared that the fishermen were entitled to be paid by the appellant; that Junta on that occasion said absolutely nothing about any agreement that the first run of fish should be shipped on consignment or be sold by the appellant on commission.

It was shown that a "camp" (from which term we understand is meant a structure of some sort), bearing the name of the appellant, was established and maintained by Junta on Eel river, and there he carried on the business of catching and buying fish for the appellant during the years 1907, 1908, and 1909. Junta himself testified that, during the years 1907 and 1908, he had employed men at the "camp" catching fish and that he also bought fish for the appellant from other fishermen than those who were employed by him; that he paid for the fish so purchased with money he received from the appellant.

[1] But the appellant erects its entire argument against the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict upon the testimony of Junta. It is claimed that his testimony clearly and unmistakably shows that he had no authority to purchase outright fish taken on the first night of the season, and was so expressly instructed by appellant; that Junta communicated to Meng, when making the agreement with the latter, the fact of having received such instructions from his principal and expressly declared to Meng that he was not authorized to purchase, nor would he receive, the first night's run of fish, except upon the understanding that such fish should be shipped and delivered to appellant on consignment or subject to be sold by appellant upon commission; that the fish described in the complaint were from or consisted of the first night's catch. But upon the question whether he made such statement to Meng there is, as seen, a sharp conflict in the evidence, Meng having, as we have before shown, testified that Junta never at any time stated to him that the fish purchased by him from the first night's run should be shipped on consignment or that appellant had instructed him (Junta) not to purchase fish caught the first night, or that the latter was without authority to contract for the purchase of fish taken from the river on the first night. Of course, it was for the jury to determine the truth of that as well as all other matters of fact as to which a conflict arose in the testimony, and its verdict constituted an implied finding, by which this court is bound, that the agreement as described by Meng was the agreement that was made between the parties.

[2] And we think, as the plaintiff contends, that the jury were clearly warranted in finding, from all the facts and circumstances revealed to their minds by the evidence, that Junta did negotiate the agreement with Meng to the making of which the latter testified, and that Junta was at the least possessed of ostensible power to make such agreement. Section 2300, Civ. Code. That section provides that "an agency is ostensible when the principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another his agent who is really not employed by him."

There is, as is clear from what has thus far appeared, no dispute about the employment of Junta as an agent of appellant with authority to procure fish for the corporation from Eel river, but the contention is, as seen, that if Junta made the agreement to which Meng testified, then the former exceeded his authority as such agent in that transaction. But even if it be true in point of fact that Junta thus transcended his authority, the conduct of the appellant, as disclosed by the evidence and as found by the jury, very clearly tended to lead Meng, the plaintiff and the latter's assignors into the belief that Junta was acting within the legitimate sphere of his employment when he entered into the agreement with Meng. The last named and the fishermen with whom he had business in pursuance with the agreement with Junta had been engaged for years in fishing for a livelihood in Eel river and selling their fish, either directly or indirectly, to wholesalers, some of whom had their principal places of business in San Francisco, and they knew that Junta was, during the years 1907 and 1908, the representative of appellant, especially appointed and authorized to procure fish for it either by catching or purchasing the same. There had been nothing in his conduct as agent of appellant or in the conduct of the latter with regard to his agency indicating that he was without authority to buy fish from the first night's run. In short, from the whole record, the jury were justified in inferring that appellant had either clothed Junta with unrestricted authority as its agent to make contracts with the fishermen engaged in taking fish from Eel river for the purchase of their fish whensoever the same might be taken or caught or that its conduct or silence as to his authority was such as to clearly imply that he was possessed of plenary power to do so.

That appellant knew that Junta purchased fish from the fishermen is not disputed, and if it were, the fact nevertheless would irresistibly follow from the admitted fact that the latter paid for such purchases with money furnished him by appellant. It is equally clear, from all the circumstances, that appellant knew that Junta held himself out, while at the "camp" on Eel river, as the purchaser of fish for appellant, having no "strings" attached or annexed to his authority as such purchasing agent, and yet, if his authority as such agent was in fact limited in any measure, the appellant, then, either willfully or negligently, or, as our Code puts it, "by want of ordinary care," permitted Junta to proceed, ad libitum with the purchasing of fish or the making of agreements to purchase them from the fishermen, regardless of the time at which such fish were taken from the river.

[3] The law will not, of course, permit a principal to escape the liability which it attaches to him by reason of such circumstances as are present here upon the plea that the agent has violated or transcended some limitation that he has secretly or without the knowledge of those with whom his agent as such is to deal placed upon the latter's authority as such agent, and in this case it will imply from the conduct of appellant authority in Junta to make the agreement into which the jury found that he entered with Meng. As is said by all the law writers and all the cases, the rule is that "quiescence is tantamount to acquiescence," and forbids the principal denying an authority which his own conduct has invited those with whom he was dealing to assume. See Clark on Contracts, p. 717, and cases cited in the footnote. So, it may be true—indeed, assumed—that appellant did limit the authority of Junta in the respects specified by the latter, and yet the former, under the circumstances as disclosed here, and according to the implied findings of the jury, is still bound by his acts and estopped by its own conduct from denying his authority to go as far as he did. "Where the special character of the agency is not known, and the principal has clothed the agent with apparent powers, strangers, in dealing with the agent, may assume that such apparent powers are possessed. The principal cannot, by private communications with his agent, limit the authority which he allows the agent to assume." Clark on Contracts, p. 734, and cases cited.

[4] It is true that the general rule is that "if an agency is known and is special, or if the circumstances connected with it are such as should put a party dealing with the agent on inquiry, it becomes the duty of the person so dealing with the agent to inquire into the nature and extent of the authority conferred by the principal, and to deal with the agent accordingly." Towle v. Leavitt, 23 N. H. 360, 55 Am. Dec. 195; Clark on Contracts, p. 734. But, in the case at bar, as we have seen, there was apparently no occasion for inquiry as to the extent or scope of the authority of Junta, for there was nothing in his acts or his conduct or in those of appellant that warranted inquiry by those with whom he was dealing into the extent of his authority. There appeared, in other words, no extraneous circumstances in connection with Junta's agency that would suggest any question as to any restriction on the extent or scope thereof. To the contrary, there were, as we have shown, circumstances of a very significant character tending to disclose that he was not limited in any degree in his authority to purchase fish caught at any time in Eel river from whomsoever he pleased.

[5] 2. There is no merit in the contention that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the several pleaded claims from the 23d day of October, 1910—the day on which the fish mentioned in the complaint were sold and delivered to appellant. The quantity of fish sold to and received by appellant and the price to be paid therefor were definitely fixed and known to appellant. It was not necessary, in other words, to resort to evidence in court or to an accounting or by an accord between the parties to establish the amount due. To the contrary, the amount was susceptible of ascertainment by simple computation. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164, and cases therein cited; Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 311, 317, 42 Pac. 811; Courtney v. Standard Box Co., 117 Pac. 778. Indeed, there seems to have been no dispute as to the quantity of fish delivered to appellant by Meng, and while there was some controversy involving the price per pound which Junta agreed to pay therefor—that is, whether the price agreed upon was a cent and a half or two cents per pound—still the total amount due at either price was capable of ready ascertainment by mere computation and, therefore, required no accounting to reach the precise sum due. As is said in Courtney v. Standard Box Co., supra, so it is true here: "Whether interest has been allowed upon the theory that compensation is thus awarded plaintiff for the use of his money, past due (section 1917, Civ. Code), or as damages for defendant's (appellant's) wrongful withholding of said money from plaintiff (section 3287, Civ. Code), in either case the allowance was perfectly proper."

The case of Heald v. Hendy, 89 Cal. 632, 27 Pac. 67, cited by appellant as an authority against the allowance of interest in the present case, is not in point. There the action was for a recovery upon certain running accounts, the precise amounts of which could not be ascertained except by an examination of said accounts and evidence as to their correctness.

[6] 3. The offer of appellant to show the condition of the fish referred to in the complaint when they reached San Francisco was properly rejected. The appellant tendered no issue upon that proposition. As seen, it merely denied the indebtedness upon the several claims pleaded by plaintiff. To have permitted proof that the fish were in a bad or nonmerchantable condition when they were received in San Francisco would have been to allow proof of a special defense not pleaded or set up. It is only elementary to say that a special defense, to be available, must be pleaded, and that evidence in support of such a defense where the same is not specially pleaded would be clearly inadmissible, and where admitted under such circumstances against the objection of plaintiff would be erroneous, and, if such defense were sustained, prejudicial.

4. After a careful reading of the court's charge, we have discovered nothing therein to warrant appellant's criticism thereof. The court, in its instructions, seems to have correctly covered all the important and vital points at issue.

The judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

5. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 56*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution has the burden of proof as to probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 112–116; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

6. GRAND JURY (§ 41*)—FINDING BY GRAND JURY—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The action of a grand juror cannot, in a collateral proceeding, as an action for malicious prosecution, be impeached by his testimony that he did not intend to find any such indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Grand Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 86, 87; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

7. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 59*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that a grand juror did not intend to find the indictment has no relation to the question of probable cause for the prosecution by others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 125–137; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 314*)—HEARSAY.

The question to a witness, "After refreshing your memory from that exhibit, who offered S. these inducements so to testify?" is objectionable as calling for hearsay; witness not claiming to know who offered the inducements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

9. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 59*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—EVIDENCE.

A., the county attorney, sued for malicious prosecution, because of prosecuting plaintiff for inducing S. to commit perjury on the trial of E., having been put on the stand by plaintiff and interrogated as to his reasons for the course he pursued, a statement purporting to have been made in jail by S., which was evidence that he at the trial of E. did commit perjury, and which was part of the information which came to A., as county attorney, and on which he acted, was admissible on the question of probable cause, though he did not ask the questions, or hear the answers contained in the statement, or see it signed, but on his cross-examination only stated that he knew the signature to be that of S., and that the statement was the one he referred to in his direct examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 125–137; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

10. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 59*)—"PROBABLE CAUSE"—EVIDENCE.

Probable cause, depending not on the actual state of the case, but on honest and reasonable belief, being necessarily the product, in part, of hearsay declarations, the prosecuting attorney, being called on in an action for malicious prosecution to justify his course, may give the sources of his information, and relate in detail not only the facts of his personal knowledge, but those communicated by others (citing 6 Words and Phrases, 5618–5620; vol. 8, p. 7765).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 125–137; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

11. WITNESSES (§ 275*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

A., the district attorney, sued by C. for malicious prosecution for having prosecuted C. for inducing S. to commit perjury at the trial of E., having been put on the stand by plaintiff, and asked if he had not been sued by plaintiff for slander based on his statement at the trial of E., the purpose thereof being to show malice on his part, could on cross-examination, to rebut such inference and show his good faith, state just what he then said.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 924, 926, 967–975; Dec. Dig. § 275.*]

12. WITNESSES (§ 275*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF PARTY.

A district attorney sued for malicious prosecution of C., for subornation of perjury, may on cross-examination testify to all the information imparted to him as district attorney on which he acted, he having been called as a witness for plaintiff, and on his examination in chief a part only of the information having been called for, and one informant, an alleged thief and perjurer, having been singled out, and the matter left so that it might appear that this was the only warrant for defendant's action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 924, 926, 967–975; Dec. Dig. § 275.*]

13. WITNESSES (§ 275*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

A., sued for malicious prosecution of C. for inducing S. to commit perjury, having, as a witness for plaintiff, been asked whether he agreed not to prosecute S., if S. would give his evidence in certain cases, could, on cross-examination to show his good faith in the transaction, explain fully what occurred between him and S. as to the promise of immunity.

14. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 59*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—EVIDENCE.

That one at the time of trial of the action against him for malicious prosecution knows that one of the statements on which he acted in bringing the prosecution was false in many particulars does not affect the question of probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 125–137; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

15. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

One is not harmed by the sustaining of objection to his question; the witness having subsequently testified fully as to the matter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4195–4206; Dec. Dig. § 1058.*]

16. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—CONCLUSION.

The question asking witness to state whether or not he saw plaintiff suborn a witness at a trial is objectionable as calling for a conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149–2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

17. TRIAL (§ 97*)—STRIKING TESTIMONY—INVITED ERROR.

Plaintiff in an action against a district attorney for malicious prosecution, having asked defendant if he had courted an investigation in court of the charge that he had attempted to secure money from plaintiff, on condition and promise that the indictment against plaintiff be dismissed, cannot complain of the answer as scandalous and libelous, which, while somewhat discursive and argumentative, amounted to no more than a negative, with his reasons for not courting the investigation, failure of plaintiff to make his charges sufficiently definite.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

18. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 928*)—RECORD—PRESUMPTION.

The record not purporting to contain all the instructions given, refusal of requested instructions may be presumed to have been justified by instructions given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3749–3754; Dec. Dig. § 928.*]

19. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1029*)—HARMLESS ERROR—PARTY NOT ENTITLED TO SUCCEED.

Plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution is not harmed by any error in rulings on evidence, and in giving and refusing instructions the uncontradicted facts warranting a direction for defendants, on the ground that there was probable cause for prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4035, 4036; Dec. Dig. § 1029.*]

20. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 24*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—EVIDENCE—CONVICTION.

One's conviction on a prosecution, though reversed on appeal, is conclusive of probable cause, in the absence of evidence of conviction having been obtained by fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 49–55; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; F. H. Smith, Judge.

Action by A. H. Carpenter against W. F. Sibley and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 153 Cal. 215, 94 Pac. 879, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1143, 126 Am. St. Rep. 77.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Nicol & Orr, G. F. McNoble, Louttit & Louttit, and A. H. Ashley, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The defendant W. F. Sibley was the sheriff, the defendant A. H. Ashley the district attorney, and the defendant George F. McNoble the assistant district attorney, of San Joaquin county during all the times mentioned in the complaint. The Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland was the surety on the official bond of said Sibley, and John N. Stennett, the other defendant, was, it is alleged in the complaint, "a thief and perjurer who bartered his testimony to other defendants herein for immunity from crime."

Among the allegations against these defendants is that "they corruptly, maliciously, and without probable or any cause prosecuted plaintiff before the grand jury and before a trial jury in the superior court and on appeal before the Supreme Court for the crime of subornation of perjury, and whereby they obtained a judgment of conviction against plaintiff by means of fraud, coercion, and by false and perjured testimony." Plaintiff was convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for five years, but the judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court. 136 Cal. 391, 68 Pac. 1027. The said criminal action was thereupon dismissed by the district attorney, but after the defendant therein had suffered confinement in the county jail for a period of 261 days. The trial herein was before a jury and a general verdict was rendered in favor of defendants. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a motion for a change of venue.

[1] It is apparent that we cannot disturb this latter order. The only evidence in support of the motion is found in the affidavit of plaintiff wherein he sets out that "he has reason to believe and does believe that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial of said action in said county before said or any jury" for certain reasons, which he enumerates. The material facts therein averred are all denied in the counter affidavits of the sheriff, the district attorney, and assistant district attorney, and these defendants are positive in the opinion that there was nothing to prevent the plaintiff from having a fair trial. The voir dire examination of the jurors is not included in the transcript, and hence we cannot hold, in view of the action of the court below upon conflicting affidavits, that a single citizen liable for jury duty in the county was disqualified to give plaintiff a fair and impartial trial.

Many points are made by appellant for a reversal of the judgment. Those that we consider of sufficient importance to merit consideration we proceed to notice.

[2] In the first place, it is insisted that no evidence was produced that plaintiff committed the crime charged against him, and therefore it must be held that he was prosecuted without probable cause. The gravamen of the perjury charge in the indictment is that at the trial in the justice court of Stockton township of the charge of petit larceny against one Arthur Ennis J. H. Stennett falsely testified "in substance and to the effect that he, the said J. H. Stennett, did not at any time on the night of January 8, A. D. 1901, or on the morning of January 9, 1901, or at all, see one Arthur Ennis on the premises of the said J. H. Stennett, near Lodi, in San Joaquin county, and the particular charge in said indictment against plaintiff herein was that the "said A. H. Carpenter, at and in said San Joaquin county, California, on or about the 23d day of January, A. D. 1901, did feloniously, willfully and corruptly, knowing the testimony so given by the said J. H. Stennett as aforesaid, would be, and was knowingly, willfully and corruptly false as aforesaid, and well knowing that the said J. H. Stennett well knew that the said statement that he, the said J. H. Stennett, was about to make and did make under oath, in the manner and form aforesaid, was knowingly, willfully and corruptly false, suborn, incite, and procure the said J. H. Stennett, being so sworn as aforesaid, to feloniously, knowingly, willfully, and corruptly and falsely testify as aforesaid."

Plaintiff's contention is that the only evidence that he committed the offense is found in the answers to three leading and suggestive questions asked of the said John H. Stennett, as follows: "Q. I will ask you whether he asked you then and there that afternoon whether or not you ever saw the defendant Ennis at any time out to your premises on the 8th day of January or the morning of the 9th of January, or at all? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you answer to that? A. No, sir. Q. I will ask you whether or not at any time previous to the time that you—that question was asked you and that answer given by you—whether Carpenter had even talked over with you that that was to be your answer to that question? A. Yes, sir." It is further contended that, since the relation of attorney and client existed at the time mentioned between the said Carpenter and Stennett, "the act of 'talking over' the said testimony was in no sense a crime, but a professional duty on the part of plaintiff as such attorney." There is no question as to the rule. It is well stated in Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 151, as follows: "The gravamen of the action is that the defendant instituted the proceedings without probable cause—that is, without having at the time such knowledge or information as would superinduce in the mind of an ingenuous and unprejudiced person of ordinary capacity a reasonable belief that the plaintiff was guilty of the charge. The defense must be that he did believe and had reasonable grounds to believe that the accusation he made was well founded. 'Probable cause does not depend on the actual state of the case, in point of fact, but upon the honest and reasonable belief of the party prosecuting. It must appear that the defendant knew of the existence of these facts which tended to show reasonable and probable cause, because without knowing them he could not act upon them; and also that he believed the facts amounted to the offense which he charged, because otherwise he will have made them the pretext for prosecution without even entertaining the opinion that he had a right to prosecute.' 2 Greenleaf, Ev. 455."

[3] Of course, it is apparent that the term "knowledge," as used in the foregoing quotation, is not confined to personal observation, but it includes that and also information obtained through the ordinary and generally recognized channels of communication. With this view of the requirement of the rule "of probable cause," if the evidence quoted by appellant were all that was submitted to the grand jury, we could hardly escape the conclusion that the district attorney had failed to justify his prosecution, but an examination of the whole record places the matter in an entirely different light. Mr. Ashley was put upon the stand by appellant and interrogated as to his reasons for the course he (Ashley) pursued. From his lengthy statement we select the following significant facts: On January 21st the case of People v. Davis came on for trial. Carpenter telephoned Ashley that, if the Stennetts were absent, he (Carpenter), who represented Davis as well as Ennis and the Stennetts, would consent to a continuance. Carpenter was placed upon the stand and stated that, after Stennett was acquitted a day or two before, he, Carpenter, went from the justice court to his office, but, as a matter of fact, the district attorney learned that Carpenter had gone to the Roosevelt lodging house on Main street, and while he was there a note was taken out to the Stennetts over the back fence down to the Standard lodging house, advising them to get out of town, to go down the Santa Fé Railroad track and take the train and get out that way. The statements of the Stennetts were taken very carefully, and corroborating evidence was obtained that they had visited Mr. Carpenter at his office and had seen him on the street at such times as they mentioned. Before the trial of the Ennis Case the district attorney had received from the sheriff a written statement made by Stennett in the county jail, on January

11, 1901, in which he declared that Ennis and Davis were at his house at the time in dispute, that they came there to borrow his "rig," and said they were going to Sargent's to get some pork, and they came back between half past 2 and 3 in the morning with a hog in the wagon. In said statement was given a minute account of what occurred. At the trial of Ennis Mr. Ashley heard the witness Stennett testify that he did not see Ennis at his home on the night in question. After court was adjourned, the district attorney asked the sheriff to arrest Stennett for perjury, and, in reply to Mr. Carpenter's statement that it was a bulldozing scheme, Mr. Ashley said it was a serious matter, so serious that Mr. Carpenter's connection with it would have to be investigated and laid before the grand jury, and that Carpenter would have an opportunity himself to be heard. Immediately after the trial of Stennett, Mr. Wall, a deputy sheriff, told Mr. Ashley to hurry and get a subpœna, as he had seen Carpenter beckon Stennett to go. The constable, James Grant, reported that he had gone to Carpenter's office and could get no information as to Stennett's whereabouts. Subsequently Mrs. Stennett stated to Mr. Ashley that Mr. Carpenter was in the room in the Roosevelt lodging house, and, at his suggestion, a note was written to Mr. Stennett to get out of town. Mr. Stennett and Mrs. Stennett stated that they had gone to Mr. Carpenter's place and had seen him. He said that he would have to see the statement that Stennett had made to the sheriff, that he was sorry that Stennett had made the statement, and finally made an appointment for the next day in his office. Then in the office Mr. Carpenter endeavored to ascertain whether the statement was sworn to, said it could not be sworn to because the sheriff could not administer an oath, and he did not need to identify Ennis as being at his place at Lodi, did not need to identify Ennis, who was then to be tried. Mr. Stennett said that he asked Mr. Carpenter if there was any danger of perjury, and Carpenter had told him no, and that he must not be surprised if Carpenter went after him rough on cross-examination, and that he must watch Carpenter, keep his eye on him in reference to his testimony, watch his objections, and he would maybe get a line as to how he would answer. He said further that in talking to Mr. Carpenter he would go on to say that Ennis was present when Carpenter asked him who was there, repeating that Ennis was there because of the fact, and that Mr. Carpenter would say, "You must not say that; that it would convict Ennis." The district attorney also described the peculiar conduct of Stennett while testifying at the trial of Ennis, stating that, when the witness was asked an important question, he "would wait for you (Carpenter) to object, and he seemed to gather from your objection something in line with his answer. I could not at all times be between you and the witness, and, when I got between you, the witness was confused and seemed to be at sea, and I would get more answers from him in accordance with the statement he made to the sheriff," etc. No appellate court could say that the district attorney had no legal right to believe from the foregoing and other circumstances detailed that plaintiff was guilty of the crime of subornation of perjury, and that it was his duty to prosecute him for said offense. The district attorney is necessarily vested with considerable discretion, in such matters. If there is substantial ground for his belief, and it is so held by the trial court, the finding manifestly cannot be successfully assailed on appeal. Mr. Ashley declared as a witness that "from what had come to his knowledge as district attorney, from the statements of all these parties and from his observation of the talk and actions of Mr. Carpenter, that he did not have the shadow of a doubt that plaintiff had committed the crime of subornation of perjury."

[4] The record does not show clearly all the evidence that was presented to the grand jury or that was used on the trial, but it does appear that there was a sufficient showing to constitute the basis for "probable cause." Even if this were not so, in the condition of the record, we should have to presume that the indictment and the trial were warranted, assuming that for insufficiency of the evidence therefor the district attorney could be held liable for damages in an action for malicious prosecution. We have devoted attention to the case only as it affects the defendant, Ashley, for the reason that it is very clear from the record that there was no conspiracy shown, and the acts of the other defendants were really dependent upon and subordinate to the conduct of the district attorney and in line with their plain duty as public officials without any malice whatever against the plaintiff. It is hardly necessary to add that the plaintiff may have been entirely innocent of the charge against him—and we desire to intimate nothing to the contrary—but it is nevertheless true, as a matter of law, that there was probable cause for his prosecution. In Booraem v. Potter Hotel Co., 154 Cal. 102, 97 Pac. 66, it is said the conduct of plaintiff throughout the transaction, which was the basis for his arrest, "was that of an honorable and upright man, and there was nothing in his conduct to have excited suspicion," yet, by reason of a mistake made by a Los Angeles bank in dishonoring a check, it was held that probable cause was shown for the prosecution, notwithstanding that prosecution was afterwards proved to be absolutely unwarranted.

Appellant claims that "the same testimony and facts that were before the trial jury were before the grand jury, and the only evidence before the trial jury was to the effect that plaintiff talked over the evidence with his client, and the only witness that testified to the charge was the thief and perjurer Stennett." But he is not borne out by his references to the transcript. No witness attempted to produce all the testimony that was heard by either body. The fault of appellant is in pointing out a portion of that testimony which is reproduced and assuming, contrary to the record, that nothing else was presented. One of the grand jurors called by plaintiff illustrates the fallacy of this position in the declaration that: "I can't call to memory the different witnesses and the different parts they took in that testimony. The testimony was proven to the satisfaction of the grand jury that you did suborn Stennett." He also testified that he "remembered from the evidence that the persons who testified that Mr. Carpenter committed subornation of perjury were present and heard or saw the suborning." J. A. Plummer, also, who was plaintiff's attorney on the criminal charge, testified that there was a large number of witnesses at the trial who testified to many circumstances bearing upon the charge and that he did not pretend to give all the testimony, even of Mr. or Mrs. Stennett.

[5] Appellant is equally inaccurate in his assertion that the record shows that no effort was made to prove that Stennett swore falsely when he testified that he did not see Ennis at his place. Appellant ignores the rule imposing upon him the burden of proving the want of probable cause. Respondents could rest upon the presumption that they acted in good faith and for sufficient reason, but in addition, as we have already seen, Mr. Ashley had information which justified him in the belief that said testimony was false, and it appears, at least inferentially, that there was such evidence put before the grand and also the trial jury.

[6, 7] The ruling of the court was manifestly correct in sustaining an objection to the following question asked of one of the grand jurors: "You did not intend to find any such indictment against A. H. Carpenter then?" No citation of authorities is needed for the proposition that a grand juror cannot, in a collateral proceeding, impeach in this manner his official action in finding an indictment. Besides, it is clear that it could have no relation to the question of probable cause for the prosecution or conspiracy on the part of defendants.

[8] Referring to the transcript of the testimony taken at his trial, plaintiff asked the said witness, J. A. Plummer, this question: "After refreshing your memory from that exhibit, can you tell now who offered Mrs. Stennett these inducements to so testify?" The objection was made that the writing itself was the best evidence of what the testimony was. The court so ruled. It is clear that the witness did not claim to know who offered said inducements, and hence the form of the question was objectionable as calling for hearsay testimony. But, if it was sought to show what the testimony concerning said inducements was at the trial, it is difficult to understand why plaintiff should have objected to the writing when the witness had just stated that the writing was substantially correct.

[9] Appellant claims that "it was error for the court to receive in evidence the alleged statement of John H. Stennett, which purported to have been made at the county jail on January 11, 1901. The witness did not see the hog thief sign the statement, and did not ask the questions, nor hear the answers thereto. He had no personal knowledge of the correctness of that statement." But Mr. Ashley had stated that he knew the signature to be that of Stennett, and that it was the statement to which he referred in his direct examination. It was evidence that Stennett at the trial of Ennis had committed perjury, and was a part of the information which came to Ashley as district attorney, and upon which he acted, and was clearly admissible upon the question of probable cause.

[10] "Probable cause," depending, as it does, not upon the actual state of the case, but upon the honest and reasonable belief of the party prosecuting, must necessarily be the product, in part at least, of hearsay declarations, and much of the information as to the crime and party committing it would naturally be imparted to the district attorney alone prior to the actual prosecution. Called upon to justify his course in instituting the investigation before the grand jury and in bringing plaintiff to trial on the indictment, it was entirely proper for Mr. Ashley to give the sources of his information and to relate in detail the facts of his own personal knowledge and those communicated by others in order that the court might determine whether his activity against the plaintiff rested upon an honest and reasonable belief as to guilt and was inspired by a sense of duty and right or was the product of a wanton and malicious purpose to injure plaintiff or to accomplish some object which he knew to be wrong and against sound public policy. Fox v. Smith, 25 R. I. 255, 55 Atl. 698; 6 Words and Phrases, 5620–5627, vol. 8, p. 7765. Indeed, the recital of his reasons for the prosecution was invited by the plaintiff, who asked Mr. Ashley for the sources of his information, and "where and when he learned that the offense of subornation of perjury had been committed."

[11] It was entirely proper for the court to allow the witness Ashley to answer the question: "Did you at that time say anything to Mr. Carpenter with reference to investigating his case, and if the facts coming to your knowledge justified it in your judgment as district attorney of laying it before the grand jury?" The question related to the trial of Ennis, and was proper cross-examination. The witness had been asked by plaintiff if the former had not been sued by the latter for slander based upon the statements made by Ashley at the time. The purpose of the direct examination in that respect was obviously to show malice on the part of the witness. To rebut the inference and to show his good faith he clearly had the right on cross-examination to state just what was said.

[12] The court committed no error in overruling plaintiff's objection to the question asked of Mr. Ashley on cross-examination: "Will you please state fully all the information imparted to you as district attorney upon which you acted and upon which you brought to the attention of the grand jury, the charge against A. H. Carpenter of subornation of perjury?" On examination in chief a part of the information had been called for, and one informant, an alleged thief and perjurer, had been singled out and the matter left so that it might appear that this was the only warrant for the district attorney's action. The door was thereby opened for a complete revelation of the sources and extent of his information.

[13] It was entirely proper for Mr. Ashley, on cross-examination, to explain fully what occurred between him and the witness Stennett as to the promise of immunity from prosecution made by the former to the latter in order to show the good faith of the district attorney in the transaction. Besides, he substantially covered the ground in the direct examination when, in reply to the question: "Did you agree not to prosecute him for any charges of perjury and for his hog stealing if he would give his evidence in certain cases?" he answered: "I agreed if—on the—after the 24th of March, after consultation with Judge Budd—that I would not prosecute him for these charges of perjury, provided he would tell the truth and furnish me with all the circumstances and details and corroborating matters which would show at every time the matters and things involved in their truthful light; and to the best of my knowledge he did so."

[14, 15] Appellant complains that the court sustained an objection to the following question asked by him of Mr. Ashley on redirect examination: "This statement that has been offered in evidence and that has been read in evidence, of Jack Stennett, was false in many particulars?" The question was objectionable on the ground that the statement had been received in evidence simply for the purpose of showing the information which came to the district attorney. It would not affect the question of probable cause if the district attorney knew at the time of the present trial that said statement was false in many particulars. As a matter of fact, however, the witness testified afterwards without objection that at the time the statement was made he "was satisfied that portions of it were false and portions were true." Appellant, therefore, had the full advantage of any material inquiry as to the verity of the statement.

[16] Plaintiff asked witness Parker, the justice of the peace who presided at the trial of Ennis, the following question: "Now will you state to the jury whether or not you saw me suborn the witness Stennett while the trial was going on there in your presence, and in the presence of the jury and spectators?" The court properly sustained an objection that it called for a conclusion, and not facts and occurrences. The witness was permitted to answer every proper question that was submitted to him.

[17] Mr. Ashley was asked by plaintiff this question: "You have not courted an investigation in this court upon that subject, have you?" referring to a charge that the said Ashley had attempted to secure $1,000 from Carpenter upon condition and promise that the indictment against the latter be dismissed. The witness answered: "Because you never have put a paper in this court in my judgment stating facts upon which any proceeding could be had against you for your statements. You state your facts in such a way it does not give the court jurisdiction, and it does not give the party any recourse against you. You put into your papers a number of allegations of such a character that they cannot be answered for their indefiniteness and there is no way to meet them." The answer is somewhat discursive and argumentative. It amounts no more, however, than to a negative with his reasons for not courting the investigation. Appellant claims that this and some subsequent answers were "scandalous and libelous," but it may be said that, considering the character of the questions propounded, it hardly behooves appellant to complain.

[18] Some 30 instructions, covering 25 pages of the transcript, were requested by plaintiff and refused. In reply to appellant's complaint, for the court's action, it would be sufficient to say that the record does not purport to contain all the instructions given. We should have to indulge, therefore, the presumption, if necessary, that the jury were fully instructed by the court. But, assuming that the full charge is contained in the transcript, it is apparent that the jury were instructed upon all questions that were necessary for their enlightenment.

[19] Finally, it may be said in answer to all the criticism of the rulings of the court during the trial and of its action in giving and refusing instructions, that, if any error was committed, the error was without prejudice for the reason that the only conclusion warranted by the evidence is that there was probable cause for the prosecution of appellant, and, furthermore, upon certain uncontradicted facts to which Mr. Ashley and others testified, the court would have been authorized to instruct the jury to render a verdict for defendants for the reason that there was sufficient ground for said prosecution. There was some contradiction of the truth of some of the statements made to Ashley, but no contradiction of the fact that he was so informed, and there is nothing in the record to justify the conclusion that he did not act in good faith.

[20] There is no evidence in the record of any fraud on the part of the defendants or any of them. Hence, under the rule, the conviction of appellant was sufficient evidence of probable cause for his prosecution. It is stated in Holliday v. Holliday, 123 Cal. 32, 55 Pac. 704, that, "without reviewing the cases cited, we deem it enough to say that, while there is some apparent conflict in the decisions, the prevailing rule is that when a person is charged before a competent court having jurisdiction of the matter, and is tried and found guilty, the judgment rendered, unless it is shown to have been obtained by means of fraud, is conclusive evidence of probable cause for making the charge, even though it is afterward held to be unauthorized and reversed on appeal. Crescent Live Stock Co. v. Butchers' Union, 120 U. S. 141 [7 Sup. Ct. 472, 30 L. Ed. 614]." In the latter case it is said: "The rule is founded on deeper grounds of public policy in vindication of the dignity and authority of judicial tribunals constituted for the purpose of administering justice according to law and in order that their judgments and decrees may be invested with that force and sanctity which shall be a shield and protection to all parties and persons in privity with them."

[21] Again, the gravamen of the charge against defendants is that they "did for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff in his social and business relations and of exposing him to public hatred, ridicule, and contempt, wrongfully, unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together to falsely charge and accuse plaintiff of the crime of subornation of perjury and also to convict and punish him for the aforesaid felony and in pursuance thereof, at divers times during the aforesaid period, the above-named conspirators unlawfully procured false evidence to be given before the grand jury," etc. There was no evidence worthy of the name that the defendants did conspire together for such purpose or for any purpose, nor is there any evidence that in "pursuance" of any conspiracy or at all they "procured false evidence to be given before the grand jury." There was, therefore, an entire failure to prove the material allegations of the complaint, and the jury might properly have been so instructed.

We have examined the record with care, but we are satisfied with the conclusion of the lower court. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

EXCHANGE NAT. BANK v. ROSS.

(Civ. 951.)

1. Estoppel (§ 118*)—Evidence—Findings.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain a finding that plaintiff bank had acquiesced in the sale of certain real estate and the completion of the transaction, so as to be estopped to assert a liability against defendant on notes previously pledged to it for a part of the purchase price of the property by defendant's vendor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 306, 308; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

2. Bills and Notes (§ 427*)—Pledged Notes—Rights of Pledgee.

Defendant purchased certain real estate from S., paying part of the price and agreeing to pay the balance, evidenced by notes for $300, payable at intervals of 6 months, S. agreeing to convey a clear title to the property, which at the time of the contract was incumbered by mortgage for $2,000. S. assigned defendant's notes to plaintiff bank as security for an indebtedness, but, before defendant had notice thereof, he contracted to convey the property to K., pursuant to which agreement certain money was deposited in escrow in a savings bank. Before the transaction was consummated, defendant was notified of the pledge. Notwithstanding such notice, the property was sold to K. and the money received used to satisfy the outstanding mortgage, plaintiff receiving nothing. Held, that plaintiff bank never having consented to such settlement, it constituted no satisfaction of defendant's notes pledged to it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Exchange National Bank against J. A. Ross. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Roland G. Swaffield, for appellant. Simpson Moody & Simpson, and J. H. Merriam, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Action brought upon five promissory notes, each being for the sum of $300, executed by defendant and made payable to S. A. Sanderson or order. These notes were negotiable in form, but were given to represent a certain indebtedness arising upon a contract for the purchase of real property. On June 28, 1906, defendant and S. A. Sanderson entered into a written contract whereby Sanderson agreed to sell and defendant to buy portions of two lots of land in the city of Long Beach. The contract provided that the defendant should pay a total sum of $2,250 for the property, and that he was to receive a clear title thereto. The promissory notes were given as evidence of the partial payments to become due under the contract, it being provided in the latter instrument that the sum of $300 should be paid by defendant Ross upon the execution of the contract, and the further sums of $300 every six months thereafter, except that the final payment of $150 was to be made three months after the last installment of $300 became due. On April 26, 1907, Sanderson assigned the contract, together with the promissory notes incident thereto, to the plaintiff bank as collateral security for the payment of a large indebtedness then owing by him to said plaintiff. At the time the contract referred to was made, the real property which was the subject thereof was incumbered by a mortgage given prior thereto by Sanderson to secure an indebtedness of $2,000 owing to one Mary M. Shaw. At the time the assignment of the contract was made by Sanderson to plaintiff, defendant Ross had paid all of the money then required to be paid by him, to wit, the initial payment of $300 and the payment of the further sum of $300 which had fallen due on December 28, 1906. Before defendant had notice that Sanderson had assigned the contract and notes to the plaintiff, he had entered into some agreement whereby it was contemplated that one Kirsher should be given title to the real property agreed to be conveyed by Sanderson to defendant. Certain money which was to be used in the consummation of the latter deal was deposited with the escrow clerk of the Citizens' Savings Bank of Long Beach, but before this transaction was finally consummated defendant Ross received notice that the plaintiff bank held the contract and notes which he had theretofore executed in favor of Sanderson. Notwithstanding this notice, a sale of the property was made to Kirsher, the money received being used to satisfy the mortgage indebtedness then outstanding to Mrs. Shaw, and the plaintiff bank received nothing. The latter commenced this action on July 2, 1909, at which time the several notes for $300 each, falling due, respectively, on June 28, 1907, December 28, 1907, June 28, 1908, December 28, 1908, and June 28, 1909, had all matured. The trial court found in favor of the defendant and entered a judgment accordingly, from which judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] The appeal may be determined by an examination of the questions presented by appellant touching the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court. Among other facts determined, the trial court made the following finding: "That after the placing of said money in escrow with said Citizens' Savings Bank by said defendant and said Kirsher as aforesaid, the plaintiff having knowledge of the deposit of said money in escrow as aforesaid, consented to and urged the carrying out of said escrow." This finding was made evidently with the view entertained by the trial judge that, while defendant, after receiving notice that his contract and notes had been assigned by Sanderson to the bank, was answerable to the bank on account of payments becoming due under said contract, the plaintiff had by acquiescence in the sale of the property to Kirsher and the carrying out of the terms of that transaction, whatever they may have been, estopped itself from thereafter making any claim against the defendant on account of the contract indebtedness. If the fact had appeared in evidence according to the terms of the finding of the court, no doubt the legal result just indicated would follow, but the evidence is wholly insufficient to sustain the finding. Nowhere in the bill of exceptions is it shown just what the contract proposed to be made with Kirsher, and which was presumably evidenced by some writing placed with the escrow holder, was. Defendant Ross admitted that before the deal with Kirsher had been carried out he received notice from the plaintiff bank that it held his contract and notes, and he himself testified upon that subject as follows: "The money was put up in the bank about July 19, 1907, and I learned that the Exchange National Bank held the notes a short time after that. At the time the money was paid over and the deed from Sanderson to Kirsher delivered, I knew that the Exchange National Bank held these notes. Prior to that time I had gone to Mr. Julian (the escrow clerk) and told him not to turn that money over to Sanderson until he had possession of the notes. I had several conversations with Mr. Wallace of the Exchange National Bank with reference to these notes prior to the closing of the deal on September 6, 1907." The following testimony given by the cashier of plaintiff bank was uncontradicted by any testimony which appears in the record: "While the money was still in escrow in the Citizens' Savings Bank, and in the early part of August, 1907, Mr. Ross told me that he had instructed Mr. Julian not to deliver the money to Sanderson until he had possession of the notes. During the early part of August, 1907, after I had written Mr. Ross relative to these notes, notifying him that we were the owners of the same, and after I had received a reply, I had several conversations with Mr. Ross relative to the payment of these notes. He came to the bank two or three times trying to get the notes and stated that he had sold the property and asked me if I wouldn't turn over those notes so that he could complete the escrow as he had sold the property. I suggested he could, upon satisfying what Mr. Sanderson owed us, I would turn over the notes. Then he said he would notify Mr. Julian or notify the bank, not to turn over that money until we got the money concerning that point. This occurred after I had written him as I before stated and after he had replied and during the early part of August, 1907." There was also introduced in evidence the following letter, which was identified by defendant as having been received by him: "August 6, 1907. Mr. J. A. Ross, Pasadena Calif.—Dear Sir: We are in receipt of your letter of the 2nd inst., explaining that the $1,650 had been in the First National Bank of this city since June 28th to pay off notes bearing your name. We thank you for this information and will have to admit that we were not aware of the transaction. We are notifying the First National Bank to-day and urging them to hasten the cleaning up of this matter. Very truly yours, Wm. H. Wallace, Cashier."

[2] This is in substance all of the testimony introduced touching the matter of any alleged consent given by plaintiff bank to the carrying out of the Kirsher deal, and it is far from establishing the important fact found by the court, that the bank consented to the carrying out of the escrow agreement in the way in which it was carried out, with the result that plaintiff should receive nothing on account of the contract and notes held by it. As before noted, the testimony as shown in the record is meager indeed, upon the subject of just what the escrow directions, as given to the Citizens' Savings Bank, were. Conceding that the promissory notes and agreement of purchase taken together evidenced a contract nonnegotiable in form, and that therefore until defendant Ross had notice of the assignment thereof to plaintiff, he would have been justified in making payment of his obligation to his original creditor, Sanderson, the case as it is presented to us stands without any evidence tending to show that Ross had by any binding contract satisfied his indebtedness to Sanderson before notice that the bank held his contract and notes was received by him. The defendant did in fact recognize the claim of the bank and represented to the latter that he had given instructions that the Kirsher deal was not to be carried out until the notes held by the bank had been surrendered. Quoting his own words, he said: "Prior to that time I had gone to Mr. Julian and told him not to turn that money over to Sanderson until he had possession of the notes." We do not regard the evidence referring to the satisfaction of the mortgage held by Mrs. Shaw, and the finding based thereon, as material to a determination of the controversy. It may be added that the evidence does not show that the total consideration received on the Kirsher deal was only sufficient to satisfy the mortgage held by Mrs. Shaw. Witness Julian, the escrow clerk, testified as follows: "The total amount put up was something like $2,100. The selling price of the property as we had it was part money and part trade." The fact was that defendant Ross, having made payment of $600 on account of a total sum of $2,250 to be paid under his contract for the purchase of real estate, entered into a negotiation with Sanderson and Kirsher by which he proposed to transfer his interest in the property and so satisfy his debt to Sanderson. At that time he owed no debt to Sanderson, plaintiff bank having acquired the right to receive all moneys due under the contract, and any settlement or compromise made with Sanderson was without effect as against the right of the bank to make collection of the full amount of the indebtedness. As we have pointed out, there is no evidence sufficient to justify the finding of the court that the plaintiff bank gave consent to any attempted settlement made by the defendant with the original payee of the contract and notes.

It follows that the judgment and order must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

PEHL v. FANTON. (Civ. 875.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 171*)—Trial—Theory of Cause—Questions Not Raised at Trial.

Where in an action for broker's commissions, the court inadvertently struck from defendant's answer matter denying that plaintiff had procured a purchaser, but, notwithstanding this, plaintiff introduced evidence to prove the fact, and both parties tried the case on the theory that a material issue had been raised thereon, plaintiff could not claim for the first time on appeal that there was no denial of such fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1053–1069, 1161–1165; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

2. Brokers (§ 60*)—Performance of Contract.

Where a broker is employed to negotiate a sale of property, and has found a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase on the vendor's terms, the broker's right to commissions does not depend on final consummation of the sale by the vendor; the broker's contract being complete when he delivers or tenders to the owner a valid written contract containing the terms of sale agreed on, signed by a party able to comply therewith, or to answer in damages if he fails to perform.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 91–97; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

3. Brokers (§ 49*) — Contract — Services — Procurement of Purchaser — Escrow Agreement.

Where a broker, employed to sell property on specified terms, procured a person who executed an escrow agreement to purchase the property, or forfeit $1,000, such agreement was a mere option to purchase, and not a sale, and did not entitle the broker to commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 70–72; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

4. Brokers (§ 49*)—Employment to Sell Realty—Terms of Contract—"Sale for Cash."

Where a broker was employed to sell real estate for a specified price, payable half cash and the balance in a year's time, such terms required payment of the cash portion immediately on a delivery of the property sold; and hence an agreement with a proposed purchaser, authorizing him to pay the cash part of the price within 15 days, was not a compliance with the terms.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by N. G. Pehl against C. D. Fanton. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. P. Huey and Walter C. Davison, for appellant. G. R. Freeman, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff, a real estate broker, brought this action to recover from defendant $300 for commissions alleged to be due him for obtaining a purchaser for certain real estate owned by defendant. Judgment was rendered for defendant, from which, and on order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

As shown by the record, defendant, on February 5, 1907, by a memorandum in writing, authorized plaintiff to sell the property therein described as lot No. 406 of Ontario colony lands for the price of $11,000 payable one-half in cash and the balance in one year, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payment thereof to be secured by a mortgage on the property sold, which agreement contained the following provision: "If sale is made, I hereby agree to execute and deliver a good and acceptable conveyance of said property, and to pay a commission of 5 per cent. on the first $1,000 or less, and 2½ per cent. on all over that amount, out of the first payment." No time was specified when plaintiff's authority to sell should terminate, and the authority given was at no time revoked by defendant. In his complaint plaintiff alleged that on March 6, 1908, he procured a buyer who was then and there ready, willing, and able to purchase and pay for the property in conformity with the the terms and conditions set forth in said contract, and notified defendant to that effect, but defendant refused to consummate the sale. This allegation (other than that defendant refused to make the sale) was denied by the answer, which also, in addition to its denials, set up certain affirmative matter, beginning on line 11, p. 3, of the answer, and ending on line 18, p. 4, thereof. Plaintiff moved that all of said matter (specifying it by line and page) be stricken from the answer as irrelevant and redundant. This motion was by the court granted, but, instead of limiting the order as made to that part of the answer to which the motion was directed, the court, as shown by the minute entry, ordered stricken out certain designated pages of the answer, which included the allegations of denial, leaving as the only issue to be tried under the pleadings certain affirmative defenses, as to which the court found adversely to defendant. Notwithstanding the fact that it clearly appears the order of court was due to inadvertence, and not responsive to the motion, counsel for appellant strenuously insists that this court should eliminate from consideration all issues, other than those raised by the answer, after the making of the said order as shown by the record; and thus considered it is claimed that certain material findings in favor of defendant are not within the issues.

[1] It is apparent, however, that upon the trial of the cause both the court and the parties regarded the question whether or not plaintiff had, as alleged, procured a purchaser for the property, in accordance with the terms of the contract authorizing the sale, as the chief issue involved. Without objection, both plaintiff and defendant introduced evidence touching the question, and the court made its findings thereon. If the plaintiff had desired to take advantage of such condition of the pleadings, he should not only have refrained from introducing evidence in support of the allegation of his complaint which he now claims was not denied, but should also have entered an objection to the defendant introducing testimony thereon. Having failed to do so and the parties and the court having tried the case upon the theory that such material issue was involved in the pleadings, appellant cannot in this court for the first time raise the question that there was no such issue to be tried. Flinn v. Ferry, 127 Cal. 648, 60 Pac. 434; Barbour v. Flick, 126 Cal. 628, 59 Pac. 122; Murdock v. Clarke, 90 Cal. 427, 27 Pac. 275; Klopper v. Levy, 98 Cal. 525, 33 Pac. 444.

In support of plaintiff's allegation that he had procured one ready, able, and willing to purchase the property in accordance with the terms and conditions of the memorandum authorizing the making of the sale, he introduced evidence establishing the following facts: On March 6, 1908, 13 months after the date when plaintiff was so authorized to sell the property, he procured one Henry S. Grunenwald to execute certain escrow instructions, directed to the First National Bank of Upland, California, wherein it was stated: "I herewith hand you check for $1,000, and agree to deposit with you $4,500 in cash on or before fifteen days from this date, and agree within said fifteen days to execute and deliver to you one promissory note and mortgage securing same on the property described below, dated March 6, 1908, due one year after date, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, with 3 per cent. rebate clause" —which note and mortgage was to be in favor of defendant for the sum of $5,500, and the bank was instructed to deliver the $1,000, together with the mortgage agreed to be executed and the $4,500 agreed to be deposited, to defendant upon receipt of a deed for the property, accompanied by a certificate of title from the Pioneer Abstract & Title Guaranty Company, or the Consolidated Abstract & Title Company, showing title to be vested in defendant, free of incumbrances, except taxes, etc. It was further provided in said escrow that, "in event you are unable to comply with these instructions within fifteen days from the date hereof, on account of my failure to comply with the terms herein stated, you are authorized to pay to the seller $1,000 as forfeit, and hold balance subject to my order," to all of which plaintiff assented in writing, signing the same "N. G. Pehl, Agent." That at said time defendant was living near Corona, Cal., and plaintiff wired him from Upland, Cal., that he had sold the property in accordance with the terms of the contract, which telegram was followed by a letter to the same effect. The court made its findings in accordance with the facts thus established, except that the court erroneously found that, as a condition of sale, defendant was required to furnish certificates from two abstract companies, certifying to the satisfactory condition of title; whereas, the escrow contract required a certificate from either one of two such companies therein designated.

[2] The law is well settled that where a broker is employed to negotiate a sale of property, and has found a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase upon the vendor's expressed terms, the broker's right to recover the agreed commission does not depend upon the final consummation of the sale by the vendor. "The contract on the part of the broker is complete when he delivers or tenders to the owner a valid written contract, containing the terms of sale agreed on, signed by a party able to comply therewith, or to answer in damages if he should fail to perform. * * * The necessity of a written contract of sale may be rendered unnecessary if the agent bring the vendor and vendee together, and the latter is able and willing and offers to complete the contract, provided the vendor will make the conveyance. In such a case the agent has done all that he can do, and if the vendor, under such circumstances, refused to complete the sale, he, nevertheless, will be compelled to pay the agent his commissions, * * * whether the trade is finally consummated or not, because if the vendee refuses to take the property the vendor holds the contract, which renders the former liable for all damages." Hayden v. Grillo, 35 Mo. App. 647, cited with approval in Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 353, 33 Pac. 1105.

[3] Plaintiff's right to recover is dependent upon whether or not the execution and delivery of the escrow contract, the substance of which is hereinabove stated, accompanied by his check for $1,000, to be applied as therein specified, constituted either a sale of the property, or the procuring of a purchaser therefor, within the terms of the authorization given. Tested by the authorities, we are firmly convinced that it did not. At most, the escrow constituted a proposed purchase of an option on the part of Grunenwald to buy the property within 15 days from the date of the escrow, according to the terms of the memorandum given plaintiff, authorizing him to make a sale, and in the event of Grunenwald's failure to exercise such option and complete the purchase on his part the $1,000 was to be paid to defendant as forfeit money; otherwise to be applied on the first payment of $5,500. Indeed, counsel for plaintiff admits as much, for he says, referring to Grunenwald's contract: "This agreement was placed in escrow, together with a $1,000 check, in the First National Bank of Upland; said $1,000 being forfeit money, in case said Grunenwald refused to buy the property." And, again, that "defendant would receive $1,000 as forfeit money, then on deposit in the First National Bank of Upland, California," in case Grunenwald made default in paying the balance of $4,500 and causing the delivery of the note and mortgage for $5,500. It is not claimed that plaintiff at any time brought the parties together, or that defendant ever assented to the sale to Grunenwald. Conceding the latter was ready, willing, and able to purchase upon the terms authorized by defendant, nevertheless he signed no agreement or contract binding himself so to do. Had defendant accepted the offer of Grunenwald, obtained through plaintiff as broker, the latter would have been entitled to recover his commissions (Sibbald v. Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 378, 38 Am. Rep. 441; Gunn v. Bank of California, supra); but, for a failure on the part of Grunenwald to execute the note and mortgage and make the further payment provided within the time specified, defendant's only remedy would have been the enforcement of the provision for the forfeiture of the deposit of $1,000. "This," says counsel for plaintiff, "was ample deposit to protect the owner, had the purchaser refused to perform further." The record being silent upon the subject of the sufficiency of the deposit for such purpose, this court cannot, as a matter of law, so hold; suffice it to say, the plaintiff had no authority to make such contract for the defendant. Moreover, one-half of the sale price was payable in cash, while Grunenwald's proposition contemplated an extension of time of 15 days within which to make payment of the $4,500.

[4] A sale for cash is one wherein the money is to be paid immediately upon the delivery of the property sold. Bliss v. Arnold, 8 Vt. 252, 30 Am. Dec. 467; Chapman v. Devereux, 32 Vt. 616; Civ. Code, § 1784. Under the terms of the memorandum authorizing the sale to be made by plaintiff, defendant had the right to insist upon payment of the entire $5,500 and delivery of an executed note and mortgage immediately upon tender of a sufficient conveyance, transferring good title to the buyer. To postpone such payment for a period of 15 days was not "cash," within the terms of the authority given plaintiff.

In view of the fact that plaintiff did not, as alleged in his complaint, procure a purchaser for the property within the terms upon which he was authorized to make the sale, it is unnecessary to discuss other alleged errors to which our attention is directed. In no event, under the circumstances of this case, could the substantial rights of appellant be prejudiced by reason thereof.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

JOHNSTON v. JOHNSTON. (Civ. 869.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 14, 1911.)

1. Divorce (§ 127*)—Desertion—Evidence—Corroboration.

Where, in an action for divorce for desertion, the only evidence in corroboration was the affidavit of a witness, averments of which in the main were mere conclusions, and did not contain any statement with reference to the husband's alleged misconduct or threats to injure the wife, there was no sufficient corroboration, required by Civ. Code, § 130, providing that no divorce can be granted on a default of the defendant, or on the uncorroborated admission or testimony of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 403–407; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

2. Divorce (§ 127*)—Evidence—Corroboration.

Corroboration required by Civ. Code, § 130, in an action for divorce, is sufficient if it is pertinent to some fact or facts which is or are sufficient to support the action, and to justify the entry of a decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 403–407; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

3. Divorce (§ 31*)—Grounds—Nonsupport.

Where, at the time plaintiff left her husband for alleged cruelty, he furnished her with means of transportation, and gave her a check for $50, and it did not appear that she ever requested or desired any further contribution from him while she remained away from his place of abode, but the evidence indicated that she did not expect defendant to contribute to her support after she left, she was not entitled to a divorce for nonsupport.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 95, 96; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

4. Divorce (§ 249*)—Division of Property—Homestead.

Civ. Code, § 146, provides that, in case of the dissolution of a marriage, the community property and the homestead shall be assigned to the former owner, if it has been selected from the separate property of either, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the innocent party. Held that, where plaintiff, in an action for divorce, claimed that certain real property was her separate estate, and prayed a decree to that effect, but on the trial it was proved that she and her husband had joined in a declaration of homestead affecting the property, the court was limited to a disposition thereof in accordance with section 146, which right was dependent on the granting of a divorce; and this being denied the homestead rights of the parties continued.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George R. Davis, Judge.

Action for divorce by Jessie E. Johnston against James C. Johnston. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jones & Weller, for appellant. G. A. Gibbs, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Action for divorce. Appeal by defendant from the decree entered against him. In the complaint of plaintiff were set out two causes of action; one for the desertion of her by defendant, and the other for defendant's failure to provide her with the necessaries of life. Defendant in his answer, denied generally the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, and on this appeal contends that the evidence heard at the trial is insufficient to support the judgment of the court.

[1, 2] The parties were married in the year 1876, in the county of Los Angeles, and lived together until about the year 1887, when plaintiff left defendant and remained away from him for a great many years, returning again to reside with her husband in 1905. During the interval of her absence, she lived with another man as his wife. In September, 1905, defendant was living at a mining settlement called Cactus Flats, in California. After it had been arranged that his wife was to return and live with him, the couple went before a magistrate at San Bernardino, and a second marriage ceremony was performed, after which they immediately left for Cactus Flats, and there took up their abode. In July of the following year, the plaintiff again left the defendant and came to Los Angeles, where she continued to reside up to the time of the commencement and trial of this action. She testified that her husband had paid her traveling expenses when she left him, and the husband testified that he gave his wife a check for $50 at the time of her departure. Plaintiff further testified that defendant was willing that she should go, and knew that she never intended to return. As to the cause assigned by her for leaving, we quote her own words as they appear in the transcript of the testimony: "It was his continual accusation of wrong, and another was a continual threat of my life. * * * There was no one there to do wrong with. It was a continual accusation of wrong, and what he was going to do, and if he caught any one around there, and all this. He carried a shotgun or rifle continuously. I told him if he killed some innocent person it would be a terrible thing; and he said he had a right to kill anybody that came on his place.

And on the 13th day of May, 1906, he was very angry. I don't know why he should be; but it was always just after the stage left. * * * I told him that he would have to tell me what in the world had made him act so, why he should do so; and I told him I would not stand any such treatment as that. I could not live with anybody and live under those conditions; and that was the first cause of our trouble, years and years ago, when I left him, a continual accusation of something wrong. So he got very angry. He took up the shotgun, dragged me into the front room, and pulled the shotgun on me, and I took the shotgun away from him, and he knows it. He says he never threatened to kill me; he knows he said that." The foregoing statement is the substance of all of the material testimony given by the plaintiff touching the matter of the cause which defendant furnished for her act of leaving him. It will be noted that plaintiff was not specific as to the particular charge which her husband made against her. She did, however, testify to acts of violence committed by him against her person; and if enough corroboration of her testimony is to be found in other evidence furnished at the trial a sufficient case would be made out to sustain the decree of the court, given upon the first cause of action set out in the complaint, to wit, that for desertion. Section 98, Civ. Code. Corroboration of the testimony given by the plaintiff in support of her first cause of action was sought to be shown by an affidavit made by one Anna D. Crain, which was admitted in evidence by stipulation of counsel. The material parts of that affidavit read as follows: "I know there was a great deal of trouble between the plaintiff and the defendant while I was there, caused by the jealousy of the defendant for the plaintiff, which was without any reason; that upon Memorial Day the plaintiff visited my school, and her appearance indicated that she was in great distress of mind, and that she had been crying. The same night I went back to the plaintiff's house and stayed all night. Things were in great disorder at her house, and I said, 'It looks as though you were going to move,' and Mrs. Johnston said: 'Yes; I am going to move, because Mr. Johnston is accusing me of things that I am not guilty of,' and this was said in the presence of Mr. Johnston, and he did not deny it; he turned and walked away. The next day a party went over to Rose Mine, and Mr. Johnston went along and would not converse with any one, unless spoken to, and then only in monosyllables, so that it was noticed very much and remarked among the people that something was the matter with him." In the main, the statements made in this affidavit were expressions of mere conclusions upon the part of the deponent. It was not shown that the plaintiff, in the presence of her husband and Anna D. Crain, stated what her husband had accused her of, and nothing at all was said by the plaintiff to Anna D. Crain, so far as the affidavit expresses the things which she did state, about any violence committed by the husband against the wife, or of any threats made by him to injure plaintiff in any way. In our opinion, the testimony given in support of the cause of action for desertion is entirely without corroboration. Section 130 of the Civil Code provides that: "No divorce can be granted upon the default of the defendant, or upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties. * * *" Attention has been called by counsel for respondent to the case of Venzke v. Venzke, 94 Cal. 225, 29 Pac. 499, in which it is claimed a condition of evidence parallel to that shown in this case is disclosed. An examination of the decision referred to, however, does not bear out that contention. In the Venzke Case, the ground of extreme cruelty was assigned by the plaintiff, consisting of various alleged harsh conduct indulged in by the defendant there, and upon each of the several items of said charge there was some specific and direct testimony furnished by witnesses, other than the plaintiff herself. It has been said that corroboration in divorce actions is sufficient, if such corroboration is pertinent to "some fact or facts which is or are sufficient to support the action, and justify the entry of the decree in plaintiff's favor." Cooper v. Cooper, 88 Cal. 45, 25 Pac. 1062; Matthai v. Matthai, 49 Cal. 90. In our view of this case, this measure of corroboration has not been here satisfied.

[3] There was no sufficient evidence to sustain the finding that defendant had willfully failed to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life for more than one year preceding the commencement of her action. Without dispute, it appears in testimony that at the time plaintiff left Cactus Flats in July, 1906, defendant furnished her with the means of transportation, giving her a check for $50; and it nowhere appears by any of the testimony that the plaintiff ever requested or desired any further contribution from him while she remained away from his place of abode. In fact, every natural inference to be drawn from all the facts and circumstances shown in evidence supports the conclusion that the plaintiff did not require or expect the defendant to contribute to her support after she left him the last time.

[4] In the course of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, it was set up that plaintiff was the owner of certain real property situated at Wilmington, in the county of Los Angeles, which was her own separate estate. She asked for a decree so declaring it to be, and the judgment of the court followed in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The defendant in his answer denied that the property mentioned was the separate property of the wife, and alleged that the property had been acquired by purchase by him subsequent to his marriage with the plaintiff. Evidence was introduced on the part of plaintiff touching the purchase of this property, which was sufficient to establish the fact, as found by the court, that the land in question was of the separate estate of the wife. However, in the course of the trial, the plaintiff voluntarily showed that in the year 1884 a joint declaration of homestead affecting this property had been duly executed by herself and husband, and no showing was made that this homestead so selected had ever been abandoned or relinquished. If it had not been shown that the character of a homestead had become attached to the property, the decree of the court, having been made without any objection raised to its jurisdiction to make such a decree in this kind of an action, might be sustained and remain undisturbed, notwithstanding the reversal of the judgment for divorce. This court has held that where, by cross-complaint in a divorce action, conflicting claims to real property are sought to be settled, and no objection is urged by the parties, and trial is had, such parties would be precluded thereafter from questioning the jurisdiction of the court to make and enter a judgment affecting issues thus presented. Huneke v. Huneke, 12 Cal. App. 199, 107 Pac. 131. But here the plaintiff in making her proof showed to the court that the property which she claimed as her separate estate was subject to homestead rights created by the joint act of herself and husband, and this fact appearing, the court in the disposition thereof would be controlled by the provisions of section 146, Civil Code. The provisions of that section, in so far as they are material in their application to this case, are as follows: "In case of the dissolution of the marriage by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, the community property, and the homestead, shall be assigned as follows: * * * 4. If a homestead has been selected from the separate property of either, it shall be assigned to the former owner of such property, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the innocent party." By this section, the right of the trial court to make any order or decree which would be determinative of the interests of the respective parties in the homestead is dependent upon a decree first being made, dissolving the marriage. If the marriage is not dissolved, then the homestead rights of the parties continue undisturbed. The decree in this case determines that the plaintiff's title to the real property is quieted against all claims of the defendant, and that the defendant is estopped from setting up any claims thereto. The decree in its entirety must therefore be set aside.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SAN FRANCISCO & SUBURBAN HOME BLDG. SOCIETY v. LEONARD et al.

(Civ. 828.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 17, 1911.)

1. Forcible Entry and Detainer (§ 4*)—Possession of Manager of Corporation—Limitation of Employment.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1159, provides that every person is guilty of forcible entry, who, either by breaking open doors, windows, or other parts of a house, or by any kind of violence or circumstance of terror, enters on any real property, or who, after entering peaceably upon real property, turns out by force, threats, or menacing conduct the party in possession. Held, that where a corporation's manager, after the termination of his employment, refused to surrender possession of premises previously occupied by him by virtue of his appointment or employment, his possession having been acquired peaceably, he was not guilty of forcible entry by his refusal to surrender.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 5–22; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

2. Forcible Entry and Detainer (§ 27*)—Complaint—Amendment.

Where a complaint in forcible entry and detainer as originally filed alleged generally that plaintiff by defendant's acts in detaining possession of the premises had suffered damages in the sum of $15,000, the court had power, in the exercise of discretion conferred by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing amendments, to permit an amendment served two days prior to the commencement of the action, averring specified sums as special damages and claiming punitive damages for vindictiveness, and the refusal to allow such amendment was an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. § 126; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

3. Forcible Entry and Detainer (§ 27*)—Pleading—Amendment.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1173, providing that where it appears that defendant has been guilty of either forcible entry or a forcible or unlawful detainer, and other than the offense charged in the complaint, the judge must order that the complaint be forthwith amended to conform to the proofs, etc., confers no authority to allow amendments for any other purpose than that prescribed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 126, 127; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

4. Pleading (§ 236*) — Amendment—Power of Court.

Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing amendments, confers general power to allow amendments at any time before, during, or after trial, and before judgment, where it clearly appears that it would be in the furtherance of justice, and a refusal to do so constitutes an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 601; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

5. Forcible Entry and Detainer (§ 30*)—Damages—Loss of Rents—Protecting Property—Cessation of Business.

In an action for forcible entry or unlawful detainer, Code Civ. Proc. § 1174, authorizes a recovery under appropriate averments in the complaint of any damage which is the natural and proximate consequence of the alleged forcible entry and unlawful detainer, such as loss of rents, expense of protecting the property, loss by cessation of plaintiff's business, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 141–152; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

6. Pleading (§ 236*)—Amendment.

Great liberality should be shown by a trial court in permitting the amendment of pleadings, where it can be done without working great delay, and will facilitate the production of all the facts bearing on the questions involved in the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

7. Forcible Entry and Detainer (§ 30*)—Damages—Elements.

Where plaintiff's manager, on the termination of his employment, refused to surrender plaintiff's premises so as to permit plaintiff to proceed with its business of constructing houses, etc., though he did permit some of plaintiff's officers to enter the building and office, but refused, however, to allow them to take charge of plaintiff's affairs or to do any act in the furtherance of its business, and refused to permit the men employed by plaintiff to proceed with the completion of the houses in the process of construction, or to take lumber or other materials essential for the completion of the unfinished buildings, plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for injuries to its business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 141–152; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

8. Forcible Entry and Detainer (§ 30*)—Punitive Damages—Pleading.

Since a charge of forcible detainer of real property carries an implication that it was from a bad motive, an allegation of forcible detainer is sufficient without more to sustain an award of exemplary damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. § 146; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

9. Forcible Entry and Detainer (§ 34*)—Exemplary Damages—Allowance—Question for Court or Jury.

Code Civ. Proc. § 735, provides that, if a person recovers damages for forcible entry or unlawful detainer, judgment may be entered for three times the amount of the actual damages. Section 1174 declares that the damages occasioned to the plaintiff by any forcible entry or detainer shall be assessed, and that judgment may be entered "in the discretion of the court either for the amount of the damages and rent found due or for three times the amount so found." Held, that whether the damages should be trebled and exemplary damages thereby awarded in an action of unlawful detainer is a question for the court, and not for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. § 157; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; G. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Forcible entry and unlawful detainer by the San Francisco & Suburban Home Building Society against Joseph A. Leonard and others. Judgment for plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, and it appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Chas. F. Hanlon, Pringle & Pringle, and E. K. Taylor, for appellant. James G. Maguire and E. T. Barrett, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California. The business of said corporation is that of selling improved real estate, and for that purpose it became the owner of a large number of lots situated in what is designated as "Jordan Tract," in the city of San Francisco. The scheme of the corporation was the erection of dwelling houses on the lots in said tract and the selling or the leasing thereof. On the 26th day of January, 1905, the plaintiff and the defendant Joseph A. Leonard entered into a writtten agreement, by the terms of which said Leonard became, for the term of four years from the 1st day of January, 1906, the manager of plaintiff's business, for the performance of the duties of which he was to receive certain stipulated compensation. Among other covenants, said contract contained the following: "In the event that the land owned or hereafter acquired by the society in the 'Jordan Tract' is finally built up by the erection of houses as now contemplated, or building operations thereon are suspended for ninety (90) days on account of inability to sell houses and lots at a profitable price, or if, for any reason, the net profits for any period of ninety (90) days shall be less than the expenses properly charged against that period of time, then this agreement may be terminated by either party upon giving sixty (60) days notice, and thereupon accounts between the parties thereto shall be closed, and, as soon as ascertainable, profits adjusted in accordance therewith." It was further provided by said contract that "at the time of the settlement between the parties hereto, if any question arises as to the value of any of the securities, mortgages or any property," etc., such question "shall in the event the parties hereto cannot agree as to the value, be appraised by two appraisers, one to be selected by the first party and one to be selected by the second party."

On the 9th day of January, 1908, the board of directors of the corporation, then composed of James C. Jordan (president), E. K. Taylor, William B. Pringle, H. G. Pendleton, and Joseph A. Leonard (defendant), who also held the office of vice president, held a meeting at which a resolution was adopted by which, after setting forth that the net profits of plaintiff "for a period of thirty days have been less than the expenses properly charged against that period of time," the contract made with Leonard was, in accordance with the terms of paragraph 5 thereof, above quoted, terminated, it being therein further provided that 60 days' notice be given Leonard of the election of the corporation to terminate said contract. Leonard was present at said meeting, and voted against the adoption of said resolution. On the same occasion, the president of the corporation wrote and delivered to Leonard a letter, formally notifying him of the foregoing action of the board of directors. On March 4, 1908, a committee selected from the board of directors, having previously been appointed for that purpose, reported to the board at a regular session thereof that "the value of the goods, securities, mortgages and properties, and the amount to be written off for depreciation, are materially different from those given in the statement referred to the committee and reports of Mr. Leonard now on file." Said report was received and filed, and thereupon the board of directors adopted a resolution declaring that a dispute had arisen between plaintiff and Leonard "as to the value of the securities, mortgages and property of this company, and as to the amount to be taken off for depreciation," and appointing, under the authority so to do provided for by the contract between plaintiff and Leonard, one Stanley Pedder to be its arbitrator and appraiser, "to join with an arbitrator and appraiser to be appointed by J. A. Leonard under said contract, and to act under said contract in said matters, and that Mr. J. A. Leonard be and is now requested to appoint an arbitrator and appraiser in accordance with said contract." On the same day—March 4th—a resolution was adopted instructing Leonard to deliver up on March 9th possession of the keys to the offices and buildings and of "everything pertaining to the company to Mr. Pendleton, the secretary of the corporation," etc.

The offices of the manager and the board of directors were located in a building situated within the exterior boundaries of "Jordan Tract." On March 11, 1908—a trifle over 60 days after notice had been served upon Leonard of the action of the directors terminating the contract by which he was employed as manager of the corporation—directors Pringle, Pendleton, and Taylor, accompanied by several other parties, including Pedder, who, as seen, was appointed by the board as arbitrator and appraiser to examine into the affairs of the company, called at the office of the manager, and demanded a surrender of the possession of his office and the properties of the corporation. Pringle read to Leonard, in the presence of some other men, some of whom were special policemen who were there to aid Leonard in keeping possession, the several resolutions theretofore adopted by the board of directors—the one terminating Leonard's employment and the others appointing Pedder as an appraiser, etc., and authorizing Pendleton, as secretary of the corporation, to take charge of the keys and the properties, etc. But Leonard, assisted by the special policemen, refused to permit the directors to take charge of the affairs of the corporation. Pedder, having entered the office, was ejected by force. While Pendleton was permitted to go into the office and the other buildings, he was not allowed to handle any of the properties of the corporation.

On several occasions thereafter, the directors, either through agents specially commissioned for that purpose or by their own personal efforts, attempted to secure possession of the manager's office and the properties of the company, but were each time repelled by Leonard, the latter at different times forcibly ejecting Pedder, a Mr. Derby, appointed by the board to take charge of the affairs of the company, and the Kinney Bros., who were on the 20th day of March, 1908, appointed and authorized by the directors to take and maintain possession, on behalf of the corporation, "of all the real property of this corporation in Jordan Park, including the mill thereon and its contents." One Sullivan, a carpenter, had been sent by the board to the premises to take charge of the mill, and proceed with the completion of certain dwelling houses then in process of construction, and upon which no work was then being done on account of the differences between the company and Leonard. The latter refused to permit Sullivan to take charge of the mill and execute the duties thus committed to him. In addition to the commission of the foregoing acts of resistance to the efforts of the corporation to secure possession and control of its properties and affairs, Leonard changed the locks on the doors to his office and other buildings on the premises, and also changed the combination to the safe. He, however, turned the keys to the new locks and the combination over to the secretary, Pendleton, on March 12th. Leonard, with his family, resided in the upper story of the building in which his office was located.

From the statement of the facts as thus given, it will be observed that the conduct of Leonard throughout the whole controversy consisted entirely in a persistent refusal on his part to allow any person authorized so to do by the directors to have any voice in the management of the company's business, and to that end ejected by force, where necessary, any person commissioned and sent by the corporation to supplant him as manager. And thus the situation remained until the 9th day of April, 1908, when he surrendered his position as manager and the possession of the properties of the company to the board of directors. The action here is for forcible entry and forcible and unlawful detainer of the premises referred to, for restitution of said premises, and for damages for the entry and detention thereof so alleged. The complaint was filed March 28, 1908. The action was tried by jury and a verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff for forcible detainer, and therefore for the restitution of the premises, but awarding no damages.

The court thereupon caused judgment to be entered that defendants "have been and are guilty of a forcible detainer of the said lands and premises and improvements, but have not been and are not guilty of any forcible entry, * * * and it is further decreed that the plaintiffs do not recover or have judgment for any damage or damages herein," etc. This appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff from that part of the judgment decreeing that defendants were not guilty of a forcible entry, and that "plaintiff do not recover or have judgment for any damage or damages herein," etc., and from the order denying plaintiff a new trial.

It may be well here to explain that the defendant Holzhausen was an employé of the corporation under Leonard, and that at the times the directors attempted to obtain possession of the properties of the corporation from Leonard he (Holzhausen) assisted Leonard in resisting the directors, and, in fact, had been commissioned a special policeman, no doubt for that specific purpose.

In its charge the court instructed the jury that there was no evidence of a forcible entry by the defendants, and thus eliminated that issue from the case, and therefore excluded it from consideration by the jury.

The main contention of the appellant is that the court erred to its prejudice in thus taking the question of forcible entry from the jury, and, further, that the court abused its discretion by disallowing a proffered amendment to the complaint under the averments of which certain special damages might be shown; evidence offered in proof of such damages having been rejected on the ground that they were not pleaded.

It is further claimed that the court erred by refusing to read to the jury an instruction submitted by the plaintiff covering the question of exemplary damages.

We think the case must be sent back for retrial for the ruling disallowing the proposed amendment to the complaint. But we have conceived it to be proper to decide the first point above stated, and thus dispose of it as an issue on the retrial, if the evidence adduced therein be no different from that presented in this record. We shall also pass upon the third point above stated.

[1] In the outset it is just as well to say that we are unable to perceive any element of forcible entry of the premises described in the complaint or of any part thereof on the part of either of the defendants or both. Section 1159 of the Code of Civil Procedure thus defines forcible entry: "Every person is guilty of forcible entry who either: (1) By breaking open doors, windows, or other parts of a house, or by any kind of violence or circumstance of terror enters upon or into any real property; or, (2) who, after entering peaceably upon real property, turns out by force, threats, or menacing conduct, the party in possession." Of course, it is not claimed, nor could it be under the evidence, that the conduct of the defendants comes within the purview of the first subdivision of the foregoing section. But the contention is that the acts of the defendants as disclosed by the evidence may be so construed as to bring them within the terms of the second subdivision of said section. In support of this view, counsel for appellant cite section 1172 of the Code of Civil Procedure and a number of California cases which, it is claimed, sustain appellant's construction of the meaning and scope of that section. Said section provides, inter alia, that on the trial of any proceeding for any forcible entry the plaintiff shall only be required to show, in addition to the forcible entry complained of, that he was peaceably in the actual possession at the time of the forcible entry.

To sustain the contention of appellant, it would be necessary to hold that with the expiration of the 60-days notice which the contract between the parties stipulated should terminate Leonard's employment as manager, the plaintiff would, ipso facto, or by operation alone of the terms themselves of the contract, and without any further act or steps on its part or that of Leonard, be placed in actual possession of the premises. This could, of course, no more be true than that the violation by a lessee of a vital covenant of a lease would itself have the effect of immediately putting the lessor into the actual possession of the demised premises. It is very manifest that a lease or a contract by which the possession of land is held cannot work automatically in that respect. Leonard's possession arose by virtue of his appointment or employment as manager of plaintiff's business, and, if he never himself abandoned or surrendered the possession of the premises so acquired, then, it seems obvious to us, he could not be guilty of forcible entry merely for the reason that the plaintiff had declared his contract at an end and therefore his right to the actual possession of the property forfeited. Indeed, to the contrary; if, under such circumstances, the plaintiff had forcibly driven Leonard from the premises and thus taken possession thereof, it would itself have been guilty of forcible entry, although it might transpire, as it has transpired, that, as a matter of legal right, it was entitled to the possession. This proposition necessarily follows from the very theory upon which or the purpose for which the forcible entry and forcible and unlawful detainer statute is enacted, viz., to secure a judicial adjustment of differences of that character, and thus prevent the parties themselves from redressing or attempting to redress their own wrongs which is likely to lead to serious wrongs against the public or society. While the question of the right of possession must necessarily arise in such cases, since the power to award restitution of the premises involved rests with the jury or the court, and since, moreover, it may enter into the determination of the question whether punitive damages should be allowed, still it is only an incidental issue; the gist of such actions being in the wrong which inheres in the very act itself of forcibly entering upon and invading the possession of another or forcibly or unlawfully detaining a possession to which the detainer is not lawfully or rightfully entitled.

The undisputed evidence, as seen, shows that Leonard had been put in possession of the premises as manager of the corporation's business by plaintiff itself, and it further shows that he had never abandoned or surrendered such possession and still maintained the possession thus obtained until the surrender of the same by him on the 9th day of April, 1908. It is true that the meetings of the board of directors were regularly held in one of the rooms of the building on said premises in which Leonard's office was located; but Leonard never had nor claimed to have ever been given possession of that room. The possession of said room by the directors or the corporation was not inconsistent with, nor did it in any measure whatsoever impair, Leonard's right to the possession of his office and of the balance of the premises and property, into the possession of which he entered under his contract with plaintiff. There is no evidence showing that the directors or the corporation were ever at any time prevented by Leonard or any other person employed by him from occupying for any purpose the room in which they had customarily held their meetings and transacted their official business. It is no doubt true, as the jury found, that it was the duty of Leonard to have surrendered possession of the premises upon the expiration of the 60-days notice to him that his contract with the company had been terminated and a demand by the officers of the corporation for the return of the possession, but this omission or refusal does not constitute proof that he was not in actual possession, peaceably obtained, or that his conduct in forcibly ejecting the agents and representatives of plaintiff from his office or those parts of the premises of which he had possession, however indefensible in law his conduct might be, constituted anything more than a wrongful and forcible detention of a possession which he had lawfully and peaceably acquired. These views are not at all out of harmony with the rule as it is enunciated and applied in the cases cited by appellant. Indeed, the most recent of these (Kerr v. O'Keefe et al., 138 Cal. 415, 71 Pac. 447), if anything at all, is an authority against the contention of appellant. In that case the plaintiff (lessee) was in default in the payment of rent. The lease provided that on such default by the lessee the lessor might re-enter the premises, take possession thereof, and remove all persons therefrom. The defendant (lessor), upon the lessee being so in default, made a peaceable entry upon the premises, in the absence of plaintiff, and took possession. Thereafter the plaintiff returned to the premises, ordered the defendant to leave the same, and thereupon the latter, reinforced by his brother and a loaded shotgun, proceeded to "remove" and in fact ejected the plaintiff from the premises and took possession thereof himself. Action for forcible entry was instituted by plaintiff and sustained by the courts. The defendant (the lessor) set up the plea that, the lease having provided that he might re-enter and retake possession of the premises upon default in the payment of the stipulated rent, he therefore entered upon the possession under color of right and in good faith. All that was decided in that case of importance was that the plea so made was without merit; the Supreme Court saying: "We cannot see that good faith constitutes an element in a defense to a forcible entry or forcible detainer, * * * nor that an entry peaceably made and in good faith cuts any figure in a defense to a forcible detainer." But, while the defendants in the present case could not, in an action for forcible detainer, defend their unlawful and forcible detention of the property on the ground that they believed in good faith that they were entitled to its possession, yet, having been given and taken peaceable possession thereof, and being so in possession, their resistance to dispossession by the plaintiff, who was entitled to actual possession, cannot, as we have before declared, be construed into a forcible entry thereof merely because the defendants had no right to the possession or no defense which they could successfully interpose to such unlawful and forcible detainer.

Our conclusion upon this point is that the court was right in taking from the jury the question whether there was a forcible entry by the defendants—an issue tendered by the complaint which, as we have seen, derives absolutely no support from the evidence.

[2] But, as announced in the outset of the discussion, we think there was a clear and palpable abuse of discretion in the denial to plaintiff of its application to amend its complaint. The complaint as filed alleged generally that the plaintiff had by the acts of the defendants in detaining from it the possession of the premises for a period of nearly one month suffered damage in the sum of $15,000. The action was commenced on the 28th day of March, 1908. The trial was begun on the 16th day of April, 1908. On the 14th day of April, 1908—two days prior to the commencement of the trial—the plaintiff served on the attorney for the defendants a copy of a proposed amendment to the complaint. Said proposed amendment contained averments of special damages, as follows: (1) Rental value, one month, of the real estate, $625; (2) delay in receiving purchase price, four houses, $65.45; (3) cost, maintaining plant during forcible holding, $5,000; (4) cost of watchmen to guard during suspension of work by the unlawful and forcible detainer, including wages of Sullivan and his crew, who were forced to cease work, $1,069.50; (5) punitive damages for vindictiveness. On the first day of the trial counsel for the plaintiff made an application to the court for leave to amend its complaint in the particulars mentioned. Objection to the allowance of the amendment was made by counsel for defendants and sustained by the court. What the specific ground of the objection was does not appear in the record, but it is stated by counsel for appellant, and not denied, that no objection was taken to the proposed amendment on the ground of surprise or on the ground that the granting of the motion would necessitate a postponement of the trial. Thereafter counsel for appellant undertook and offered to prove the special damages as specially pleaded in the proposed amendment, promising that, if the court would permit such proof, they would amend the complaint so that its allegations would conform thereto. The court allowed proof of rental value under the general allegation of damages (Tewksbury v. O'Connell, 25 Cal. 263), but as to all other damages the offer was rejected on objections interposed thereto by counsel for defendants on the ground that the same were not pleaded.

[3] We do not think, as counsel for appellant contend, that the amendment proposed comes within the provisions of section 1173 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section does not vest in the court the power of allowing all sorts of amendments in cases of this class, as will readily be observed upon reading it. It provides that where "it appears from the evidence that the defendant has been guilty of either a forcible entry or a forcible or unlawful detainer, and other than the offense charged in the complaint, the judge must order that such complaint be forthwith amended to conform to such proofs," etc. We apprehend that nothing further by way of amendment can be authorized by the court under that section than what is therein expressly prescribed. In other words, there is no authority given the court by said section to allow amendments for any other purpose than that expressly stated.

[4] But trial courts are, by virtue of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, possessed of general and ample power to allow amendments at any time before, during, and even after trial and before judgment to any pleading, and where it clearly appears, as we think it does here, that it would be in furtherance of justice to allow an amendment proposed at an opportune time within the meaning of that section, a refusal to do so constitutes an abuse of the discretion which said section has committed to trial courts. The undisputed evidence shows, as we have seen, that the plaintiff served its proposed amendment on the attorneys for the defendants two days before the commencement of the trial, and that application for leave to amend was urged on the day on which the trial began and before evidence was taken. There was no claim, as there could scarcely be consistently with reason, that counsel for appellant were taken by surprise, nor was there any showing made that a continuance would have been necessary by reason of the amendment, if allowed, and, if there had been, the court could have granted the motion upon any reasonable terms to which it might, in its discretion, have felt constrained to subject the moving party.

[5] It will not, of course, be denied that the plaintiff was entitled to show, if it could, under a complaint sufficient for that purpose, any damages occasioned to it by the forcible or unlawful detainer complained of (section 1174, Code Civ. Proc.); that is to say, it was entitled to recover, if it could prove it, under appropriate averments of its complaint, any damage that was the natural and proximate consequence of the alleged forcible or unlawful detainer. 2 Green. on Ev. § 256; Anderson v. Taylor, 56 Cal. 131, 38 Am. Rep. 52. If, therefore, plaintiff could show that it had suffered the loss of rents through the acts complained of against defendants or had necessarily been put to expense in protecting its property while the defendants wrongfully and forcibly detained the same and by reason thereof or that it had sustained loss by the cessation of the prosecution of its business during the period of the wrongful detention and by reason thereof, then all such facts would disclose proper items of damages, and, if pleaded, the rejection of proof thereof would manifestly be erroneous and prejudicial. And, as seen (with the exception of the items for rent and punitive damages), such were the special damages to which the proposed amendment, if allowed, would have given plaintiff an opportunity to address whatever proof that was available to it in those respects.

[6] The Supreme Court of this state has repeatedly declared that great liberality should be shown by a trial court in permitting, where it can be done without working great delay, such amendments to pleadings as will facilitate the production of all the facts bearing upon the questions involved in the action. Spelling on New Trial and Appellate Practice, § 107, and cases therein cited. "The object of judicial proceedings is to discover all the facts of a case and apply the law; and the theory of the Code is that the parties should each have reasonable opportunity to present his side of the case." L. K. R. W. D. Co. v. K. R. & F. C. Co., 67 Cal. 577, 8 Pac. 91.

We have been unable to discover, from the circumstances under which the application was urged for permission to amend the complaint in this case, any reason why the amendment should not have been allowed. The action here is a summary proceeding, and was designed to afford the speediest legal remedy by which one may secure redress for the wrongful or forcible invasion of his possession of real property, or, where the possession of the same, though rightfully obtained, is forcibly or unlawfully detained, for the restitution of the premises, and damages, if any are sustained, for the wrongful act. In such cases it is likely to often happen, as it no doubt has frequently occurred, that complaints are hastily, and, as a consequence, carelessly drawn, with the result that many facts which might properly be proved are either not properly pleaded or not pleaded at all. In such cases, therefore, trial courts should be particularly liberal in allowing amendments, especially so where, as here, it appears reasonably clear that full justice may not be done without such amendments.

In the present case, it does not appear, as before stated, that either the court or the defendants would have been subjected to great, if any, inconvenience or the defendants placed at any undue disadvantage by the granting of plaintiff's application to amend, and, while it may be true, as counsel for the defendants suggest, that, the possession of the premises having been turned over to plaintiff before the commencement of the trial, the present action could have been dismissed and the plaintiff have instituted another action to recover all the damages it claims to have sustained, yet the law requires no such course to be followed, and the suggestion is no argument in support of the court's action in denying plaintiff's application.

It is, however, intimated by counsel for the respondents that the amendment could have served no useful purpose, since the evidence discloses "that the respondents never interfered with appellant's possession of any part of the tract mentioned in the complaint, except a portion of one block and four lots upon which houses were being built"; that "there was no evidence that the plaintiff or any of its officers or employés ever sought admission to the paint shop or the plumbing shop or the warehouse or the drafting room, which was a part of the office, or to the lumber yard, except that a demand made for keys to those shops and rooms was not complied with until five or six days afterwards."

[7] But the gist of Leonard's sinning did not consist so much in refusing to allow the officers of the company to enter the premises or the buildings thereon, as it did in refusing to allow them to take possession of the premises and so proceed with the business of the corporation. The evidence, it is very true, shows that he permitted the physical entrance of some of the directors into the building and into his office, but he positively refused to allow them to take charge of the affairs of the corporation or to do any act in furtherance of the business of the concern. He would not permit the men employed by the corporation to proceed with the completion of the houses then in course of construction. He would not allow it or its employés to take lumber and other material essential to the completion of the unfinished buildings. These constituted hindrances or delays which might result in great damage to the corporation. A. might employ B. as his manager to take sole possession of and conduct his mercantile business. If A. should finally demand from B. the return of the possession of the building and the business and the latter should refuse the demand, and not allow A. to do any act in connection with the business, or should close down the business, and refuse to allow A. to reopen it or to take any other steps looking to a resumption of the business, the mere fact that B. might have allowed A. physical entrance into the building in which the business was carried on would most certainly not absolve B. from the charge of unlawful or perhaps forcible detainer, nor from liability for any damages A. might suffer by reason of B.'s conduct.

The business of the plaintiff here is, as stated, the building, selling, and renting of houses upon a large tract of land, and the acts of Leonard necessarily had the effect of stopping the business, practically closing it down for a period, and certainly it cannot be maintained that, because Leonard generously permitted its officers to go upon the premises, with permission, however, to exercise no more authority over the affairs of the corporation than if they were perfect strangers, the defendants may escape the responsibility of responding in whatever damages plaintiff may be able to show were proximately occasioned to it by their unauthorized acts.

[8] It was not necessary in our opinion for the plaintiff to plead more than the alleged forcible detainer to entitle it to prove facts which would have justified the court in awarding exemplary or punitive damages. The charge of forcible detainer of real property necessarily carries with it the implication that such detainer is from a bad motive, and what the precise nature of that motive is—whether it be founded in malice or fraud or oppression of any sort—may properly be shown under the general averment that the detainer is forcible. It may be that the defendant in such a case can show that the force used was only in furtherance of the maintenance of his rights; yet, the statute having said that such detainer is in violation of law, the mere charging of the act presupposes the existence therein of all the elements essential to the consummation of the charge as it is defined by the statute, and whether, as a matter of fact, elements justifying the imposition of punitive damages are present in the act must, of course, depend upon what the proof discloses.

[9] But the court did not in our judgment err by its refusal to allow the instruction, proposed by the plaintiff, which would have authorized the jury to allow exemplary damages or damages which may be allowed under the provisions of section 3294 of the Civil Code. Indeed, we think that an examination of our statute relative to actions for forcible entry and forcible or unlawful detainer will show very clearly that the Legislature intended to commit to the court, rather than to the jury, the determination of the question whether in such cases damages by way of punishment shall be allowed, and manifestly, under this view of the proposition, an instruction to the jury upon the question of exemplary damages would be entirely out of place. Section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, among other things, provides that "the jury or the court, if the proceedings be tried without a jury, shall also assess the damages occasioned to the plaintiff by any forcible entry, or by any forcible or unlawful detainer, alleged in the complaint and proved on the trial, and find the amount of any rent due, if the alleged unlawful detainer be after default in the payment of rent. Judgment against the defendant guilty of the forcible entry, or forcible or unlawful detainer may be entered in the discretion of the court either for the amount of the damages and rent found due, or for three times the amount so found." Section 735 of the same Code provides: "If a person recover damages for a forcible or unlawful entry in or upon, or detention of any building or any cultivated real property, judgment may be entered for three times the amount at which the actual damages are assessed." Thus it will be perceived the Legislature has clearly limited the power of the jury in such cases, so far as damages are concerned, to the assessment of such damages only as have actually been suffered by the complaining party and has conferred upon the court the sole power of determining, in the exercise of its discretion, whether, in a given case, the circumstances are such as to justify the entry of judgment in favor of plaintiff, as a penalty for the acts of the defendant, for three times the amount found by the jury either as damages or for rent. That the power thus specially given the court was intended to be exercised in those cases only where the evidence discloses that the defendant has committed the tortious act charged against him wantonly or by oppression or with malice, express or implied (section 3294, Civ. Code, supra), is a proposition which, in our opinion, is rendered free from any kind of doubt, if not alone by the language of section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, then most surely by that of section 735 of the same Code. In other words, the power to treble the damages or rent is a power to be exercised by way of punishment only, and the Legislature has (wisely, we think, as the writer further thinks would be true if it were so in all cases as to the awarding of punitive damages) committed the exercise of that power to the courts in preference to the jury, the theory of the lawmakers no doubt being that the court, having equal opportunity with the jury of hearing and passing upon the testimony, is better able to decide whether the evidence warrants the imposition of any penalty at all or an allowance in excess of the amount found by the jury to be the damages actually sustained.

But, if any doubt could arise, from the mere reading of sections 1174 and 735 of the Code, as to the construction thus given those sections—that is, that the Legislature thereby intended to restrict the power of the jury, in cases of forcible entry and of forcible or unlawful detainer, to the passing upon and deciding of the question of the actual damages, if any, sustained by the plaintiff and to vest in the court the exclusive power and discretion of annexing a punishment by trebling the amount of the damages or rent—then such doubt will readily disappear upon reference being made to some very early California cases which have never been reversed, and which, we think, can never be reversed by any logical process so long as the statutes concerning forcible entry and forcible or unlawful detainer remain as they now exist and read. In the case of Hicks v. Herring, 17 Cal. 568, Chief Justice Field, speaking of a provision of the law precisely similar to the one we are considering, said: "This section is added, not merely to indemnify the complainant for the injuries suffered from loss of rents and profits, and for waste committed, but to punish the offending party." "In other words," said Judge Currey, referring to the same section, in Tewksbury v. O'Connell, 25 Cal. 264, "by the amendment the landlord was held only to claim and prove damages; and then, when assessed, it became the magistrate's (the court's) duty, not by reason of the claim therefor, but in the enjoined exercise of penal authority, to treble them." Certainly, it will not be contended that, the statute, having said that the court may, in the exercise of its discretion, add, by way of example or punishment, the amount specified therein to that found by the jury as representing the amount of the rent or the damage actually suffered by the plaintiff, the jury may, nevertheless, also add exemplary damages. The manifest result of such a construction would be that the defendant could not only be required to pay three times the actual damages found, but could also be compelled to pay three times the amount of the exemplary damages awarded. And, if the jury may, in addition to actual damages, allow damages by way of a penalty, the court may obviously likewise do so, where the cause is tried by the court without a jury. Surely it cannot be said that the court could find actual damages, to which, as a finding from the evidence, it could add punitive damages, then, additionally, in the exercise of the discretion with which it is invested by section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, treble the total amount so found. Nor is it a reply to the construction to which we here subject the sections in question to say that, in case the jury, in addition to finding actual damages, awards exemplary damages, the court will not enter judgment for treble the damages so found, and that, if it did do so under such circumstances, it would be an abuse of the discretion committed to it by the statute; for in no case could the court know or segregate the actual from the exemplary damages, and we know of no case where the jury have done so in their verdict.

It follows, of course, from the foregoing views that evidence bearing upon the question of punitive or exemplary damages is, in cases of forcible entry or forcible or unlawful detainer, always to be addressed to the court and not to the jury, and that, as before announced, instructions to the jury upon that question could obviously subserve no useful purpose.

There are no other questions presented which in our judgment require special notice.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment and order are reversed and the cause remanded for retrial.

SHEPPARD v. SHEPPARD. (L. A. 2,757.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1911. Rehearing Denied Dec. 22, 1911.)

1. Divorce (§ 182*)—Appeal—Alimony.

Where a husband appealed from a decree denying his application for a divorce, and filed a supersedeas, staying execution on the part of the decree awarding alimony to his wife, the court was authorized to grant an order providing for her support and maintenance pending the appeal, and requiring plaintiff to pay such sums as were reasonably necessary therefor, notwithstanding such support was for a period of time covered by the maintenance judgment.

2. Divorce (§ 182*)—Alimony—Appeal—Order for Maintenance.

Where a husband appealed from an order denying his application for a divorce and requiring payment of alimony at the rate of $50 a month, filing a bond to stay execution on the judgment for alimony pending appeal, and it appeared that $50 per month was all defendant was entitled to receive for her support pending the appeal, a subsequent order, requiring plaintiff to pay defendant $50 per month for her support and maintenance pending the appeal, was erroneous, in so far as it failed to provide that, in the event of an affirmance, plaintiff should be credited with the amount paid under the order pending the appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by Samuel Sheppard against Lucinda Sheppard. From an order granting an award of alimony pending appeal, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

See, also, 115 Pac. 751.

E. B. Drake, for appellant. Gray, Barker, Bowen, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order, made after judgment and on July 11, 1910, requiring plaintiff to pay defendant the sum of $50 per month alimony pendente lite from December 17, 1909, to and including the final determination of the cause, which was then pending on appeal, $350 thereof (being the amount due to and including July, 1910) to be paid forthwith, and $50 on the 1st day of each subsequent month; also $50 costs and $150 attorney's fees, to be paid forthwith.

No question is raised on this appeal as to the correctness of the order, in so far as it gives defendant the amounts specified for costs and counsel fees; the only question being as to the alimony pendente lite.

The material facts are as follows: Plaintiff commenced an action for divorce against defendant. Defendant by her answer denied the charges made against her by plaintiff, and by cross-complaint sought an allowance for her maintenance and support. The trial court found against plaintiff, and also found that he had willfully deserted and abandoned defendant, and that $50 per month was reasonably necessary to provide defendant with the common necessaries of life, and that such amount was a reasonable sum to be allowed her for her support and maintenance. This decision was rendered on December 15, 1909, and on the same day judgment was given, denying plaintiff relief, and awarding defendant "permanent alimony at the rate of fifty dollars per month * * * for her maintenance and support, * * * and continuing during the natural life of said" defendant. The judgment also gave her $150 attorney's fees and costs. Plaintiff appealed from this judgment to this court, and stayed the execution thereof by giving such an undertaking therefor as is required by law. Thereupon defendant made the motion for alimony pending such appeal, resulting in the order here under review, stating in her affidavit that the sum asked by her ($50 per month) is necessary for her maintenance and support, and that it is the amount of permanent alimony ordered paid her by the judgment. The evidence before the court on the hearing of the motion was sufficient to warrant the conclusion that such sum was reasonably necessary for the support and maintenance of defendant; that she had no means of support; and that plaintiff was financially able to pay said sum. Upon these facts the trial court made the order here under review.

[1] It cannot be disputed, in view of the authorities, that the trial court was authorized to provide for the support and maintenance of defendant by plaintiff pending the determination of the appeal from the judgment, and to this end to make an order directing plaintiff to pay defendant such sums as were reasonably necessary for that purpose. See Bohnert v. Bohnert, 91 Cal. 428, 27 Pac. 732; Gay v. Gay, 146 Cal. 237, 79 Pac. 885. And the fact that such support and maintenance for the period of time covered by the order sought was already provided for by the maintenance judgment did not compel the absolute denial of the motion. Execution of the judgment was stayed by the appeal therefrom and the stay bond given on such appeal, and consequently there was no enforceable judgment or order providing for her support and maintenance during the pendency of the appeal. Then, too, the appeal from the judgment might result in a reversal, in which event it might result that defendant would never receive anything for her support and maintenance during the period of the pendency of the appeal, although clearly, under the authorities, she was entitled to such support and maintenance pending the appeal.

[2] But the plain effect of the order as made, without reservation or qualification, was that if the maintenance judgment was affirmed, or the appeal therefrom dismissed, and plaintiff required, as he undoubtedly would be in such event, to pay to defendant all the amounts due thereunder, he would be required to pay $100 per month for the support and maintenance of defendant during the whole time of the pendency of the appeal, viz., $50 per month under the judgment, and $50 per month under the order, although on the motion for alimony pending the appeal defendant claimed only $50 per month for that purpose, and did not attempt to make any showing that more than $50 per month was necessary for her support and maintenance. There was absolutely nothing before the lower court on the hearing of this motion to support a conclusion by that court that defendant should have more than $50 for her support and maintenance for any month during the pendency of the appeal. It was plainly shown by the evidence on the motion that all that defendant was seeking, and all that she was entitled to have in the way of alimony pending the appeal from the judgment, was the amount awarded her by the judgment, the payment of which to her had been stayed by the appeal therefrom. As an illustration of the injustice that would follow the affirmance of this order in its present form, we have what has actually happened in this case, according to the showing made on the oral argument. The maintenance judgment has been affirmed, and the judgment became final May 12, 1911 (Sheppard v. Sheppard [App.] 115 Pac. 751), and plaintiff has been compelled to pay thereunder to defendant at the rate of $50 per month from December 1, 1909, to and including October 1, 1911, together with interest; the same being for her support and maintenance between such dates. If this order be now affirmed in its present form, plaintiff would be compelled to again pay defendant at the rate of $50 per month for her support and maintenance from December 17, 1909, to May 12, 1911, a period fully covered by the amounts already paid, although there was nothing in the showing before the lower court on the hearing of this motion to warrant a total allowance for maintenance and support for any month of more than $50.

We are satisfied that it was the duty of the trial court in making this order, with the facts as to the maintenance judgment before it, to have protected plaintiff against the possibility of being compelled, by reason of the affirmance of such judgment or the dismissal of the appeal therefrom, to pay twice for any period of time the amount deemed necessary by the court for the support and maintenance of defendant during such period of time. To that much plaintiff was clearly entitled, and, in so far as the order made fails to give such protection, it was erroneous, and, as has developed, most prejudicial to plaintiff. The case of Smith v. Smith, 147 Cal. 143, 81 Pac. 411, is full authority for the proposition, if authority be needed, that the maintenance judgment and the liability of the husband thereunder were required to be taken into consideration by the court in making its order for alimony pendente lite. And taking them into consideration it appears to us to necessarily follow, in view of the defendant's own showing as to the amount reasonably necessary for her support and maintenance, that the order was erroneous, in so far as it fails to protect plaintiff against the possibility of being compelled thereby to pay more than $50 per month for such support and maintenance for any period of time. The effect of the error can be obviated by a modification of the order, and its affirmance as modified. In view of our conclusion on the point discussed, and the facts as to satisfaction of the judgment for the period of time covered by the appeal, shown by the affidavit of plaintiff presented on the oral argument, it will be unnecessary to consider any other point made in the briefs.

It is ordered that the order appealed from be modified by inserting at the end thereof, after the word "forthwith," the following words and figures, viz.: "Provided, however, that all amounts paid hereunder by plaintiff to defendant on account of alimony at the rate of $50 per month shall, in the event of the affirmance of the judgment in this action, providing for permanent maintenance at that rate, rendered December 15, 1909, be credited in favor of plaintiff in satisfaction pro tanto of such judgment; and provided further, that if, in the event of the affirmance of the portion of such judgment, providing for such permanent maintenance, plaintiff pays defendant thereunder at the rate of $50 per month for support and maintenance for any period of time covered by this order, such payment shall operate pro tanto as a satisfaction of the requirements of this order as to support and maintenance for such period of time, and plaintiff shall not be required to make under this order any further payment for such period of time"—and as so modified the order is affirmed.

RHEINGANS v. SMITH (E. L. HOPPER & SON, Intervener). (L. A. 2,718.)

1. Fraud (§ 23*)—Misrepresentations—Reliance.

In absence of confidential relations between the parties, a vendor may not rely upon statements by the purchaser as constituting fraudulent misrepresentations, except as to facts of which the vendor was ignorant, and which he had reason to believe the purchaser knew, and except, possibly, as to the law based on facts of which he had reason to believe the purchaser's knowledge was greater than his own.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 20, 23; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

2. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 44*)—Actions—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action to cancel a contract for the sale of land for fraud in misrepresenting that an option theretofore given by plaintiff to another had expired, evidence held to show that plaintiff did not rely on defendant's statement that the option had expired.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 69–76; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. Fraud (§ 11*) — Misrepresentations — Matters of Opinion.

Where both the vendor and purchaser knew the facts as to a prior option given by the vendor, a statement by the purchaser that such option expired on a certain date was merely an opinion, as to a question of law, based on facts known to both, so that the vendor could not predicate fraud upon its falsity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. Fraud (§ 12*)—Fraudulent Promise.

In absence of confidential relations between the parties, the mere making of a promise, which the promisor afterwards fails or refuses to perform, is not actionable fraud, unless the promise was made without any intention of performing it; Civ. Code, § 1572, providing that a promise, made without any intention of performing it, in order to induce another to enter into a contract, constitutes actionable fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

5. Cancellation of Instruments (§ 43*)—Actions—Proof—Variance.

In an action to cancel a contract for the sale of land for fraud in misrepresenting that an option theretofore given by plaintiff to another had expired, in which plaintiff did not allege or reply upon fraud by defendant in promising to cancel his own agreement to purchase, if the other option holder accepted his option, without any intention of performing such agreement to cancel, he is not entitled to relief on that ground, though the evidence tended to show such facts, and if alleged it might have been ground for relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 96–99; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

6. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 18*)—Option Agreements—Acceptance.

The unconditional acceptance of an option to purchase land constitutes a binding contract, enforceable by the acceptor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

7. Cancellation of Instruments (§ 25*)—Grounds—Fraud—Defenses.

If defendant fraudulently induced plaintiff to execute a contract to sell land after plaintiff had executed an option agreement to sell to another, the mere fact that, after the acceptance of plaintiff's option by such other, his agreement to purchase from plaintiff was changed slightly as to the terms of payment and the rate of interest would not be a defense to plaintiff's action to annul his contract with defendant for fraud.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas Monroe, Judge.

Action by Jacob Rheingans against Oscar B. Smith, in which E. L. Hopper & Son intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Valentine & Newby, for appellant. Haas, Garrett & Dunnigan, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The plaintiff sues to cancel a contract, executed by him to the defendant, and to quiet his title against all claims of said defendant under said contract. The contract was made on November 29, 1909. It was signed by both parties. Rheingans thereby agreed to sell to Smith a certain tract of land for $156,500, of which $1,000 was then paid by check. $4,000 was to be paid on completion of title to the land, $31,500 in six months, $60,000 on June 1, 1913, and $60,000 on June 1, 1914. It is alleged that Smith induced Rheingans to execute the contract by fraud. The court below made findings to that effect, and gave judgment accordingly for the relief prayed for. In support of his appeal, Smith insists that neither the evidence nor the facts alleged support the charge of fraud.

The facts alleged as constituting the fraud complained of are as follows: Rheingans, being the owner in fee of the land, had given to the intervener, E. L. Hopper & Son, a corporation, an option, in writing, to buy the land at the price of $155,975, to be exercised within 90 days from its date, which was September 1, 1909. One-third of the price was to be paid on the execution of a deed, and the balance in five equal annual payments at 7 per cent. interest. Smith knew of this option and all its terms. It expired, as must be observed, on November 30, 1909. On November 29, 1909, Smith represented to Rheingans that this option had expired on September 28, 1909, and that Rheingans was then free to sell the land to Smith. Rheingans then declared that he would not sell to Smith, unless the Hopper option had expired, or was not accepted. Smith thereupon further represented that if Rheingans would execute the contract to sell to him, and the option had not so expired, and Hopper & Son should exercise the right within the time actually limited, he (Smith) would regard the agreement between himself and Rheingans as ineffective, and would cancel the same and return it to Rheingans. Rheingans was not sufficiently conversant with the English language to fully understand the meaning of the phrase "within ninety days from the date hereof." He believed said representations of Smith that the option had expired, and relying thereon, and also upon the promise of Smith to cancel the contract if his statement was wrong, and the option was duly exercised by Hopper & Son, he then and there executed the contract now sought to be canceled, and accepted Smith's check for $1,000 thereon. The complaint alleges that it was executed on the 30th, but the contract itself and the undisputed evidence shows that it was executed on the 29th. On November 30th Hopper & Son, in writing, accepted the option, and thereupon Rheingans made an agreement to sell the land to that corporation. A few weeks afterward this suit was begun. The findings are substantially the same as the allegations.

[1] Without considering the sufficiency of the facts, as charged, to constitute fraud, and proceeding to the evidence, we think it is clearly insufficient to show legal fraud in the false representation charged. Smith and Rheingans did not occupy confidential relations to each other. One was the seller, the other the buyer; and they dealt as strangers. Rheingans, therefore, had no inducement or right to rely on the statements of Smith, except as to the facts of which Rheingans was ignorant, and which he had reason to believe Smith knew, and except, possibly, as to the law based on facts of which he had reason to believe Smith's knowledge was greater than his own. He could not predicate fraud on a statement by Smith as to the law applicable to facts equally well known to both of them. Rheingans had a duplicate copy of the option to Hopper & Son. At the interview on the evening of November 29th, when the contract in question was made, Rheingans said that the option ran out on the evening of November 30th. Smith said, "It will run out tonight." Rheingans then got his copy of the option agreement and showed it to Smith, who then said, 'It will run out tonight at 12 o'clock." Rheingans said, "I don't believe it." Smith then proposed the plan of taking an agreement and canceling it, if Hopper & Son took the land the next day upon the option. Rheingans consented, signed the agreement with Smith, and accepted Smith's check for $1,000 thereon. This is Rheingans' version of the transaction, and it is not contradicted. There was no claim by Rheingans to Smith, nor upon the trial, that he was not entirely familiar with the language of the option, or that he did not understand its meaning.

[2,3] It is plain from this evidence of Rheingans himself that he did not credit

Smith's statement as to the time the option expired, and did not rely on it. And, even if he had believed it and relied on it, the statement of Smith was a mere opinion—an opinion on a question of law, based on facts known to both alike. Such an opinion by one occupying no confidential relation toward the person to whom it is addressed does not justify such person in relying upon it, and it is not a sufficient basis to support a charge of fraudulent misrepresentation. Choate v. Hyde, 129 Cal. 584, 62 Pac. 118; Rendell v. Scott, 70 Cal. 514, 11 Pac. 779; Nounnan v. Sutter, etc., Co., 81 Cal. 6, 22 Pac. 515, 6 L. R. A. 219; Lee v. McClelland, 120 Cal. 147, 52 Pac. 300; 20 Cyc. 17; 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 34.

[4, 5] The promise of Smith to cancel his agreement, if the option of Hopper & Son was taken up, appears to have been the inducement upon which Rheingans relied in making the agreement with Smith. The mere making of a promise, which the promisor afterwards fails or refuses to perform, does not constitute actionable fraud. 20 Cyc. 20; 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 47; Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 131, 20 Pac. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29. In the absence of confidential relations between the parties, it is only when such promise is made without any intention, of performing it that it becomes fraudulent in law or equity. Civ. Code, § 1572; Lawrence v. Gayetty, supra; Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 527, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189; Langley v. Rodriguez, 122 Cal. 581, 55 Pac. 406, 68 Am. St. Rep. 70. Smith, in his testimony, admitted that he knew all the time that the option did not expire until November 30th, and there is some evidence tending to support the inference that when he made the promise to cancel his own agreement he intended not to perform it. But there is no averment regarding such intent, nor any finding upon it, and the record shows that this species of fraud was not suggested during the trial, and that the case was not tried upon the theory that such fraud was the basis of the action. The briefs on this appeal contain no reference to such fraud. In such circumstances, we must adhere to the rule that a party is required to prove the case as alleged, and cannot recover upon proof of other facts not alleged, which might entitle him to the relief asked. If such fraud is relied on, it can only be done upon a new trial under an amended complaint.

It has occurred to the court that the defendant might be held to be estopped to assert rights under his contract, upon the principles stated in Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 794, 106 Pac. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154. But here again we are confronted with the fact that neither in the pleadings, nor upon the trial in the court below, nor upon this appeal, has there been any suggestion to that effect, and the rule just stated forbids an affirmance on such new grounds.

[6, 7] As the case is to be remanded for a new trial, and there may be amended pleadings, it is necessary to state our views upon another point. When Hopper & Son accepted the option without qualification, it became at once a binding contract, enforceable by that company. Civ. Code, § 1585; Four Oil Co. v. United O. P., 145 Cal. 624, 79 Pac. 366, 68 L. R. A. 226; 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 601. If the contract of Smith with Rheingans is found to be fraudulent, the mere fact that Hopper & Son, after accepting their option, agreed with Rheingans upon slightly different terms of payment and a lower rate of interest upon the deferred payment, would be no defense in favor of Smith to the action to set aside his contract for the fraud. What effect it would have if his contract is not found to be fraudulent, and his right to relief upon his cross-complaint to enforce it becomes important, is a question which, upon the record and agreement before us, we think it best not to consider.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J., SLOSS, J.

In re HENDERSON'S ESTATE.

(S. F. 5,885.)

1. Wills (§ 457*) — Construction — "Legatees."

Testator by olographic will, after having bequeathed to his wife the homestead with furniture, etc., together with a one-fourth interest in the residue after paying all bequests made, bequeathed the remaining three-fourths of the residue to his three other children, and provided that, if any of the "legatees" died before testator's death, then the legacy provided for him or her should be divided equally among the residuary legatees. Held, that the word "legatees" was used in an ordinary nontechnical sense to include bequests of both real and personal property, and that, under the rule that the testator's intention, as disclosed by the language used, must control, such term included the bequest to the wife, and that on her predeceasing the testator her share became a part of the residue within the substitutionary clause.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4084–4086.]

2. Wills (§ 522*)—Construction—"Gift to Class."

A bequest to a class is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons, uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, who are all to take in definite proportions; the share of each being dependent for its amount on the ultimate number.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1114; Dec. Dig. § 522.*]

3. Wills (§ 523*)—Construction—Substitutionary Clause—Gift to Class.

Testator, having bequeathed certain legacies, gave the homestead to his wife, and then provided for a division of the residue of his estate equally between her and his three surviving children, providing that, should any of the legatees die before testator's death, the legacy provided for him or her should be divided equally among the residuary legatees. Held, that such substitutionary clause provided for a gift to the residuary legatees as a class, so that on the death of the wife before testator her share of the residue was divisible between the surviving residuary legatees.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Clifton H. Connick, Judge.

Application for an order of distribution of the estate of James W. Henderson, deceased. From an order denying the claim of certain legatees to a share in the residue, Ruth Henderson appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing Denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

E. W. Wilson, for appellant. Denver Sevier and J. F. Coonan, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of partial distribution. James W. Henderson died on July 13, 1910, leaving a will which was admitted to probate in the county of Humboldt. The will, which was olographic, was dated October 3, 1905. By its first and second paragraphs, the testator declares his desire to save trouble to his wife and children, and to deal justly and fairly by all for whom he makes provision, and appoints as executors his wife, Amelia J., his daughters, Ida H. Sevier and Alice J. Henderson, and his son, George Y. Henderson. Paragraph 3, disposing of the estate, reads as follows:

"3rd. That after paying all my just debts and funeral expenses the rest and residue of my estate shall be disposed of as follows, viz.:

"To my grand children Abby J. Sevier one thousand dollars, to Henry Sevier one thousand dollars, to Stanley Sevier one thousand dollars, to Ernest Sevier one thousand dollars, to Randolph Sevier one thousand dollars, to Josephine Sevier one thousand dollars and to Helen Sevier one thousand dollars.

"Also to my grand children of my son E. W. Henderson, deceased: To James W. Henderson ten thousand dollars and to Ruth five thousand dollars, and to their mother Eda Henderson, five hundred dollars and all my interest in the house and lot on Seventh Street, in Eureka, where she now resides with her family.

"To my sister, Bell H. Love, of Boulder, state of California, one thousand dollars.

"To Cora Cattemole (nee Cora Love) five hundred dollars.

"To my sister, Martha Coombs, now of Windsor, Canada, one thousand dollars.

"To David H. Henderson, one thousand dollars and all interest I have in his farm in the town of Norfolk, in the county of St. Lawrence, state of New York, where he now resides.

"To my dear wife, Amelia J., the homestead where we now reside on the corner of 4th and H streets, Eureka, California, and all furniture, books and pictures, and all my jewelry and one-fourth interest in all the rest and residue of my estate after paying all the bequests herein provided to be paid.

"To my daughter, Ida Sevier, one-quarter interest in the residue of my estate, after paying the bequests herein provided for.

"To my daughter Alice J. Henderson, one-quarter interest of the residue of my estate after paying the bequests herein provided for.

"And to my son, George Y. Henderson, one-quarter interest of the residue of my estate after paying the bequests herein provided for.

"Should any of the legatees herein provided for die before my death, then the legacy provided for him or her shall be divided equally among the residuary legatees.

"My executors shall have power to collect, buy, sell, or trade in any of the property hereby bequeathed, and so far as possible to avoid the interference of courts."

[1] The wife, Amelia J. Henderson, died after the making of the will and before the death of the testator. Surviving the testator as his heirs at law were his son, George Y. Henderson, and the two daughters, Ida Sevier and Alice J. Henderson, named as executor and executrices of his will, and two grandchildren, James W. Henderson and Ruth Henderson, son and daughter of E. W. Henderson, a son of the testator, who had died prior to the making of the will. The proceedings now before us were instituted by a petition for partial distribution presented by George Y. Henderson, Ida Sevier, and Alice J. Henderson, the surviving children of the testator. By such petition, they asked distribution to them of the entire residue of the estate over and above the amount required for payment of the cash legacies and the devises of interests in real property given by the will to Eda Henderson and David H. Henderson, respectively. The contention of the petitioners was that they were entitled to receive equal one-third shares of the residue, including the property devised and bequeathed to the testator's wife, Amelia J. Henderson. On the other hand, the granddaughter, Ruth Henderson, who was a minor and appeared by her guardian, opposed the application, and filed a petition on her own behalf for partial distribution; her contention being that the bequests and devises to the wife, Amelia J. Henderson, lapsed by her death and passed to the testator's heirs at law, of whom said minor was one. The court below granted partial distribution as prayed by the surviving son and daughters of the decedent. The granddaughter appeals.

The correct solution of the problem so presented depends principally upon the meaning of the following clause of the will: "Should any of the legatees herein provided for die before my death, then the legacy provided for him or her shall be divided equally among the residuary legatees." The widow was herself one of those to whom the residue was given. The distribution to the respondents of the share which she would have taken requires a holding, first, that the widow is included in the phrase "any of the legatees herein provided for" in the substitutionary clause; and second, that the gift over is to the takers of the residue as a class, and is consequently to be divided among those members of the class who may survive the testator.

The primary purpose of all interpretation of wills is, of course, to ascertain the testator's intent, as disclosed by the language he has used. Civ. Code, § 1317. Of this class of questions, it may be said, with more truth, perhaps, than of any other, that each case depends upon its own peculiar facts, and that precedents have comparatively small value. "Except for the establishment of general principles, very little aid can be procured from adjudged cases in the construction of wills. It seldom happens that two cases can be found precisely alike"—says Washington, J., in Lambert's Lessee v. Paine, 3 Cranch, 131, 2 L. Ed. 377. Rosenberg v. Frank, 58 Cal. 387, 411; Le Breton v. Cook, 107 Cal. 410, 416, 40 Pac. 552. It is particularly important to bear this in mind in considering two cases presently to be mentioned as strongly relied on by the appellant.

In the case at bar, the appellant contends that the testator made a distinction between "legatees" and "residuary legatees," and that the latter were not described as among those whose "legacies" were, in the event of their death, to go to the residuary legatees. As a mere matter of definition, the word "legatees" includes residuary as well as other legatees. But, if the two expressions are to be differentiated, the widow (whatever may be said of the surviving daughters and son) certainly answered the designation of "legatee," in addition to that of "residuary legatee." She is given, not only a share in the residue, but the testator's furniture, books, pictures, and jewelry. As to these items, she is clearly a legatee, and the property so bequeathed to her is a legacy. To this extent, at least, the provision for her falls within the express terms of the substitutionary clause. It is hardly to be supposed that the testator designed that the property specifically bequeathed to his widow should go as directed if she should die, while the residuary provision for her should lapse and pass to his heirs as undisposed of. No intent to make such distinction appears on the face of the substitutionary clause.

The appellant argues further that, inasmuch as the estate (and the residue) included both real and personal property, such real property as was contained in the residue could not be covered by a gift over of "legacies" given to "legatees." But, while technical words in a will are ordinarily to be taken in their technical sense, they will not be so taken when it appears that they were used in another sense by a testator who drew his will without an acquaintance with the technical sense. Civ. Code, § 1327; Estate of Peabody, 154 Cal. 173, 97 Pac. 184. The will before us was, as we have said, olographic, and it is perfectly clear from its provisions that the testator was unfamiliar with the distinctions between terms appropriate to testamentary gifts of personal and those of real estate. Although the estate comprised realty, the will does not contain the word "devise" or "devisee." The testator makes gifts of his interest in real estate, and then speaks of the residue, after paying all the "bequests herein provided for." He makes provision for "residuary legatees," but says nothing of "residuary devisees." It is plain, therefore, that the testator used the terms "bequests," "legacy," "legatees," and "residuary legatees" loosely, and without regard to their exact technical meaning. In order to give full effect to these expressions, they must be read as referring to gifts and takers of realty, as well as of personal property.

The position that the widow, unquestionably a legatee taking a specific legacy, is excluded from the operation of the substitutionary clause can be supported only by making the gift over dependent upon the death of legatees receiving pecuniary legacies. This construction would, however, require us to write into the clause words of qualification not used by the testator—a course which is unauthorized, unless required to carry out the intent disclosed by the entire instrument. We find nothing in this will tending to show that Henderson meant "pecuniary legatee" when he said "legatee." Again, the construction urged by appellant would lead to intestacy as to one-fourth of the residue, a result that is not presumed to have been intended (Civ. Code, § 1326), particularly where, as here, the will as a whole indicates that the testator intended to dispose of all the property he should leave. O'Connor v. Murphy, 147 Cal. 148, 81 Pac. 406; Estate of Lux, 149 Cal. 200, 85 Pac. 147.

Two cases are cited by appellant, who confidently asserts that they require a contrary holding to that above indicated. Of each of them it may be said that the language construed differs materially from that used in the Henderson will. As we have suggested, great caution must be exercised in seeking to apply to one will the interpretation which has been given to another. In Estate of Richards, 154 Cal. 478, 98 Pac. 528, the will, after providing for the payment of certain enumerated legacies, gave and bequeathed the rest, residue, and remainder of the estate, of whatever kind and character, to testator's two brothers, William S. and Francis Richards. It then went on: "In the event of the death of any one or more of the legatees herein named, before they, or either of them, shall have received their bequests, the share of such deceased legatee or legatees shall be paid to my brother William S. Richards." Francis died before distribution. The court held that his share of the residue did not, by virtue of the substitutionary clause, pass to William S. Without going into the matter at length, we may point out that this conclusion was based upon and fully justified by a number of considerations which are not applicable to the Henderson case. The will of Richards did not speak of the brothers to whom the residue of real and personal property was given as legatees. It provided for a gift over in the event of the death of one or more of the "legatees" (a term not including, as it does here, any of the residuary beneficiaries); it made these gifts over take effect in case of death of legatees before receiving their bequests, thus referring to payment of bequests in course of administration, rather than to the receipt of a part of the residue, which would take place only upon distribution. It provided that the share of the legatee dying should be "paid" to W. S. Richards, a form of expression apt with reference to money legacies, but inappropriate if applied to a devise and bequest of a residue comprising real and personal property. The other case referred to is Lyman v. Coolidge, 176 Mass. 7, 56 N. E. 831. There a codicil to the will provided that, in case of the death of certain legatees, their legacies should be paid to their legal representatives. It then declared that "if any of the other legatees named in my will or codicils thereto shall die before my decease, the legacies therein given shall lapse, and the amount thereof shall be included in the residue of my estate." The last part of the clause, i. e., "shall be included in the residue," was held by the court to "show that the testatrix had in mind something outside of the residuary estate which was to fall into it." But this reasoning cannot be said to control the meaning of the very different language now before us. The Henderson will does not say that anything is to be "included in the residue," but that "legacies" (a word used in the will as equivalent to "legacies and devises") "shall be divided equally among the residuary legatees."

[2, 3] The remaining point to be considered is whether the gift over is to the residuary legatees as a class. In Estate of Murphy, 157 Cal. 63, 106 Pac. 230, 137 Am. St. Rep. 110, this court quotes with approval the following definition found in 6 Jarman on Wills (section 232): "In legal contemplation, a gift to a class is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons, uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, who are all to take in equal or some other definite proportions; the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number." Taking the substitutionary clause alone, its gift of legacies of legatees dying to "be divided equally among the residuary legatees" would seem to fulfill every requirement of this test. Thus it is said in the Murphy Case that a devise to "the four children of my late sister Catherine," without further words, would amount to a devise to a class. In that case, however, the words quoted were coupled with the further language: "That is to say, I give, devise and bequeath all the rest of my * * * estate, * * * share and share alike, to Timothy J. Flynn, William D. Flynn, Mary Jane Logan and Kate I. Prendergast." The fact that the clause, read as a whole, made a gift to the devisees nominatim was held to indicate an intent that they should take individually as tenants in common. It is true that in the original gift of the residue in this case undivided one-fourth interests are given to the widow and children by separate individual provisions. But the substitutionary clause is separate and distinct from this. It deals with a different subject, and is not necessarily controlled by the preceding designation of individuals. Neither the Murphy Case nor the other decisions of this court, relied on by appellant (Estate of Morrison, 138 Cal. 401, 71 Pac. 453; Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 Pac. 53), present a form of disposition like the one here involved. The Hittell will simply bequeathed all the testator's property to two persons named. It contained no element of a class designation. The will of Morrison contained a gift of the residue to be divided between testator's sister (named) and her daughters and a brother (named) of the testator. There were two daughters of the sister. It was held that this was a gift to the four beneficiaries as individuals, and not a gift of one-half to a class composed of the sister and her two daughters, nor a gift of a third to a class composed of the daughters. There was no claim, and no room for a claim, that the four persons who were to take constituted a class. These circumstances, coupled with other indications of the entire will, fully justified the conclusion that gifts to four individuals were contemplated. But the case is very different from one where a gift, complete in itself, is to the residuary legatees.

The cases above cited emphasize the point that, in seeking to ascertain whether a gift is to a class, the paramount consideration is the intent of the testator, as derived from the entire instrument. To this apparent intent, rules of construction must always yield. In the case at bar, the interpretation of a gift to a class is strengthened by a view of the will as a whole. The substitutionary clause, including, as we read it, gifts over of the residue itself, was added for the very purpose of preventing intestacy as to any part of the estate. This purpose would be accomplished by division of the share of any legatee dying among the survivors of those who were to take the residue. It would be defeated, and an inharmonious result would follow, if a part of such share were to pass as undisposed of, while the rest would go to the survivors of the residuary legatees. In the particular event which has occurred, i. e., the death of the widow, it will be observed that the construction contended for by appellant would result in having three-fourths of her share go over, while creating a lapse as to one-fourth of the very interest with respect to which the testator designed to prevent a lapse. The rule favoring a construction against intestacy applies with special force to this feature of the case.

Without undertaking to review all of the many cases cited by the respective parties, we state our conviction that the conclusions reached by the court below on both questions herein discussed are in harmony with the weight of authority, and that they give effect to the testator's actual intention.

The decree is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BORELLO. (Cr. 1,616.)

Criminal Law (§ 519*)—Confessions—Voluntary Character.

A confession, obtained by threats, intimidation, invective and false statements by the sheriff and district attorney while accused was under arrest, was not voluntary and was not admissible in evidence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; R. C. Rust, Judge.

Agostino Borello was convicted of arson, and from a judgment rendered by the District Court of Appeal, affirming the conviction, he appeals. Reversed.

James H. Creely, Alfred H. Cohen, and Milton Shepardson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., C. P. Vicini, Dist. Atty., and Benjamin P. Tabor, Special Prosecutor, for the People.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal was ordered here for further consideration after judgment rendered by the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District affirming the judgment of conviction and the order of the trial court denying a motion for a new trial, from both of which the defendant appealed.

Defendant was accused and convicted of the crime of arson, and during his trial a purported confession made by him was admitted in evidence, and the principal point on this appeal is as to the correctness of the ruling of the court in that respect.

The crime of which the defendant was accused was the felonious burning, on February 5, 1908, of the "Summit House Hotel," situated on the road leading from the town of Jackson to the town of Sutter Creek, Amador county. It appears that this property was for several years and at the date of its destruction owned by one G. B. Vicini, who, in April, 1905, leased it at a monthly rental of $60, and for a term of six years to C. Lepori and L. C. Bertin, who then, and at the time of the fire, were engaged in business in San Francisco under the firm style of Bertin & Lepori. These lessees placed this defendant and a man named Faracone in possession of the property, who thereafter conducted it as a hotel and saloon. In July, 1906, defendant executed a chattel mortgage covering all the hotel and kitchen furniture, bar fixtures, etc., in the hotel and saloon in favor of said Bertin & Lepori to secure a promissory note for $500 executed by defendant to them. In March, 1907, defendant took out two policies of insurance on the personal property in the hotel for $1,000 each, one of which, however, expired by its terms before the fire. Thereafter defendant sold his interest in the hotel and saloon business to one Rossi, who alone seems to have thereafter conducted it until a few days before the fire when he abandoned the business, closed the hotel, and left that part of the country. A few days afterward and while the hotel premises were vacant they were destroyed by fire. The defendant for several months before the fire had been living in San Francisco but, a few days before it occurred, had been seen in the vicinity of the Summit House, once in company with Lepori of the firm heretofore mentioned, lessees of the hotel; another time with one Manzo, a resident of San Francisco; and some 11 months prior to the fire defendant had endeavored, but unsuccessfully, to prevail on one James Bryant to burn the hotel, offering him $200 to do so.

There was considerable other evidence in the case—conduct on the part of the defendant and circumstantial evidence—relied on by the people to establish the guilt of the defendant, but no positive evidence except his alleged confession directly connecting him with the commission of the crime. We make no further reference to the evidence because our purpose has been to only state such of it as will make intelligible the matters to which the confession of defendant is claimed to have been addressed, and the condition and circumstances under which it was made.

It was not claimed by the people that the defendant himself actually set the hotel on fire. The theory was that the defendant, at the instigation of Lepori, engaged a man named Manzo to go from San Francisco to burn it, and that he actually did so; the motive prompting Lepori being that by the destruction of the property the firm of which he was a member would be relieved from further payments on their lease, which still had three years to run and was an unprofitable investment, and the motive of defendant was to secure the insurance money on his personal property situated in the hotel.

Now as to the conditions and circumstances under which the confession of defendant was made:

On February 8, 1908, three days after the hotel was burned down, the defendant, who had left San Francisco for Jackson, Amador county, was arrested by the sheriff of that county at Martell, a railroad station a short distance from Jackson, and taken to the county jail. The next evening, Sunday, February 9th, he was brought from the county jail to the office of the district attorney of the county, where were present the district attorney, the sheriff of the county, a deputy sheriff, the official stenographer of the superior court, and a constable of Amador county, the latter being present at the request of the district attorney, to act as interpreter, the defendant being an Italian, who, though able to speak the English language, did so brokenly. This interview in the district attorney's office lasted at least two hours and a half, although some of the parties present testified that it lasted nearly five hours. It resulted, after defendant had been interrogated by both the district attorney and the sheriff, in what purported to be a confession of the defendant. The statement made by him was dictated to the stenographic reporter, who transcribed it at once. It was this statement which was admitted in evidence as the confession of defendant, and in which he admitted having taken part in the burning of the building, having at the instigation and request of Lepori employed a man whose name is not disclosed in the written confession who agreed to and did burn it.

On the preliminary showing the sheriff, district attorney, and the deputy sheriff testified generally that no promises were held out to defendant or any threats or intimidation or other improper means used to procure him to make the confession. As to what took place at the interview the district attorney testified: "I was in that meeting or investigation for a period of about two hours. Both Mr. Gregory and myself asked defendant, Borello, some questions. Of course he willingly made the statement, the whole statement himself, and then we asked him as to little points and one thing and another that we wanted to find out, and that took up about two hours. * * *" Mr. Willis, the stenographer who was present during all the interview which culminated in the making of the alleged confession, was not called by the prosecution at the preliminary showing, and his presence as a witness had not been required by it.

On the part of defendant he himself testified, among other things, that both the sheriff and district attorney told him that it would be better for him if he would tell the truth about the burning of the hotel; also, that if he would do so both he and his brother Marco (who was then under arrest also accused of burning the hotel) would be allowed to "go free"; that the district attorney told him that he did not want to keep him in jail, but that he wanted to get Lepori. He stated further that the sheriff had told him that his brother Marco had made a full statement of the cause and origin of the fire, and that the sheriff stated other facts tending to convey the impression that, in this statement so claimed to have been made, his brother had implicated defendant in the crime, and that, if defendant would not tell the truth and sign a statement, his brother Marco could get 14 years. Other matters were testified to by defendant and other witnesses on the preliminary showing tending to support the claim of defendant that his confession had not been procured from him freely and voluntarily. All these statements of defendant and the other witnesses in his behalf were specifically denied by the sheriff and district attorney.

The prosecution then offered the confession of the defendant in evidence, to which the defendant objected on the ground that it had not been shown to have been freely and voluntarily made. Before a ruling thereon the defendant asked for a continuance in order to procure the testimony of Mr. Willis, the stenographer, who was present when the interview between the sheriff, district attorney and the defendant was had, and the alleged confession was obtained. The court refused the continuance and said: "If you gentlemen want to argue upon the evidence that is in, you can do that, with the understanding that hereafter, if Mr. Willis comes, you can introduce his evidence. If the court should sustain your objection, there will be no necessity for the evidence of Mr. Willis. If the court should overrule your objection, and admit the confession, you can have Mr. Willis hereafter in rebuttal on your case, and the court then can get the benefit of his evidence as well as the jury; and if necessary, after such a showing is made, the court can rule at that time, withdraw the confession from the jury, and instruct them not to entertain it. I think that is the only way out of it."

After argument, the court, over the objection of defendant, admitted the confession in evidence, which confession consisted of but three pages of the record, and amounted only to a declaration by defendant, as heretofore stated, that Lepori had engaged him to employ a man, to be paid by Lepori, to burn up the hotel, and that defendant employed such a man and the hotel was burned.

At a subsequent session of the court, the defendant in the meantime having procured the attendance of Mr. Willis, the official stenographer of the court (not then, however, reporting the trial of defendant) called him as a witness. While the testimony on the preliminary showing on the part of the prosecution was that, in the interview with the defendant on the 9th of February, the defendant made his statement freely and willingly, and that the sheriff and district attorney "then would ask him as to little points and one thing and another that we wanted to find out," the notes taken by the stenographer and from which he testified show very clearly just what took place, and how the interview with or investigation of the defendant was held as far as the notes speak on the subject. What the stenographer took down he had not been requested to do by any one, but did it of his own volition. He testified that all the public officers heretofore named were present in the office of the district attorney with the defendant and that the latter was questioned by both the district attorney and the sheriff directly, and also through the medium of an interpreter, and that they were all in the office of the district attorney engaged in that matter from about a quarter to 7 in the evening until half past 10 or 11 o'clock that night. All the conversation which was had between the officers, the interpreter, and the defendant was not taken down by the stenographer; but the greater and more important part of it was, and shall be referred to as the undisputed evidence in the case of what actually took place at the interview and bearing on the question whether the confession was freely and voluntarily obtained from the defendant or not. Before doing so, it is to be said that, when this appeal was before the District Court of Appeal for determination, that court, as appears from its opinion, was strongly persuaded that if the confession of defendant had been obtained solely through the declarations of the sheriff, and his conduct and that of the district attorney on the evening of the 9th, as disclosed by the stenographer Willis, such confession would have been shown to have been improperly obtained and inadmissible in evidence. That court was of the opinion, however, that the declarations of the defendant on the evening of the 9th of February when the notes were taken and the confession signed by the defendant were but repetitions of admissions of guilt which he had made to the officers, (the sheriff and district attorney) the night previous (February 8th), and, having voluntarily confessed the crime on the previous evening, the subsequent conduct of the sheriff and the district attorney on the night of February 9th, however threatening or otherwise reprehensible it might have been, could not be said to have anything to do with causing defendant to then admit his guilt, because he had already admitted it on the previous evening. But there is not a particle of evidence in the record that the defendant made any confession of guilt or stated any circumstances of an incriminatory nature on the evening of February 8th or at any other time than during the interview of February 9th. No such claim is made in the brief of respondent. Nowhere in the record is there even a suggestion that he had done anything of the kind excepting as might appear from some declarations of the sheriff and district attorney in questions they asked him on the evening of the 9th and which imported that the defendant had made them the previous evening. But, in as far as any questions by the sheriff or district attorney stated or implied that defendant had made any incriminatory admissions on the evening previous to February 9th, such statement or assumption was untrue and was a species of deception employed to embarrass, disconcert, and entrap the defendant, because it affirmatively appears from testimony directed specifically to the fact that the defendant made no admissions of guilt or statements of any incriminatory character at any time previous to the evening of the 9th of February. This is directly shown by the testimony of the sheriff and district attorney themselves, who explicitly state that on the evening of the 8th the defendant would not talk about the burning of the hotel, denied any knowledge about it; the district attorney testifying that, while he asked and the defendant answered some unimportant questions, the important ones which he asked him were not answered by the defendant at all.

Recurring now to the testimony of Willis as to the actual occurrences and the true situation and circumstances under which the alleged confession was obtained: Reasonable limits of an opinion preclude a detailed statement of all that occurred. It appears that on the afternoon of the 9th the district attorney had visited the defendant in jail; that the defendant made no statement to him, but said, "I will see you to-night"; and that it was on account of this statement that defendant was subsequently brought to the district attorney's office, where the various officers of the county heretofore referred to were assembled. If defendant intended by the expression, "I will see you to-night," to convey the impression that he would then make a confession to the officers of any connection with the offense charged, it is quite apparent that he abandoned any such intention before he was brought before them. It does not appear that he was then asked to make, nor did he make, any spontaneous statement of his connection with the burning of the building, but, on the contrary, the sheriff and district attorney at once proceeded to interrogate him respecting the matter, and this investigation on their part continued for a long period of time before he made any confession respecting his connection with the commission of the offense. His general attitude when he was brought in, and which continued during the examination and while he was being subjected to examination by the officers, is stated by the district attorney himself: "He would hem and haw about it. * * * When I say he hemmed and hawed, I mean he would not say anything. He was holding his head down a great deal. One minute he would want to tell and the next minute he did not want to tell. * * * The reason why he wanted to tell I could not tell you. I would say it was because he was scared, and then he would want to tell and hem and haw about it, and finally came out and told the whole story. * * * Mr. Gregory (the sheriff) and I just kept on asking questions relating to the matter."

But it is these very questions put by the sheriff and district attorney, the continuous and searching examination to which the defendant was put by both of them in an endeavor to wring out a confession when it was apparent that he was not disposed to make one, and their statements and conduct toward him, which showed that the confession was not freely and voluntarily made, but was the result of threats, intimidation, invective, accompanied with coarse profanity, mental coercion, and false statements used to procure it, the employment of which the law absolutely discountenances and prohibits.

The notes of Willis—the correctness of which are not questioned—show that the sheriff and district attorney, principally the former, in English, and through the medium of the Italian interpreter, interrogated the defendant persistently for upwards of an hour, if not for several hours; that they persisted in making repeated inquiries on the same matters to which the defendant gave them what in their judgment were unsatisfactory replies to such an extent as to elicit from the defendant through the interpreter this declaration to the sheriff, his interrogator: "He says he cannot say anything more than he knows. It looks as if you are not satisfied with what he says." Responded to by the sheriff with, "He says one thing and then he wants to take it back."

During the long inquisitorial ordeal through which he was put by the officers and before he had made any admission of guilt, he was told by the sheriff that he would have to tell all he knew and was accused by both the sheriff and district attorney of not telling the truth in the answers he was giving. The sheriff declared to him that he had absolute proof of his guilt and could convict him before a jury; charged him with another crime in connection with the crime of arson; declared that he could prove he had offered a man money to burn the hotel and could prove that fact whether it was so or not; stated that they had sufficient proof without any confession on his part to convict him; that his brother Marco had made statements in which he implicated the defendant in the burning of the hotel, and if his brother went back on it he would go to the penitentiary for 14 years; they asserted that he had made statements to them the night before of an incriminatory character, when in fact he had made no such statements at all; charged him with repudiating in his answers the statements declared to have been so previously made; and indulged in coarse profanity throughout their examination relative to the statements he was making and to emphasize their disbelief in their truth.

Supplementing these references to the conduct of the officers during the examination with a few extracts from the notes of Willis: Almost at the beginning of his examination when the defendant had stated, among other things, that he did not know the name of the man who it was assumed by the officers had actually burned the hotel, the district attorney declared: "Don't you think if I told you those things, then you would ask me what was the man's name, and I would say, 'I don't know,' you would tell me I was a damned liar. That is what you would say. You would tell any reasonable man under the sun; you can't tell any man that has got a damned ounce of sense, and tell them that state of facts, that you don't know a man's name, he would be a God damned fool if he believed you."

Following a large number of interrogatories by both the officers based on purported statements made the night before by the defendant, which questions however elicited no answer from the defendant incriminating himself, he was further asked why he had said his brother Marco had gone to San Francisco with him, to which he answered, "It don't make any difference." The district attorney then said: "I understand you now, that you don't want to tell the truth; that is the way I understand you. A. I am telling the truth. Q. You don't want to when you say it is none of your business, when your brother go to San Francisco. Suppose my brother and I go to San Francisco and a man asked me whether I knew. You know damned well I would lie if I said I didn't know. A. You ask my brother. Q. Does he tell the truth? You don't. Can't you tell the truth? A. Yes. Q. Don't you know whether he went down with you? It is the God damndest proposition I ever heard of."

It also appears from a consideration of the notes of Willis that after an unremitting, searching, and protracted questioning by the officers in regard to the burning of the hotel had failed to draw any admission from defendant of his connection with it, he was finally asked who had telegraphed to Lepori at San Francisco that the hotel had been burned. Defendant made no answer. Asked if he knew the name of the person who had done so, and answering in the negative, the sheriff addressed him as follows: "I ain't going to let you go. I won't lie to you. I got too much proof. I am not going to let you go; that is all there is about it. You are going to stand trial as I told you last night, and you don't have to tell me anything if you don't want to; but, if you want to tell me anything, it must be free and voluntary. I want the truth. I want to know the truth. That is all I do want. Now, do you think that when I can prove that you offered a man $200—I can prove it whether it is so or not—that you offered a man $200 to burn that place, that you told him that you had got the coal oil, that you went down to Rose's and had the place insured, and you came back and told a man it was all right, and he told you that you were crazy? Now, I can prove that, and when I can prove that you came up here and shipped away the goods, and I can prove that you said Lepori told you to ship the goods away, and I can prove to you that you told other people that Lepori told you there was going to be a fire, and if your brother goes back on it, he will go to the penitentiary for 14 years; I don't lie to anybody. I don't lie to anybody. I am telling you what he said. But he said that. I am not telling you all that your brother said. I am not going to tell you all your brother said. I will tell you right now I won't tell you all your brother said; but you did tell your brother that, and your brother swore that you told him that Lepori was going to have a man come up here to set that house afire. I can prove that by every man in this room. They all heard it, by God, every man in this room heard that. Now, I can prove that you went to work and you did ship this stuff as Lepori told you. I can prove that man came up here from San Francisco with you, and that you stayed here with him and stayed until your brother came up and you—at the Summit House—and when your brother came up here, then you took your brother into his bedroom, the first night, and told him this story. Now, you shipped this stuff away, and you shipped stuff that didn't belong to you—not a God damned bit of it. That cash register didn't belong to you or Lepori. It belonged to Rossi. You said this that you sold it to Rossi, and you shipped the wine and you shipped the bedding and you shipped the mineral water, and, by God, it is selling goods that don't belong to you. That belongs to Rossi, and Rossi has got a bill of sale for that."

Here the district attorney intervened with: "When you went to San Francisco, you went with Rossi and your brother, and they got off at Galt for Sacramento. You told us that Lepori told you to pack that stuff, and that Lepori didn't own it any more than you did. You told us that Lepori told that when you went back to San Francisco. You went down to Lepori's store to tell him that you had shipped that stuff and you was also going to tell him that the man that went up with you was at your brother's house. Do you suppose that when I can prove that— "

Here the sheriff, interrupting the district attorney, proceeded: "Do you suppose now that when I can prove that to you that any jury in the world is going to let you go? You have got to show where you got all this news. That is all there is about it. You have already told us that Lepori told you, but that won't clear you. You asked me if you could go, and I told you no. I am telling you I can't turn you loose. Suppose I turned you loose with all that evidence against you, what would people say about me? Here is a God damned pretty sheriff and a God damned pretty district attorney, to have all this proof against a man and turn him loose. * * * If he (defendant) wants to say anything, he can say it now, because if he don't I am going to strike out to-morrow morning and I am going to round up this whole God damned bunch. I can't stay here for a week, and I am not going to do it. If he wants to say anything, he can say it now. I want to say to you right now, Borello, that if you don't want to say anything you don't have to. If you don't want to make any statement, you don't have to, but if you do it must be free and voluntary on your part, without any concessions, promises, rewards, or anything else. Now, if you want to do it, you can."

Immediately following these declarations by the sheriff and district attorney, the defendant, in response to further questions, stated that Lepori had instigated the burning of the hotel and had asked him to employ a man to do it, Lepori agreeing to pay the man a hundred dollars if the destruction was successful; that the defendant employed one Dominico Morozi, or a man having some such similar name—defendant could not tell exactly—to do it; that he took him to the Summit House from San Francisco for that purpose, left him there, and the hotel was burned.

Additional excerpts from the notes of Willis might be given showing highly improper conduct on the part of the officers to procure a confession from defendant, but the above will suffice. In this connection it is to be observed that in the lengthy and forceful declaration of the sheriff to the defendant last above quoted the sheriff did not specifically state to the defendant how far the statement of his brother implicated him in the burning of the hotel; but there can be no reasonable doubt but that the sheriff intended to convey the idea and have the defendant believe, as he naturally would, that his brother had made a statement to the sheriff directly implicating him in it. The defendant knew that his brother Marco was under arrest and had made a statement, but did not know what it contained. No other meaning or intention could be taken by defendant from the language of the sheriff when referring to the statement made by Marco: "I am not telling you all your brother said. I am not going to tell you all your brother said. I will tell you right now I won't tell you all your brother said; but you did tell your brother that and your brother swore that you told him that Lepori was going to have a man up there and set that house on fire"—except that its emphatically reiterated character was to suggestively and insinuatingly impress the defendant with the belief that his brother's statement had in fact implicated him.

No attempt was made on the part of the prosecution to question the accuracy of what is shown by the testimony of Willis to be the exact circumstances and method employed by the officers to procure the confession.

On this showing made, the defendant moved the court to set aside the order theretofore made admitting the confession in evidence, under the right reserved to him by the court to do so at the time the confession was originally admitted in evidence, and on the ground that it was not freely and voluntarily made, which motion the court denied. This was error. The court should have granted the motion. While, upon the preliminary showing made by the prosecution and upon which the admission of the confession was made, it appeared in answers to general questions that the confession had been obtained freely and voluntarily, the uncontradicted testimony of the stenographer showed exactly how it was obtained and by what method and conduct on the part of those who had testified to its free and voluntary character, and conclusively showed that it was not so made, but was obtained by a method inquisitorial in its nature and of the "third degree" in character; the assumption of a dominating and browbeating attitude of the officers toward the defendant, and the employment of deceptions, threats, and intimidations, emphasized with coarse profanity.

That a confession so extorted cannot be admitted in evidence is firmly established in the jurisprudence of this country. Bram v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. Ct. 183, 42 L. Ed. 568; People v. Loper, 112 Pac. 720.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.; SHAW, J.

SLOSS, J. I concur. The methods employed to induce the defendant to confess were, I think, more extreme and unfair than those which were held by a majority of the court in the Loper Case to require the exclusion of the confession there obtained. It is impossible in the present case to avoid the conclusion that the confession was forced from the defendant by means of intimidation. Apart from anything else, there was a direct threat that defendant's brother would be subjected to a long term of imprisonment for perjury if he did not so testify as to fasten upon the defendant the guilt of the crime with which he was charged. A confession resulting from the use of such means cannot in any fair sense be said to have been free and voluntary.

MARSIGLIA v. DOZIER et al. (L. A. 2,746.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1911.)

NEGLIGENCE (§ 111*)—PLEADING—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Defendants maintained a fire escape, consisting of a ladder, attached at one end by hinges to the building at the second-floor level. From the other end of the ladder, a rope passed over a pulley, attached to the building at the third-floor level; there being at the other end of the rope a weight, constituting a counterbalance. Children at play moved the loose end of the ladder up and down, and the pulley became detached, allowing the weight to fall on one of them. Held, that the proximate cause of the accident was the defective construction or fastening of the pulley, so that the complaint, alleging no negligence with respect thereto, but simply in respect to leaving the ladder lowered, within the reach of children, stated no cause of action; negligence not being presumed, but being required to be pleaded.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Vincent Marsiglia, by Malkola Marsiglia, his guardian, against Melville Dozier and others. Judgment for defendants; plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Peyton H. Moore and H. A. Massey, for appellant. Leslie R. Hewitt and H. E. Riggins, for respondents.

SHAW, J. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and thereupon judgment was given for the defendants. Plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The action is to recover damages suffered by plaintiff from an injury caused by a heavy weight falling against him. The defendants are the members of the board of education of the city of Los Angeles. The board maintains a high school in a high school building under its control. The building was more than two stories high. The law requires the board of education to provide such buildings with fire escapes. Pol. Code, § 1890. The fire escape provided by the defendants for this building consisted of a stepladder attached at one end by a hinge at the level of the second-story floor, and so arranged that the other end could be lowered to the ground, if necessary for use. To facilitate this lowering, a wire rope was run from the movable end over a pulley, attached at third-floor level, and thence to a weight or counterpoise suspended in the air some 12 feet from the ground. The proper position of the ladder when not in use was at such a height that the lower end could not be reached by a person on the ground. When the end was lowered, it would, of course, raise the weight. The injury was caused by this weight falling against the plaintiff's shoulder.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The alleged negligence is as follows: When the end of the ladder was down within reach of a person on the ground, it could be raised, lowered, and made to oscillate by a child. Consequently it formed an attractive plaything for children in the vicinity. It did attract the plaintiff and other children thereto, as defendants well knew. Plaintiff was 10 years old. In the position just stated, the fire escape was a dangerous thing for children to play with. The reason why it was dangerous in that position is not stated. At the time of the injury, the defendants had negligently allowed the ladder to be lowered so as to be accessible to children on the ground, and to remain there unguarded and without fastenings. Plaintiff and other children, by the negligence of defendants, as aforesaid, were attracted to it. Plaintiff was standing beneath the weight. The other children were moving the ladder. By reason of their so moving the ladder, the pulley above, over which the rope ran, became loosened and detached from its fastenings, and allowed the weight to fall against plaintiff's shoulder, causing the injuries complained of.

The only negligent act here stated is the act of allowing the ladder to be lowered so as to be within reach of the children, and to remain there unguarded and unfastened. This allowed the children to move the lower end of the ladder up and down, and thus raise and lower the weight. But it was the purpose and plan of the apparatus that the weight as a counterpoise should thus move as the ladder was moved. This would turn the pulley, of course. It was so designed and constructed. Given a proper condition of the pulley, and the ladder might have been moved freely, with no result, except the turning of the pulley and corresponding moving of the weight. Such movement would not have detached the pulley from its place, or caused the weight to fall. Therefore the direct and proximate cause of the injury must have been the defective construction or defective fastening of the pulley. There is no allegation that the pulley was either negligently made or negligently affixed, nor any averment of negligence in respect to it. If the moving of the ladder caused the pulley to break loose and the weight to fall, it was solely because of the condition of the pulley. Unless that condition was the result of the negligence of the defendants, they cannot be held liable for the injury. Negligence is not presumed. The plaintiff must allege and prove that the negligent act of the defendants was the direct or proximate cause of the injury, or he cannot recover. No negligence being alleged with respect to the thing which caused the injury, it must be presumed that the defect was a latent defect, with notice of which the defendants are not chargeable, or that the detachment of the pulley was brought about by the act of some third person for whom they are not responsible. The consequence is that the complaint does not state a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONSOLIDATED LUMBER CO. v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND. (L. A. 2,735.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1911. Rehearing Denied Dec. 29, 1911.)

1. Bills and Notes (§ 537*)—Presentment—Waiver—Evidence.

Evidence that an indorser of a note did not waive its presentment to the maker when due held sufficient to go to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 537.*]

2. Evidence (§ 471*)—Question Involving Conclusion.

Even if the question, asked of the indorser of a note, whether he ever agreed with any one to waive presentment of it to its maker, on the day it became due, for payment, calls for a conclusion, it is in the discretion of the court to allow it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

3. Witnesses (§ 269*)—Cross-Examination.

Plaintiff, in an action by the holder of a note against the surety of a notary, for failure of the notary in protesting the note to present it to K., its maker, by reason whereof plaintiff, in an action against S., its indorser, was defeated, may, on cross-examination of S., ask if he ever agreed with any one to waive presentment of the note to K., though defendant, in his examination in chief of S., had merely asked about his conversations with W., plaintiff's agent, about the note before it became due, and he had answered that, while he had such conversations, he was then unable to give their substance; W., having, in the action of plaintiff against S., testified that S., in conversations with him, waived such presentment; and plaintiff, from the pleadings, having good reason to suppose that defendant would offer in evidence the testimony of W., given in the former action; the question, in view of these facts, being germane to the examination in chief and proper cross-examination.

5. Bills and Notes (§ 226*)—Accommodation Indorsers—Consideration.

One who, before execution of a note, signed it as accommodation indorser, in effect making him a surety, was liable, though he personally received no consideration from the payee, but the only consideration was credit to the maker on a prior obligation due by him to the payee.

6. Depositions (§ 111*)—Notice and Affidavit for Taking—Waiver by Stipulation.

Notice and affidavit, required by Code Civ. Proc. § 2031, for taking a deposition, are waived by a stipulation that the deposition of a certain person may be taken before a certain person, and when so taken may be used on the trial.

7. Depositions (§ 99*)—Use in Another Action—Deposition on Stipulation.

That a deposition is taken under a stipulation, waiving notice and affidavit required by Code Civ. Proc. § 2031, for taking a deposition, makes it none the less admissible in another action, under section 2022, providing that a deposition, "taken and returned as provided in this chapter," may be used in another action; such notice and affidavit being no part of the taking of the deposition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Cent. Dig. §§ 288–296; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

8. Depositions (§ 99*)—Use in Another Action—Limitation of Use by Stipulation.

The provision of a stipulation for taking a deposition, that when so taken it "may be used on the trial of said action," does not limit its use to the action in which it is taken, and so take it out of Code Civ. Proc. § 2022, providing that a deposition may be used in any other action between the same parties on the same subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Cent. Dig. §§ 288–296; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

9. Depositions (§ 99*)—Use in Another Action—Actions Between Same Parties.

The parties to the two actions, both on the same cause of action, are the same, within Code Civ. Proc. § 2022, providing that a deposition taken in one action may be used in any other action between the same parties on the same subject, where the action in which it is taken is against both the obligors on a joint and several obligation, and the second action is against only one of them.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by the Consolidated Lumber Company against the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gray, Barker, Bowen, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, for appellant. W. W. Middlecoff, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Appeals are presented from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Plaintiff sued to recover damages arising from a breach of duty by one C. T. Gifford, notary public; the defendant being the surety upon his official bond. Plaintiff held a note for $5,000, executed by L. E. Kiefhaber, and indorsed by C. F. L. Kinnear and G. H. Seaton. It was dated September 20, 1906, and was due on April 1, 1907, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable monthly. It provided that if the interest was not paid as it became due the whole amount of principal and interest should thereafter be due and payable at the option of the holder; such option to be exercised within 90 days after such default. Kiefhaber resided in Redlands. A short time before April 1, 1907, plaintiff sent the note to the First National Bank of Redlands for collection. It was not paid on April 1st, and thereupon the Redlands Bank delivered it to Gifford, as notary, to be protested. Gifford appended thereto his official certificate in due form, showing a regular protest thereof by him and the sending of proper notices to the indorsers. In fact, however, he did not present the note to Kiefhaber for payment, and by that omission the indorsers were released. Kiefhaber and Kinnear were insolvent, and Seaton was the only party financially responsible upon the note. The plaintiff sued him on the indorsement, and was defeated in the suit, and lost the debt because of the nonpresentation to Kiefhaber. This action is based on said failure of Gifford, as notary, to properly protest said note.

In defense the defendant claimed (1) that Seaton had waived the presentment to Kiefhaber for payment; and (2) that the plaintiff had exercised its option as provided in the note, and had declared it due and payable long before April 1st. Upon the first ground, it claimed that no protest was necessary; and hence that Seaton was bound, notwithstanding his successful defense to the suit on the indorsement. Upon the second ground, it claimed that the plaintiff itself had suffered the note to become due without protest, or demand upon Kiefhaber for payment, and thereby released Seaton. The general verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff implies that neither of these defenses were proved. In answer to special interrogatories, the jury found that neither of them was true. It is claimed that these findings are contrary to the evidence.

[1] We think this claim cannot be sustained. The testimony relied upon to prove the waiver of presentment consisted of the complaint filed by the plaintiff in the suit against Seaton, and the testimony of Wheatley, the plaintiff's general manager, and of Seaton. The said complaint stated that some time prior to March 27th Seaton had requested plaintiff not to protest the note, or to resort to any legal action, or to incur any expense, and had positively promised to pay it at maturity; but it further stated that on March 27th he had informed plaintiff that he had decided not to pay the note at maturity. In his answer in that action, he denied all the allegations of the complaint. The judgment roll was introduced in evidence, and the judgment was in his favor. The testimony of Wheatley consisted of extracts from the transcript of his testimony in the trial of the suit against Seaton. He testified at that time, in substance, that prior to April 1st Seaton had asked and he had promised to give further time on the note; that Seaton said he would pay it, but could not do so at maturity, and that it would not be necessary to go to any expense; that Wheatley told Seaton that he would have to protest the note on account of the other indorser, but that it was not necessary, so far as Seaton was concerned. Seaton's deposition was taken and introduced in evidence. One of the questions and answers was as follows: "Did you at any time ever agree with any one to waive the presentment of this note to Mr. Kiefhaber, on the day it became due, for payment? Answer: No, sir." It is apparent that this evidence does not conclusively show the waiver of presentment by Seaton. There is no express declaration of such waiver, and it is a fair inference that the parties did not understand that they were waiving such formality. The testimony of Seaton directly contradicts it. This raised a conflict in the evidence which was for the jury to resolve. The finding upon either side of the question would be beyond the power of this court to set aside. The court properly left the matter for the jury to determine.

[2, 3] Defendant insists that the aforesaid question and the answer of Seaton were improperly admitted. The objection made to it was that it was not cross-examination, and that it called for the conclusion of the witness. Whether it called for a conclusion or not, we think it was within the discretion of the court to allow it in the form in which it was put. In the previous part of the deposition, defendant's counsel had asked Seaton about his conversations with Wheatley concerning the note before it became due, to which he answered that he had such conversations, but was unable at that time to give the substance of them. Plaintiff knew of the testimony of Wheatley in regard to these conversations, given in the former action against Seaton, and from the pleadings in this action it had good reason to suppose that Wheatley's testimony in the former action would be offered in evidence by the defendant. The aforesaid question to Seaton related to the same subject, and in view of these facts we think it was germane to the examination in chief and proper cross-examination.

[4] With regard to the exercise of the option to declare the note due before its expressed maturity, the testimony of Wheatley upon the trial of the suit against Seaton was introduced. He there stated that he had many times notified Seaton, both orally and by letter, that he had elected to declare the note due for nonpayment of interest; but he said further that on March 26, 1907, which was the last interview he had prior to its expressed maturity, he asked Seaton if he was going to pay the note when it became due on the 1st of April, and Seaton said he could not pay it, and thereupon asked for an extension. On redirect examination, he said he did not understand from the questions put to him that he was asked whether the note itself was made due before the 1st of April. We have not given the testimony in full, but taking it as a whole, in connection with that of Seaton on the same subject, it tends to show that neither himself nor Seaton understood that the note had been declared due in advance of its expressed maturity on April 1st. It was a fair inference that any declarations previously made to that effect had been withdrawn, or that they were not understood to intend to declare the immediate maturity of the note.

[5] The court properly refused to instruct the jury that if there was no consideration for the indorsement of the note by Seaton, and the plaintiff knew that fact at the time it accepted the note, the verdict should be for the defendant. There was no evidence to justify such a finding. Kiefhaber was the principal debtor, and Seaton was an accommodation indorser. His indorsement was made prior to the execution of the note. The consideration to Kiefhaber was a credit of $5,000 upon a prior obligation due from him to the plaintiff. Seaton was, in effect, a surety. There was no dispute about these facts, and Seaton fully understood them. His testimony that he personally received no consideration from the plaintiff for his indorsement was, under these circumstances, immaterial.

[6-9] It is further claimed that the court erred in admitting in evidence the deposition of C. T. Gifford, taken in a former action by the plaintiff against the defendant and C. T. Gifford upon the same bond and for the same breach. That action had been dismissed. The complaint in that action and in this were identical, except that Gifford is not a party to this action. The deposition of Gifford was taken in the former action under a stipulation providing "that the deposition of C. T. Gifford, one of the defendants, as a witness in behalf of the plaintiff, may be taken before Charles L. Allison, * * * and when so taken the said deposition may be used on the trial of said action." It is conceded that Gifford's absence at the trial of the present action was duly accounted for, and that, except as to the formality of giving the notice and making the affidavit required by sections 2031 and 2021 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the deposition was in all respects taken and returned as provided in chapters 1–3, tit. 3, article 4, of that Code, sections 1981 to 2054, inclusive. The claim is that the stipulation aforesaid limited the use of the deposition to the trial of the action in which it was taken. Section 2022, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that: "A deposition taken and returned, as provided in this chapter, may * * * be read in evidence by either party * * * in any other action or proceeding between the same parties or their privies or successors in interest upon the same subject." Nothing is here said about the preliminary notice and affidavit. It is sufficient, so far as this section goes, if the deposition was "taken and returned" in the manner provided. The notice and affidavit were waived by the giving of the stipulation. In such cases the deposition is admissible in a second action for the same cause between the same parties, just as it would have been if the affidavit had been made and due notice had been given of the time and place of the taking. The taking of a deposition consists of the examination of the witness, reducing it to writing, and the signing of the same by the witness. Doubtless a party might, by such stipulation, limit the use of the proposed deposition to the trial of the action in which it was taken, or in any other manner he sees fit. But he does not so limit it by inserting in the stipulation the statement that it "may be used on the trial of said action." The fact that Gifford was not a party to this action is not material; the cause of action being the same, the obligation being joint and several, and the other parties being the same. Code Civ. Proc. § 1910; Briggs v. Briggs, 80 Cal. 253, 22 Pac. 334.

These are the only questions presented upon the appeal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FRASER v. BENTEL et al. (L. A. 2,755.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1911.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*) — COMPLAINT—CONTENTS.

A complaint for specific performance must allege that the contract sought to be enforced is just and reasonable as to the defendants, and that the consideration is adequate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*)—NATURE OF ACTION—PLEADING.

Where the complaint was in the ordinary form of an action to foreclose a mortgage lien alleging defendants' execution of a promissory note and mortgage securing it and nonpayment of the note, the action was one to foreclose a mortgage lien, and not for specific performance of an agreement to sell land, though the mortgage, a copy of which was embodied in the complaint, stated that the amount of the secured note was the balance due on the purchase price of the mortgaged property; the original agreement for the purchase and sale of the land having been executed by the conveyance of the land, and the payment of part of the price, and the giving of a note and mortgage for the balance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

3. COVENANTS (§ 42*)—COVENANTS AGAINST "INCUMBRANCES"—"INCLUDES."

Civ. Code, § 1113, provides that the use of the word "grant" in a conveyance shall imply a covenant that the estate is free from incumbrances, at the time of the execution of the conveyance. Section 1114 provides that the term "incumbrances" includes taxes, assessments, and all liens upon realty. Held that, aside from the statutory definition, an "incumbrance," as used in the phrase "covenant against incumbrances," is any right or interest in land which may subsist in third persons to the diminution of the value of the estate to the grantee, but consistently with the passing of the fee, and both within such definition and under the statute a restrictive covenant against the use of firearms on the premises was an "incumbrance"; the word "includes" being ordinarily a word of enlargement and not of restriction (quoting Words & Phrases, vol. 4, p. 3519.)

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. § 43; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

4. COVENANTS (§ 127*)—INCUMBRANCES—EFFECT OF BREACH—DAMAGES.

Since a covenant against incumbrances is one of indemnity, only nominal damages may be recovered for an incumbrance which causes the grantee no actual injury, whether the grantee's claim be made as a counterclaim, or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. §§ 238–242, 258; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

5. COVENANTS (§ 127*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH — MEASURE OF DAMAGES — COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES.

The usual measure of damages, and that prescribed by Civ. Code, § 3305, for breach of a covenant against incumbrances, which is the amount the covenantee actually expends in removing the incumbrance, not exceeding the value of the property at the time of the breach, only applies to incumbrances which may be satisfied by money payments, and does not apply to incumbrances which cannot be so extinguished, such as restrictive covenants on the use of land; the damages recoverable in such case being those naturally and proximately resulting to the covenantee by the existence and continuance of the incumbrance by reducing the market value of the land, in accordance with the general rule for measuring damages from breach of contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. §§ 238–242, 258; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

6. COVENANTS (§ 127*)—ACTION FOR BREACH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES.

Under Civ. Code, § 3300, providing that the measure of damages for breach of a contractual obligation is the amount which will compensate the injured party for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which in the ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom, a grantee could not recover, as damages for breach of a covenant against incumbrances by the existence of a restrictive covenant, a loss which he sustained by failure to resell the land because of the existence of such restrictive covenant, where it is not shown that the grantor was informed when he conveyed that the grantee was buying to resell; such damage not being the ordinary consequence of the breach of the covenant.

7. DAMAGES (§ 40*)—MEASURE—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

The profits of collateral enterprises in which a party claiming damages for breach of contract has been induced to engage by relying upon the performance of the contract are not recoverable if the other party had no notice of such collateral undertaking.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by A. R. Fraser against George R. Bentel and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. C. Millsap and Millsap & Sparks, for appellants. Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Appeal by defendants from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage of real property. The complaint was in the ordinary form, setting forth the making by defendants of a promissory note, the execution of a mortgage to secure the same, the plaintiff's ownership of the note and mortgage, and the nonpayment of a part of the principal and the interest due. Copies of the note and mortgage were incorporated in the complaint. The mortgage contains a statement that the amount of the promissory note secured by it ($15,200) is the balance due the mortgagee on the purchase price of the mortgaged property. To this complaint the defendants demurred, and they now assign the overruling of their demurrer as error.

[1] Their contention is that the action is in effect one for the specific performance of an agreement for the purchase and sale of real estate, and that it is incumbent on plaintiff in such action to allege and prove that the contract sought to be enforced is just and reasonable as to the defendants, and that the consideration is adequate. Civ. Code, § 3391. That allegations showing the existence of these conditions are necessary to the sufficiency of a complaint for specific performance is not to be questioned. See Herzog v. A., T. & S. F. R. R. Co., 153 Cal. 496, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428, and cases cited.

[2] But we are unable to agree with appellants that the case at bar is of the character claimed. It is an action to foreclose the lien of a mortgage. The defendants do not contend that the relief sought in a foreclosure suit, as such, amounts to the specific performance of a contract. But it is said that, inasmuch as this mortgage recites that it is given to secure the payment of a note for the balance of the purchase price of land, the purpose of the action is to compel the payment of such balance, and the plaintiff is, in reality, seeking to enforce the performance of the original agreement for the sale of the land. The fallacy in this argument lies in the failure of appellants to recognize that the original agreement for purchase and sale has been fully executed. See Bryan v. Swain, 56 Cal. 616. On the part of the vendor, it has been executed by the conveyance; on the part of the vendee, by the payment of a part of the purchase price and the giving of a note and mortgage for the balance. In foreclosing, the plaintiff is proceeding upon the note and mortgage, not upon the precedent contract out of which the note and mortgage arose. Herein the case differs completely from White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193, relied on by appellants. There the vendor in an executory contract of sale, having tendered a deed, sought to compel the vendee to comply with his agreement to pay the purchase price. He further sought to foreclose his vendor's lien upon the defendant's equitable interest under the contract. This, as the court said, was clearly a suit to enforce the specific performance of the contract of purchase and sale. The decision, which is the only one cited to sustain the claim that the present action is one for specific performance of a contract, has no relevancy to the facts here shown. The demurrer was properly overruled.

The defendants answered, setting up, by way of counterclaim, that the note and mortgage were given in consideration of a conveyance of land to defendant George R. Bentel, whereby the grantors (of whom plaintiff was one) covenanted that the land was free and clear of incumbrances done, made, or suffered by them, or either of them. It is alleged that the land was, in fact, subject to an incumbrance created by the deed under which plaintiff acquired title; such incumbrance consisting of a covenant running with the land, forever prohibiting the use of firearms upon the premises conveyed. Defendants averred that the land had been depreciated in value by reason of said incumbrance to the extent of $20,000. A second counterclaim sets forth, further, that the defendant George R. Bentel took the conveyance from plaintiff and his associates, and made the mortgage without knowledge of the incumbrance, that he had contracted to sell parcels of the land, unincumbered, to various purchasers for sums aggregating over $74,000, that such purchasers had refused to carry out their contracts by reason of the aforesaid incumbrance, and that the property cannot now be sold for over $40,000.

The court found against the allegations of damage and found, in addition, that Bentel had knowledge of the restrictive provision concerning the use of firearms at, and long prior to, the execution of the mortgage, and that he expressly waived any and all objections to the said restrictive provision.

[3] The covenant against incumbrances, relied on by defendants in their answer, was that implied, under section 1113 of the Civil Code, from the use of the word "grant" in the conveyance from plaintiff and his associates to the defendants. Section 1114 of the same Code declares that "the term 'incumbrance' includes taxes, assessments, and all liens upon real property." A restrictive covenant against the use of firearms is not covered by this enumeration, and the respondent contends that the existence of the restriction in question, though it be binding upon subsequent purchasers of the land, does not constitute a breach of the covenant against "incumbrances." But the authorities cited to this point (Weber v. McCleverty, 149 Cal. 316, 86 Pac. 706; Wm. Ede Co. v. Heywood, 153 Cal. 615, 96 Pac. 81, 22 L. R. A. [N. S.] 562) lend no support to the claim that section 1114 excludes from the meaning of the word "incumbrances" every kind of limitation of a perfect title other than those described in the section. Nor does the language of the section itself justify this interpretation. The word "includes" is not, ordinarily, a word of limitation, but rather of enlargement. In re Goetz, 71 App. Div. 272, 75 N. Y. Supp. 750; Cooper v. Stinson, 5 Minn. 522 (Gil. 416); Calhoun v. Memphis & P. R. Co., 4 Fed. Cas. 1045. In the absence of any statutory definition, an "incumbrance," within the meaning of a covenant such as that under consideration, has been defined as "any right to or interest in land which may subsist in third persons to the diminution of the value of the estate to the tenant, but consistently with the passing of the fee." Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. 627, 3 Am. Dec. 246; Rawle, Cov. for Title, § 75; 4 Words & Phr. 3519, and cases cited. This definition, sustained by a great weight of authority, is broad enough to include easements and restrictions like the one in the case at bar, limiting the right of the owner of land to freely use it in any lawful way. Kuhnen v. Parker, 56 N. J. Eq. 286, 38 Atl. 641; Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. 497; Huyck v. Andrews, 113 N. Y. 81, 20 N. E. 581, 3 L. R. A. 789, 10 Am. St. Rep. 432. This interpretation has been applied to building restrictions (Roberts v. Levy, 3 Abb. Prac. [N. S.] 311 [N. Y.]; Ayling v. Kramer, 133 Mass. 12) and to covenants prohibiting the sale of spirits on the premises (Hatcher v. Andrews, 5 Bush [Ky.] 561; Rawle, Cov. for Title, § 77). We see no reason for holding that the term incumbrances, as it is used in our Civil Code, is to be taken in any narrower sense.

[4] Inasmuch, however, as the covenant against incumbrances is merely one of indemnity (Rawle, Cov. for Title, § 188), no more than nominal damages can be recovered on account of an incumbrance which has inflicted no actual injury upon the grantee. (Id.). Accordingly, where, as here, the breach is set up by the defendant as a counterclaim, the defense will be of no avail without proof that the grantee has suffered damage from the alleged breach. Thurgood v. Spring, 139 Cal. 596, 73 Pac. 456. The court below found that the defendants have not been damaged in any sum. The judgment against the counterclaim properly followed, unless, as is asserted by the appellants, this finding is not supported by the evidence.
